RECTOR OF THURCASTON IN LEICESTERSHIRE.
but find the highest entertainment, in weighing the wisdom, as well as the truth and usefulness, of these parables: and whose virtue and prudence dispose the hours of your life with such order as not to let you want time both to ponder them yourself, and to instil them also into the minds of your children.

Whose future happiness depends upon their being early seasoned with such principles as these: which will be the most effectual preservatives against the infectious air wherein we breathe; a treasure of such inestimable price, as will keep their minds from being corrupted, by all the briberies of fortune (as we call it), or from being deserted at any cross turn of it; which, in this world, must be sometimes expected.

For such is the inconstancy of all human things, such is the frailty even of our own bodies, as your Grace hath been lately taught by a tedious sickness (from which I most heartily congratulate your Grace’s happy recovery), that we love not ourselves, if we seek not after a better good, which is firm and permanent: a good that can withstand corruption, and defend itself against the force of time, and all the accidents of this world.

In the prosecution of which supreme good I commend your Grace to the blessing of the Almighty: who always favours the least desires of being good, and therefore will never desert your sincere endeavours of it: which are not unknown to him, while you prefer the closet to the theatre, and look more to the inside of virtue than to its outward appearances.

But I forget myself; and stand in need of a pardon for this long address; which I shall the more easily obtain, if your Grace please to believe nothing emboldened me to it, but the opinion I have that your goodness is as unlimited as my desires to approve myself, what I stand bound by many obligations to be.

May it please your Grace,
Your Grace’s most humble, and obedient servant, S. PATRICK.

PREFACE.

I. Next to the Psalms of David, which are an admirable collection of devotion, follow the Proverbs of Solomon, which contain most excellent rules of life. They are commonly called his Ethics; correcting men’s errors, and teaching them how to conduct themselves in all relations: but may as well be called his Politics also, comprehending under that word rules for the government of families, cities, and kingdoms, as well as of particular persons. For, as St. Basil speaks, this book is ἡ ἡμετέρα καθήμεναι ἀποκριόντος, an universal instruction and direction for all men, and for the whole life: containing frequent documents of what is to be done on all occasions.

II. And there being two ways of teaching; one by brief sentences and aphorisms, which are delivered also promiscuously, without any great care about the order of them; the other by methodical discourse, according to the rules of logic, proceeding orderly from one thing to another, till all that belongs to the matter in hand be reduced to one body, and make as it were an entire building: Solomon hath chosen the first way which was the most ancient; as it would be very easy to show, were there necessity of it; and were not the great antiquity of this sententious way of speaking apparent enough from that passage of David’s (1 Sam. xxiv. 13), “As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked”: which is much like that Greek adage, ἰδενον καθίσας ἵδεν θύων. For it was very usual with wise men of old (as the Lord Bacon observes, in his eighth book of the Advancement of Learning), when their observation light upon anything that might prove beneficial unto common life, to reduce it immediately, and contract it either into some short sentence or parable, or else into a fable. As for fables, they were only the substitutes and supplements of examples; to serve instead of them, while they were wanting, and no longer: when the world abounded in histories, they became unnecessary, because the shadow of things are useful only where the substance cannot be had; and because the aim is more exact, and more pleasant, when the mark is alive. Then those fables were to give place to the sententious way of instruction, comprising wise observations in a few words; which could be illustrated and enforced by a multitude of examples.

III. And therefore, in the fashionable times, we find those even among the poets who forsook fables, and betook themselves to this more profitable way of instruction: particularly Phocylides and Theognis, whom Julian the apostate is bold not only to compare with Solomon, but to prefer before him. To whom St. Cyril of Alexandria very judiciously answers (lib. vii. adv. Jul.), that as Solomon’s work is of far greater antiquity, he being contemporary with Homer himself, and they living a long time after with Solomon and Thales, in the reign of Creass: so it is infinitely more weighty than theirs; who said, indeed, some pretty spruce things, but so weak and shallow, in comparison with the manly and deep sense of Solomon’s Proverbs, that they were fit only for the use of nurses to prattle to their babes; or at the most for pedagogues to teach little boys. There is not, for instance, such a wise instruction to be found in all their books, as the very first of all in Solomon’s, which he lays as the ground of all wisdom (but they, alas! did not think of), that “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.” This, as St. Basil observes, is that ἰδενον καθίσας ἵδεν θύων: (which their philosophers so much talked of, but did not understand), the only thing that can purge the soul, and prepare it to be capable of instruction: which it is as improper (says he) to give to a man of impure affections, as it is to pour a precious ointment into a sordid filthy vessel.

The like I might say of another most admirable precept in his book, to dispose the soul for wisdom, viz., “Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding." There is no such word in all their writings; nor in Isocrates neither (whom that apostate prince vainly magnified likewise above Solomon), who may be praised for some profitable lessons he gave to youth, but must stoop, as St. Cyril speaks, to this great person; who, as he wrote long before him, so far outwrote him in all sort of wisdom, for the instruction both of young and old. Nor doth he only give precepts of manners, but many excellent admonitions about rewards and punishments; together with lively descriptions of the events of human actions, which serve much for our information. Many things also he discovers of men's most secret affections; of the causes and grounds of the greatest changes in human affairs; of the principal things that are of greatest moment in government; of the way to avoid all manner of dangers, and to preserve ourselves, our frame, our estates: with so many other things of like nature, that the son of Sirach justly said of him, Ecclus. xlvii. 14, 15, "He was as a flood filled with understanding. His soul covered the whole earth, and he filled it with dark parables."

IV. By that name some call these short sentences, which we call Proverbs; though the word parable properly signifies only a comparison or similitude. The original of which name is this (as Grotius hath observed in his Prolegomena to Stobaeus), that the most ancient authors delivered their precepts about manners, or about government, by comparisons; either full and at length (which the rhetoricians properly call ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐν τῇ ὁμοιωσιν, "parable"), or curtained, as we speak, and shortened. And these taken either from things plainly fabulous (as that of the fruit-trees and the harumose, in Judges ix.; and that of the thistle and the cedar, 2 Chron. xxv. 18; of the hawk and nightingale in Hesiod; the wolves, dogs, and sheep, in Demosthenes; and the famous parable of Menenius about the members of our body), or else from things likely and probable, as that of Nathan to David, and most of our blessed Saviour's.

V. But Solomon's sentence in this book are not of this nature; and therefore the LXX. use another word signifying a saying as trite and common as the highway; worn, as we say, threadbare (to use St. Basil's phrase), by everybody's constant use. And so do both the Latin and our English word proverb, denote some ancient common saying, which everybody hath in his mouth. But the word in the Hebrew, denotes only any acute and excellent saying: which is as worthy to be known by all, and to be in every one's mouth, as common proverbs are. And thus it is used in the most ancient book of holy Scripture for an eloquent speech, much exceeding those that had been made before, in the beginning of the twenty-seventh and twenty-ninth chapters of Job. And so the doctors of the church explain it: "A proverb (saith St. Basil) is a profitable saying, delivered with a moderate concealment of the sense," &c., or a pithy sentence in a few words, expressing much sense.

This is the first signification of the word; though in aftertimes every saying that was never so little out of the way of vulgar speech, began by the Hebrews to be called μασχλ, as may be seen in Ezek. xx. 49. And whether it was figurative, or simple and plain, if it did contain any profitable instruction, it was called by the same name; as we learn from the sentences in this book.

VI. Which consists of a preface, and of the book itself. The preface is in the first nine chapters; seven of which seem to be an admonition what is to be done and what to be avoided, to make a man capable of wisdom; which in the eighth and ninth chapters sets forth her own praises.

Then begins, as you find in the front of the tenth chapter, the Proverbs of Solomon: which consist of three parts, or books. The first part, from the beginning of the tenth chapter, to the seventeenth verse of the twenty-second, where a new form of speech, any body may discern, begins (as I have there noted), and continues to the twenty-fifth chapter; which may be called the second part. And then, from the twenty-fifth to the thirtieth (which is the last part), follow such sentences as were collected afterward out of his writings, or the writings of those who had recorded them; by some persons whom Hezekiah employed to search the ancient records. For we are told in 1 Kings iv. that he spake in all three thousand proverbs: which Josephus seems to think were so many books that perished in the captivity: but St. Jerome takes for so many sentences contained in this book; that is, some of them, for there are in all but eight hundred verses. And some of them are not Solomon's: for in the end of the book are added certain sayings of Agur to his scholars, and the instructions of a pious mother to her son Lemuel: of which I have given an account in their proper places.

VII. And therefore must entreat all those that would profit by this book, to read the argument of each chapter, before they proceed to the paraphrase: or at least to consult the references which I have made to such passages in it as will help to make the sense clearer, or to explain difficult places; which sometimes are capable of more senses than one; and therefore, if I have not represented them all in the paraphrase, I do it in the argument: designing all along this alone, to give the fullest and properst explications of every phrase; upon which, as I have not dilated, so I have expressed the meaning in the plainest words I could find. For, as St. Jerome speaks concerning his own commentaries upon Ezekiel (in the preface to the fifth book), "My business was not to study the art of rhetoric, nor of exact composition and graceful language; but to use a careful diligence to hit the sense: resting content with this praise alone, if the wise man's words be understood by my means." And indeed it ought to be the design of every good man, in such works as these, that the holy books (as he speaks in another place), may be made more intelligible by his endeavours; and not that his own writings may be commended by occasion of those books."

VIII. And in his time nothing was commendad, he saith, but only that which men fancied to be eloquent. In this the Latins were then altogether delighted; but nauseated the understanding of the Holy Scriptures. Which provoked God, in his just judgments, to deliver them into the hands of those rough nations, who in his days, broke in like a flood upon them; and turned their vain affectation of neatness and elegance of speech into rudeness and barbarism; which ought to be a caution unto us, not to give up ourselves to the admiration only of the language and of the wit of the state; lest our minds thereunto be so depraved, that we have no relish of the most serious, no, not of the sacred writings, but reject them as insipid things: with which disease if any be infected, they might, by God's grace, be cured; if they would be pleased to apply their mind with due attention to the study of this one holy book, which wants nothing to entertain the minds of all men, though of the widest capacity, with the greatest variety of pleasure; if they have not perfectly lost the taste of that which will do them good, and make them truly happy.

IX. It is recorded by Suetonius of Cesar Augustus, that in his reading all sort of Greek, as well as Latin authors, he chiefly observed and transcribed such wholesome precepts or examples, as might serve him either for public or private use: which upon occasion he produced, for the instruction of his own domestics, or of the commanders of his armies, or the governors of provinces, or the magistrates in their several cities; according as he thought every one had need of admonition; whom, if any man have the heart to imitate, Solomon hath saved him the labour which that great person underwent. He need not turn over many volumes, to search for all manner of wise instructions: but be furnished here (and at an easy rate) out of the vast treasure of learning he hath left us in this small book, with the best advices that can be given, either to princes, counsellors, judges, and other public ministers; or to all sorts of subjects in their several relations, and in every condition; to make them both pious and politic: to direct them in the choice of their consists; in the education of their children; in the management of domestic affairs, and in their transactions with other men; in contracting or conducting their friendships; in giving or taking good counsel and reproof; in making or preserving peace; in judging of men, and of the event of their designs; and, in short (for it would be a new book to mention every thing particularly), to instruct every one in all sorts of virtue; especially in the government of the tongue; wherein men offend, and whereby they suffer so much, that there is no part of prudence more necessary than that, and therefore none more insisted on in this book.

X. Which contains the wisdom of that excellent prince, who could readily resolve all questions and doubts; penetrate into the nature of all things; and had his own family and kingdom in such admirable order, that it astonished her who came from the ends of the earth to discourse with him. And it was composed, if we may rely upon the judgment of the Jewish writers, in his best and most judicious years: when his kingdom also was in perfect peace, and there was no disturbance in his affairs.

For the book of Caniciles, say they, was written in his youth; the Proverbs, when he was of riper years; the Ecclesiastes, when he was old, and repenting of the sins he had been drawn into by the snares of women: who had made this admirable person as great an example of folly as he had been before of wisdom. Whence that common saying of theirs: "Men compose songs when they are young; parables, when they are grown to be perfect men; and discourses of the vanity of things, when they are old."

XI. But the time of his writing these books is not so material as the design; which is excellently expressed by St. Basil, in a discourse of his upon the beginning of this book (tom. i. hom. 12): "The book of Proverbs (saith he) is an instruction of manner, and a correction of the passions; and an entire direction of the whole life, containing abundance of precepts about well-doing. The Ecclesiastes touches upon the nature of things; and evidently shows the vanity of every thing in this world: and so we may not think it worth our pains to be so solicitous as we are about things that swiftly pass away from us; nor waste the thought and cares of our mind about empty and vanishing enjoyments. The Song of Songs shows the manner of perfecting souls. For it contains the happy concord of the bridegroom and the spouse: that is, the familiarity of the soul with God the word."

XII. I conclude this preface, as that great man doth that discourse. "He is wise, not only who hath arrived at a complete habit of wisdom, but who hath made some progress towards it; nay, who doth as yet but love it, or desire it, and listen to it. Such as these, by the reading of this book, shall be made wiser; for they shall be instructed in much divine, and in no less human, learning: in expelling vice divers ways: and, with as great variety, introducing all manner of virtues. It bridles the injurious tongue; corrects the wanton eye; and ties the unjust hands in chains. It persecutes sloth; chastises all absurd desires; teaches prudence; raises men's courage; and represents temperance and chastity after such a fashion, that one cannot but have them in veneration."

Let a man but consent to one thing, which this book desires, to make these precepts familiar to his mind, "saying unto wisdom (as you find the words, vii. 4), Thou art my sister, and calling understanding his kinswoman:" and he will not fail to be happy. For this is the sum of all, in a few words; "Love her, and she shall preserve thee."
CHAPTER I.

1 The proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Israel;
2 To know wisdom and instruction: to perceive the words of understanding:

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—The title of this book is joined to it as a part of the work, and contained in the first six verses. Where the author uses several words to express the matter he intends to treat of; viz. with (ver. 1). The subject, Nazianzen observes (Orat. xxxix., p. 329), that we, “must not (if we would be wise), first begin in contemplation, and so end in fear (for an unbridled contemplation is very dangerous); but being thoroughly seasoned and purged, and as one may say attenuated, and humbled by fear, so to be carried aloft in contemplation.

The first and the second is [5] “next to God, to bear a reverence to parents,” both natural and spiritual: to God’s ministers, that is, and to all teachers and instructors; to whom, if children be not bred to give a great regard, they seldom prove virtuous (ver. 3). Where it is very observable how much human laws differ from divine: the former generally only providing that due regard be given by children to their fathers, but taking no notice of mothers; as may be seen in the Persian laws mentioned by Aristotle, the Roman described in the Digests and Constitutions, and several passages of the Greek philosophers, which we find in Epictetus and Simplicius, who (as Grotius notes upon the fifth commandment) consider only the honour of the father: but God in his law takes care to preserve a just reverence both to father and mother equally; as the persons whose ministry he uses to bring us into the world. And accordingly not only Solomon in this place, and many other, but the son of Sirech also (who was bred under that divine institution), presses the duty owing to both very largely, in the first sixteen verses of the third chapter of Ecclesiasticus.

Now one of the first things parents should take care of, is to teach their children [7] to avoid evil company (as it follows here, ver. 10), and then to represent vice in its true colours, as Solomon here both one sort of wickedness (ver. 11, 12, &c.), the root of which he shows is love of money: which therefore should be looked upon as most odious; and, indeed, the root of all evil (ver. 18, 19).

Their stupid blindness also is to be represented, who will take no warning; but though destruction be plainly before their eyes in the way wherein they walk, they walk, and contrive to beat the precept (ver. 10). And they are to be admonished also to hearken to the voice of wisdom presently, wheresoever they meet with it, which is everywhere (ver. 20, &c.).

Which is pressed here (ver. 24, &c.), from this consideration, that there will be a time when they shall stand in need of God’s help; but not find it, if they have slighted his importunities to obedience.

For he is not only good, but just also; and not as easy, as to be moved merely by prayers and entreaties (as we are generally, and in distress), which have more of self-love in them, than love to him. Whose wise providence requires men in their kind; and destroys them by that which they most desire. “In short, in this chapter he introduces wisdom speaking to her son, or to her children in general: inviting them to love her, and by no means to tread in the way of sinners: but to keep close to her direction; threatening destruction to those who contends this counsel.”

There seem to be three proverbial sayings in it. One, ver. 17, which may be four or five ways interpreted: two of which I think to be comprised in our parables, being the most common and natural. Another, ver. 31, like to that in Terence, “Tute hoc intravisti, omné hoc vordúnum est tibû.” And the other in the next (ver. 32), where these words, “the prosperity of fools shall destroy them,” teach us that it is a great part of wisdom, to be able to bear a great form of government, as we call it, or the Jew, Jason an example in aftertimes, who was undone by his successes (2 Macc. v. 6, 7, &c.).

Ver. 1.] This book contains some notable and very useful sayings of that wise prince, king Solomon, the son of that devout prince, king David; by whose special appointment he was consecrated to the government of God’s peculiar people Israel, for which (according to David’s prayer Ps. lxixi. and his own, 1 Kings iii. 8) God endued him with an extraordinary degree of understanding.

Ver. 2.] The scope of them is to make a man known what it is to be truly wise; and instruct him how to avoid these errors which are apt to fall into, or to correct them if he hath been misled and run into them; and to make him understand when good advice is given him; nay to be able to give it unto others.

Ver. 3.] For they will furnish him with the most excellent notions, and make him capable to understand things of highest concernment: both how to live just and good in all private transactions: and in public trusts and offices to judge and act according to right and equity; and every other way, to be upright and exactly virtuous.

Ver. 4.] The most unskilful and inconsiderate persons may here learn, be circumspect and wary: and they who are childish and inconsiderate, get so much.
5 A wise man will hear, and will increase learning; and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels:

6 To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings.

7 The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction.

8 My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother:

9 For they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck.

10 My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.

11 If they say, Come with us, let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent without cause:

knowledge, as to behave themselves with prudence and discretion.

Ver. 5.] As for him that is wise already, he will not lose his labour in reading this book; which will make him still wiser. And, indeed, it is principally designed for the improvement of him that is so wise as not willing to learn more; who shall both gain a clearer knowledge of what he understands, and also make such additions that he shall be fit to be a counsellor to kings, and govern the affairs of state in the greatest kingdoms.

Ver. 6.] He shall comprehend the most useful maxims; and be able to express them also with the greatest elegance: the weightiest sayings of wise men shall be easy to him; and their abstrusest notions shall not be hidden from him.

Ver. 7.] In the first place, then, let all, both simple and wise, look upon an awful sense of God, a devout affection to him, and fear to offend him, as the chiefest point, and the very foundation of all wisdom: without which men are but fools; and having no regard to their creator, will despise the wisest instructions that I can give them. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 8.] And next to God, let me advise thee, my son (or whoever thou art that comest to learn of me in this book), to reverence thy parents. And not only to be taken unto thy father when he teaches thee to fear God, and shew thee the way of life; but also to let thy mother’s commands be a law to thee; especially when she bids thee observe the directions of thy tutors and public instructors, unto whom she committeth thee: from which be sure never to depart. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 9.] But value their counsels more than the fairest ornaments thy parents can put upon thee; or the most precious chains wherewith they can adorn thy neck: for they shall add a far greater grace unto thee; and make thee more acceptable both with God, and with all worthy men.

Ver. 10.] There will be those who will make it their business to seduce thee from their obedience; but remember, my son, that none can love thee so well as they: and, therefore, if lewd persons (who have no respect to God, or to their pious parents and instructors) persuade thee to bear them company, by no means yield to their greatest importunities; but flee their society. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 11.] They may represent, perhaps, what advantage it will be to thee to join with them in the breach of the very next commandment to that of honouring thy father and thy mother: saying, Come along with us to our lurking-places, where nobody can see us and from thence set upon a wealthy traveller,

12 Let us swallow them up alive as the grave; and whole, as those that go down into the pit:

13 We shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil:

14 Cast in thy lot among us; let us all have one purse:

15 My son, walk not thou in the way with them; refrain thy foot from their path:

16 For their feet run to evil, and make haste to shed blood.

17 Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird.

18 And they lay wait for their own blood; they lurk privily for their own lives.

19 So are the ways of every one that is greedy of gain; which taketh away the life of the owners thereof.

who is to go that way, and take away his life: what though he be innocent, we shall the more easily despatch him, when he suspects no danger, and hath given us no provocation.

Ver. 12.] And though he should have many servants or companions with him to defend him, let not that deter thee; for we are enough of us to kill them all with ease in a moment, or to strangle them, and bury them alive: so that none shall escape to tell any tales; nor shall they make any noise; nay it shall not be known what is become of them.

Ver. 13.] The booty shall be great: for we are sure to find vast treasures, and all manner of precious things: enough to enrich us all, and furnish our houses bravely, that we may live splendidly all our days.

Ver. 14.] Come in for a share of it; and thou shalt have as much of it as we, who have been longer at the trade: for we live like friends, among whom all things are common; there is but one purse among us all, in which every one hath an equal interest.

Ver. 15.] But my son (or whoever thou art that wilt learn of me), let them not prevail with thee to go along with them, or to betake thyself to such a course of life: but if thou findest an inclination to it, stop it presently, and stir not one step in their company, or after their example.

Ver. 16.] For it is not one single murder or robbery in one day that will engage thee (though the guilt of that is too horrid to venture upon), but they will be always hurrying thee to some new mischief or other; and as soon as one mischief is over, they will be ready for, and make haste to commit, another.

Ver. 17.] Flee from their society, therefore, now that I have given thee this warning: and be not so foolish and incautious as the silly birds, who use to run into the snare, or the net, which they see the fowler lay before their eyes (vii. 23).

Ver. 18.] For as he doth not lay his net in vain, but they are caught therein; so assure thyself these men are setting a trap for themselves, when they lie in wait to take away the lives of others: for they shall not always escape the hand of justice: but at last be taken and suffer, either by a special vengeance of God, or by his ministers, what they have deserved.

Ver. 19.] Such is the fate of him that greedily endeavours to enrich himself by such wicked means. As the bird, enticed by a little chaff, falls into a snare, which it doth not perceive, so he on a sudden loses his life, to satisfy a vain desire of worldly pelf, which then he cannot enjoy.

Ver. 20.] Let me advise you, therefore, rather to hearken to the manifold instructions of wisdom:
Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets:
She crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates: in the city she uttereth her words, saying,

How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge!

Turn you at my reproof: behold, I will pour out my spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you.

Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded;
But ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof:
I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; whose most excellent counsels you cannot but be as well acquainted withal, as you are with that which is plain and open. But you will set up your reason against the plain dictates of your own consciences, in the laws of God, in the mouth of his prophets and ministers, in the admonitions and examples of good men, and in the course of his providence and wise government; which call upon you more earnestly and loudly than these loud seducers, to follow and obey them.

Ver. 21.] There is no place where this cry of virtue and piety is not heard; which is not ashamed of itself, nor lurks in darkness, like those impious seducers, but appears openly in the midst of the greatest crowds; where no noise can drown its voice, no business, either public or private, can thrust by its reproofs; but still it interposes itself, and everybody, even those wicked men that flee from it, hear it calling to them:

Ver. 22.] And representing their unaccountable folly and stupidity, in such unanswerable questions as these: Is it not apparent, by many examples, that such men as you are deceived and abused with vain hopes I why then do you continue the cheat? Have you not become long enough, and you will still act against your reason, and against your interest? where lies the pleasure of scoffing at religion and virtue, that you will never give it over? is any man so wise that he needs no monitor? or is ignorance so laudable, that a man should hate those who would inform him?

Ver. 23.] Do not turn away from such checks as these; but repent in time, and resolve to learn your duty. It is not too late; for if you will listen to the secret rebukes of your consciences, and to the open reproves of my prophets, and follow their directions, I will plentifully communicate my mind, and influse the very sense of it into you: it is not hard to find, nor will I conceal anything of it, but plainly show you all that I require of you.

Ver. 24.] Which offer, if you refuse, nay, go on obstinately to despise instruction, then hear the doom which God, whose voice wisdom is, passes upon you: Because I have pressed you often to amend, and ye would not yield to me; nay I have been very urgent and earnest with you (offering you my assistance, heaping upon you many benefits, and when they would do no good, laying on corrections, as well as showing you the way to happiness), and none of you would so much as attend unto me:

Ver. 25.] But, quite contrary, set at nought all the good advice I gave you, as if they had been but vain and idle words; and slighted all my reproves and threatenings, as if they had been ridiculous or of no moment:

When your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you:

Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me:

For that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord:
They would none of my counsel: they despised all my reproof.
Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices.
For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them.

But whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil.

Ver. 26.] Therefore I will repay you in your kind; and as little regard what becomes of you, in the day of your calamity (which like a dismal cloud I will bring upon you unavoidably): I will be utterly unconcerned, when you know not which way to turn yourselves; but are become the scorn of those who shall see you quake and tremble at that which before you would not fear at all.

Ver. 27.] Though it proves such a dreadful calamity, as will lay all waste, it shall not move me to relieve you; but I will let it sweep you, and all you have, away, like a whirlwind: and when you fall into the most pinching outward distresses, and into the sorest anguish of mind, you shall evidently see it was my pleasure to reduce you to those inextricable straits and pressures.

Ver. 28.] For then (hearken all you that have not yet slumbered to this degree of obstinacy) it will be very hard for these men not to think of me, when before they would not regard: nay, they shall cry to me for help, but I will send them none; they shall seek my favour importunately, but without the least success.

Ver. 29.] Because, when time was, they hated that knowledge, of which now they are forced to be desirous; and when they were earnestly solicited to have some regard to God and to religion, they would not consent unto it.

Ver. 30.] But (as was said before) rejected my good advice with such disdain as if it had been a grievance to them; and slighted, nay, contemned, all those reproves whereby I would have reclaimed them from their iniquity.

Ver. 31.] Therefore, as it is just that men should reap what they sow, and eat such fruit as they plant, so these men shall suffer the punishments which their wicked doings naturally produce; nay, be glutted and surfeited with the miserable effects of their own counsels and contrivances.

Ver. 32.] For let them alone, and they need nobody but themselves to destroy them: their escaping dangers only making them more audacious to run into them; and their receiving daily additions of riches and honours, supplying their folly with means to hasten their undoing.

Ver. 33.] Such a vast difference there is between wicked and virtuous men. For whose follows my counsels, and takes the courses to which I direct him, shall even then be safe, and possess what he hath in peace, when he sees these fools come to ruin; nay, he shall not be so much as disturbed with the fear of any mischief; but rest secure of a watchful providence over him.
PROVERBS.

CHAPTER II.

1 My son, if thou wilt receive my words, and hide my commandments with thee;
2 So that thou incline thine ear unto wisdom, and apply thine heart to understanding;
3 Yeul, if thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding;
4 If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures;

5 Then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God.
6 For the Lord giveth wisdom: out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding, 7 He layeth up sound wisdom for the righteous: he is a buckler to them that walk uprightly.

Of which many learned men have proved worse than the most ignorant. Most of these are the sense of the beginning of the chapter; and the last of them in the sense of ver. 10, 11.

[c] There are those who look upon ver. 4, as a proverential saying, borrowed from those that dig in mines: the former part of it expressing eager desires and great diligence; and the latter, invincible resolution and perseverance, notwithstanding those difficulties that occur to discourage our labour. Both which I have taken notice of in the paraphrase; though I see nothing proverbial in it, more than in many other similitudes.

[d] I do not know whether I need observe (it is so easy) that the phrase we meet withal, ver. 19, go unto her, is modest expression; used frequently in the holy books: as may be seen very often in one chapter, Gen. xxxviii. 2, 8, 9, 16, 18.

Ver. 1.] And now, my son, whose happiness I most heartily desire, let me tell thee for thy farther encouragement; that if thou dost entertain these exhortations which I have now given thee, and keep these precepts in remembrance, for the same end that corn is sown and covered in the ground:

Ver. 2.] Listening with diligent attention, not to the enticements of such evil men as I have described, but to the counsels and instructions of wisdom, with sincere affection, applying thy mind to understand thy duty:

Ver. 3.] And moreover, if thou expressest such a desire of it, as men do of that which they most need; and without which they are in danger to perish; praying those that are able to inform thee, and beseeching God likewise with ardent devotion, that he would bring thee acquainted with it:

Ver. 4.] If thou dost value this wisdom above the greatest treasures, and show thy esteem of it by studious seeking for it, as covetous men do for money; laying hold upon all occasions of profiting in knowledge, and pursuing thy advantages (as they do) when thou meetest with them; not giving over thy labour presently, if thou findest not what thou desirest; but inquiring still, and sparing no pains to know what the will of the Lord is: see Arg. 13.

Ver. 5.] Then shalt thou not fail to understand what it is to be truly religious; and that there is no wisdom comparable to it: and shalt find also what reason there is to reverence, worship, and solicitously obey him, who is the almighty creator, governor, and judge of all the world.

Ver. 6.] For as wisdom, no less than all other good things, is the gift of the Lord (without whom all our pains and study about it will be ineffectual), so there is no doubt he will bestow it on those who esteem it above all worldly goods; especially this most necessary part of it: which he hath already imparted to us by his prophets and men inspired; who have given us a true knowledge and understanding of him.

Ver. 7.] And have assured us, that he hath solid.
CHAPTER II.

8 He keepeth the paths of judgment, and preserveth the way of his saints.
9 Then shalt thou understand righteousness, and judgment, and equity; yea, every good path.
10 * When wisdom entereth into thine heart, and knowledge is pleasant unto thy soul;
11 Discretion shall preserve thee, understanding shall keep thee:
12 To deliver thee from the way of the evil man, from the man that speaketh froward things;
13 Who leave the paths of uprightness, to walk in the ways of darkness;
14 Who rejoice to do evil, and delight in the frowardness of the wicked;
15 Whose ways are crooked, and they froward in their paths:

and durable blessings (transcending all the transitory things of this life), reserved in store for upright men; and will protect all those by his almighty providence, whose care it is to perform and complete obedience to him in all things.

Ver. 8.] That so he may preserve them in their integrity; and encourage them neither to swerve from the rules of justice, nor to cease to exercise mercy and kindness: for he hath a great favour to such pious persons; and will be their keeper and defender in such proceedings.

Ver. 9.] By which thou shalt understand that justice and mercy in thy private dealings, and faithful discharge of thy trust in all public offices, and uprightness in every other virtue, are all of them the best, the most plain, easy, and natural way a man can take to be happy.

Ver. 10.] And when wisdom hath thus taken possession of thy very heart and affections; and thou findest an inward pleasure and satisfaction by observing the rules of piety and all manner of virtue:

Ver. 11.] This alone will be a sufficient security to thee, and make thee unwilling to depart from them. For thy own experience will teach thee, that it is the greatest cunning to go in those plain and open ways, and that those men understand their own interest so well, as they cannot be persuaded by any means to forsake them.

Ver. 12.] Though otherwise thou mightest be seduced into a wrong course, yet this will deliver thee from that danger; and not suffer thee to be perverted by the mouth of him that would subtly insinuate his lewd principles into thee.

Ver. 13.] Though thou shouldst be assaulted by many of them, thou shalt easily discover their folly, in leaving the straight, plain, and even paths of virtue, to walk blindly they know not whither, in the perplexed ways of vice and wickedness.

Ver. 14.] Being so mad as to rejoice when they have done any mischief; and having no higher pleasure than to pervert others, and make them as bad as themselves.

Ver. 15.] That is, to draw them aside, and entangle them in intricate ways, directly cross to their own interest, safety, and pleasure; for the whole course of their life is nothing else but a shameful contradiction to their soberest reason and best understanding.

Ver. 16.] But such is that sweet satisfaction which (as I said, ver. 10, 11,) thou wilt find in the affectionate love of true wisdom, that it will deliver thee, not only from the snares of wicked men, but, which is more dangerous, of a naughty woman, whose company (though so pernicious that God would have thee perfectly estranged from her, if she were not of the commonwealth of Israel, yet) hath powerful charms in it, to flatter thee into her embraces. See Arg. [6].

Ver. 17.] Above all other, from that filthy adulteress who is so low as to leave her husband (though a worthy and perhaps noble person,) to whom she was joined in her youth, when love is in its greatest warmth, and took him for her guide and governor; but hath wickedly broken the laws of God, and violated the solemn vow of fidelity to him, which she made when they were married.

Ver. 18.] The least degree of that discretion which wisdom infuses, will teach thee to avoid her society, who loves nobody, now that she hath forsaken him that had her first affection; but seeks the ruin of all that go to her house: where, by one means or other, they are in danger to meet with their grave, and be sent to keep company with those old giants, who corrupted mankind with such filthiness and violence that they brought a deluge upon the earth (Gen. vi. 4, 5, 11.) See Arg. [6].

Ver. 19.] And this is very remarkable, that it is rarely seen that anybody who is drawn into her impure embraces ever gets out again; but she holds them all so fast by her enchantments, and they are so blinded and bewildered by her arts, that, like men who have quite lost their way in a strange country, seldom or never can hit into it, and recover themselves to a virtuous way of living. See Arg. [7].

Ver. 20.] In which the sincere love of wisdom (ver. 11, 12, &c.) will so secure thee; that escaping her snares, as well as those of wicked men, thou mayest imitate those excellent persons the patriarchs and prophets: and be preserved in the paths of those righteous men who have followed after them.

Ver. 21.] Which is as much as to say, that thou mayest be perfectly happy; for men of integrity (according to God's promise, Deut. xi. 8, 9, 21) shall peaceably enjoy this good land which God hath given us: and they that study sincerely to please him in all things, shall leave it in possession to their posterity after them.

Ver. 22.] But such impious men as I spoke of (according to what God himself hath also denominated Deut. xi. 17, and other places) shall be cut down from the earth: where they may flourish, like a tree, for a time: may, they that give themselves up to do wickedly, and keep no faith with God nor man, shall be plucked up, like a tree, by the very roots, and leave none to preserve their memory behind them.

Vol. III.—2
CHAPTER III.

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter he continues to press obedience to the precepts of wisdom; from the consideration of the benefits that are to be reaped thereby. Which he began to speak of in the foregoing chapter (touching also there, upon the minchefs on the contrary side), but here handles more largely; and explains it not only in general, but in several particular precepts: for instance, liberality to God's ministers, ver. 5, 10; patience in adversity, ver. 11, 12, the foundation of which is an entire trust in God, and his fidelity, who will honour those that honour him, in his ministers; and never desert those in their trouble, who do good when they are in their prosperity, ver. 5, 6.

After these things he returns to the general exhortation, ver. 13, &c., advising every one to learn the doctrine delivered by God, and to be obedient; and not be so foolish as to prefer his own wisdom or craft before it. To which, he adds promises and comissions, together with several advices; which I need not note particularly; because they lie plainly before their eyes who will read the chapter.

I shall only observe that he represents wisdom, [a] (ver. 16, 17, &c.), that is, religion and virtue, as other authors have done (particularly Cebes in his Tables), in the shape of a beautiful woman, or rather queen; with her arms extended, in the posture not only of directing, but also of rewarding her lovers and followers. For she holds forth in her right hand the great blessings of health and length of days, unto all those that will walk in the way to which she points. And it was just to place this in her hand, because it is to guide the way of the ignorant, because it was the chief promise of the law: and indeed the most desirable of all earthly blessings, without which nothing can be enjoyed; no, not ourselves.

And then, after this, follow wealth and reputation; things that mankind mightily covet: which he places in her left hand; as inferior blessings, but that come also from her gift.

And as for cheerfulness in all conditions, there are no pleasures, he affirms, like those which wait upon her, and attend her motions. Safe and secure pleasures: which do not merely gratify us for the present, and then expose us to danger, and leave us sad afterward: but give us a peaceable possession of perpetual joy, which never dies nor decays; but, like the tree of life, remains fresh for ever. This he proves, ver. 19, 20, and amplifies in the rest of the chapter.

[a] In which some observe three proverbial sayings: one, ver. 8, which seems to be a metaphorical representation of that firmness, that vigorous health, and cheerfulness of mind, which virtue imparts: the other, in ver. 12, [c] whom the Lord loveth he correcteth; which Theodoret, upon Heb. xii. 6, calls understanding in the sight of God and man. 5 [b] Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. 6 In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths. 7 [d] Be not wise in thine own eyes: fear the Lord, and depart from evil.

Ver. 1.] Let me then again entreat thee, whoever thou art that comest to learn of me (who loveth thee with a fatherly affection), not to be careless and negligent in the observance of these instructions; but remember them, and love them, and set thyself heartily to do whatsoever I command thee.

Ver. 2.] For this is the surest way to that which all men naturally desire, and seek to attain, a long life, in firm health, vigour, and strength: with all manner of happiness and prosperity (Deut. xxx. 18, 20).

Ver. 3.] Of this thou canst not miss, if thou wilt be steadfastly good and just; for the infinite bounty of God, and his faithfulness to his promises, will secure these blessings to thee; therefore let my commandments be ever before thine eyes; fix them in thy memory and in thy affections, as if they were engraven upon thy heart; and look upon it as the greatest ornament to be obedient to them.

Ver. 4.] And if thou dost not pitch upon the chief end, as if I had hidden thee acquire favour with God; and understand, on all occasions, what is good for thyself, ordering all thy affairs with such judgment and prudence as to be in high esteem with him, and with men.

Ver. 5.] And assure thyself there is no rule of prudence like to this, to confide in God entirely; and to depend wholly on his providence for good success in well-doing: not imagining that, by thy own wit and policy, thou canst contrive such events as thou desirest, and bring about what thou desirdest.

Ver. 6.] No; in all thy undertakings, both private and public, he sensible of his overruling power; observe his laws; and implore his favour and blessing; and he shall guide thee in thy proceedings; and bring them to a happy issue as he in his wisdom sees best for thee.

Ver. 7.] Never be guilty of such folly as to conceive thy wit to be so great, that thou canst manage things thereby in thine own way (neglecting the rules that he hath prescribed thee) to thy satisfaction; but have a religious regard to him, who can either disappoint or prosper thee as he pleases: and fearing to offend his majesty, avoid most cautiously those practices that he hath forbidden thee.
8 It shall be health to thy navel, and marrow to thy bones.
9 Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the firstfruits of all thine increase:
10 So shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine.
11 ¶ My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord; neither be weary of his correction:
12 For whom the Lord loveth he correcteth; even as a father the son in whom he delighteth.
13 ¶ Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding.
14 For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold.
15 She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her.

VER. 8.] This is the way to preserve a good habit both of soul and body: and in all conditions to remain undejected; may, cheerful and fully satisfied, whatsoever happens. See Arg. [2].

VER. 9.] As, for example, there are those who think it prudence to save all they can; though it be by robbing God himself: but if thou wilt be truly wise and happy, commend him in his ministers, by paying them their duteous daly; and bringing oblations to his house at the three solemn feasts (Exod. xxiii. 14, 15), together with the first-fruits of all that thy estate produces (xxii. 29, 30), in token of thy gratitude to him, and that all thou hast is his, and cannot thrive without his blessing.

VER. 10.] Which he will pour upon thee abundantly; and convince thee, by lading the earth with fruit, and sending a seasonable as well as plentiful harvest and vintage, that this is the way not to diminish, but to increase the estate which God hath given thee (Deut. xxviii. 3, 5; 2 Chron. xxxii. 10).

VER. 11.] And suppose it be his pleasure that any affliction should betfall thee, my son (ver. 1), let not that dissatisfaction thee; nor make thee either doubt of his gracious providence over thee, or out of patience take any unlawful course to remove it from thee.

VER. 12.] But rather submit unto it as a part of his fatherly discipline, which cannot hurt thee; but only correct something that is amiss in thee; for we are sure there are those that keep his commandments; and therefore nothing that proceeds from his love ought to be despised, or received with an abject mind, but duly esteemed by thee, and raise their expectation of some good from the affliction: which should no more make him suspected of any unkindness, than a tender parent is, when he whips the child in whom he delights; and to whom he wishes so well, that he will not let him be unchastised. See Arg. [6].

VER. 13.] Happy, more happy than can be expressed, is that man who attains to this degree of wisdom; and acquires (though it cost him the greatest pains and labour) such an understanding of God, and belief of his providence, as, notwithstanding any troubles that betfall him, still to adhere unto him in faithful obedience (ver. 7).

VER. 14.] If it were to be bought for money, one would purchase it at any rate; for the profit of it is infinitely to be preferred before all the advantages that can be made by silver and gold.

VER. 15.] The most precious pearls are not so valuable; nor can our boundless fancy present any thing to our wishes that is worthy to come in competition with it.

VER. 16.] For true wisdom presents us, as we say, with both hands: teaching us, in the first place, such prudence and moderation, as by the divine blessing prolong our days (which none of those things can do for us); and, in the next place, adds both riches and honour; which men foolishly and vainly seek to get, and to keep, by other means. See Arg. [e].

VER. 17.] And, besides all this, there is a singular pleasure, nay the highest delight, in all the acts of virtue to which wisdom directs her followers; who are always either in perfect safety by well-doing, or, if any trouble come upon them, have that inward tranquillity and satisfaction, which nothing else could give them.

VER. 18.] In short, wisdom leads into a paradise; and supplies the place of that tree of life, from whence our first parents were banished; that is, gives not only a present, but an immortal satisfaction, to all those that strongly apprehend and retain her precepts; and therefore I again pronounce him happy (ver. 13), above all other men, and above all expression, who constantly and firmly adhere unto them. See Arg. [f].

VER. 19.] For they are a participation of that wonderful wisdom and understanding, whereby the Lord settled the earth in that place where it remains fixed; and disposed the heavenly bodies in that admirable and unchangeable order, which he would have us imitate.

VER. 20.] In works of mercy and goodness especially, whereby we plainly communicate with him in that knowledge, by which the Lord made fountains of water gush out of the earth for the use of all living creatures; and the clouds drop down plentifully their refreshing dew, for the cherishing of plants and grass, which in hot countries many times have no other moisture.

VER. 21.] My son (to whom my affection is so great, that I cannot but again repeat it, ver. 1, 11), let me prevail with thee to fix these good instructions in thy mind; look upon them as the most solid wisdom, and the greatest saving and policy; and accordingly observe them.

VER. 22.] For they will revive and cheer thee, when other things fail thee: and enable thee also with acceptable words to comfort those, whom the fame of thy wisdom shall invite to learn of thee.

VER. 23.] When thou goest abroad about thy business, thou shalt despise it the more cheerfully, because thou art sure of God's providence over thee: and wisdom will direct thee to avoid those stumbling-blocks, by which others fall into sin and danger.
24 When thou liest down, thou shalt not be afraid: yea, thou shalt lie down, and thy sleep shall be sweet.

25 Be not afraid of sudden fear, neither of the desolation of the wicked, when it cometh.

26 For the Lord shall be thy confidence, and shall keep thy foot from being taken.

27 ¶ Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it.

28 Say not unto thy neighbour, Go, and come again; and to morrow I will give: when thou hast it by thee.

29 Deceive not evil against thy neighbour, seeing he dwelleth securely by thee.

Ver. 24.] And when thou comest home to rest from thy labours, thou shalt be as secure of what may happen whilst thou art asleep; but (having nothing to dispose thee) shalt lie down securely, and, by a sound and sweet repose, be refreshed to return to thy employments.

Ver. 25.] In which, if thou shouldst be interrupted by any rumours and reports of unexpected and approaching danger, let not that disturb thee: no, though thou shouldst see the wicked ready to lay all waste, or the divine vengeance bringing utter desolation upon them for their wickedness.

Ver. 26.] For a firm hope in the Lord shall be thy support, even when thou art in a tottering condition; nay, when thy skill quite fails thee, and thou knowest not what to do for thy safety; he shall so direct and guide thee, that thou shalt be preserved from falling into the hands of those that lie in wait to destroy thee.

Ver. 27.] And, as it will give thee great security of mind and confidence in God at such a time, not to be conscious to thyself of any wrong done to thy neighbour, by denying to pay thy just debts when thou art able; so the remembrance of having done good to others will be far greater: and therefore let me advise thee to take a special care not to withhold relief from those whose need entitle them unto it: when thou canst not pretend disability, but hast wherewithal to do it.

Ver. 28.] And, as thou wouldst not have God to defer his help in such distresses as I spoke of (ver. 25, 26), so do not thou put off thy neighbour when he begs a kindness of thee, saying, I cannot now; come another time; to-morrow thou shalt see what I will do for thee; when, if thou hast a heart to it, thou couldst supply him now, as well as then; and who can tell what shall be to-morrow?

Ver. 29.] And let not the quietness of any man’s temper, much less the confidence he hath of thy honesty and goodness, tempt thee to contrive any mischief to him: for the more securely he relies on thy virtue, and the less mistrust he hath of any harm from thee, the greater wickedness it will be, so much as to have it in thy thoughts to do him any injury.

Ver. 30.] For instance, do not bring false actions against any neighbour, nor vex him with causeless or unnecessary suits at law: no, nor so much as pretend a cause for quarrelling and falling out with him, when he hath done nothing to deserve it of thee.

Ver. 31.] And what though thou shouldst see men thrive by oppression and violence, let not that provoke thee to emulate them; that is, to wish thyself in their condition, by imitating them in any of their injurious proceedings.

Ver. 32.] For he that perseveres depart from all the rules of truth and justice is above all expression abominable to the Lord, even in his highest prosperity: but the Lord is a friend to men of sincere integrity; who know the secret of his providence in raising those wicked oppressors so high, that they may have the more dreadful fall.

Ver. 33.] The evil-doer is under the curse of the Lord, though he live in the most stately palace: but just and good men ought to look upon themselves as under his care and blessing; and therefore very happy in the nearest cottage.

Ver. 34.] Those proud oppressors and scoffers of good men, he will undoubtedly not only confound, but expose to scorn, and make them ridiculous in the eyes of the world; but cause the humble, modest, and meek (who bear even their insolent scoffs patiently), to be had in honour and highly esteemed.

Ver. 35.] They may be despised and debased for a time, but in the issue they shall be accounted the only wise men; and leave an excellent never-dying name behind them; when those impious men shall be famous for nothing, but the shame and disgrace that shall fall upon them.

CHAPTER IV.

1 Hear, ye children, the instruction of a father, and attend to know understanding.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—The dulness, sluggishness, and forgetfulness of mankind in their principal concerns are so notorious, that we need not wonder the wise man repeats the very same things, and quickens our attention to them, in the beginning of this chapter. Which he thought necessary to excite again (ver. 10), and again (ver. 29), because all his pains he knew would be lost without serious consideration of what he said; and the very first step to wisdom, is to have a mind to be wise.

And to make his exhortations the more acceptable, he acquaints the reader with the lessons which his own father and mother were wont to teach him (ver. 3, 4, &c.), and the great benefit he had received by them. Which gave him the greater confidence to press every one to follow his example of
CHAPTER IV.

3 For I was my father's son, tender and only beloved in the sight of my mother.
4 He taught me also, and said unto me, Let thine heart retain my words: keep my commandments, and live.
5 Get wisdom, get understanding: forget it not; neither decline from the words of my mouth.
6 Forsake her not, and she shall preserve thee: love her, and she shall keep thee.
7 Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding.

obsequiousness to good counsels, as the surest way to be happy; and by no means to imitate the examples of the wicked, from which he dissuades by many arguments (ver. 14, 15, &c.), and beseeches they may be so duly pondered (ver. 20, 21, &c.), that they produce in every one a watchfulness over his own heart, his mouth, his eyes, his feet, as may be seen in the conclusion of the chapter.

The principal instructions in this chapter are these: the care that parents ought to take to instruct their children diligently; and the greater they are (suppose princes) the more accurate ought their education to be, as Solomon's was (ver. 3, 4, &c.); and above all things the excellence of wisdom and virtue is to be inculcated; for this excites a desire of it; and that is the very beginning of it, as some expound those words, ver. 7. In which sense they are admirably explained in the book of Wisdom (vi. 12—14, 17). Next to this they are to be cautioned against evil company, as the bane of youth: and the words that are taken from Solomon's proverbs are thus rendered, ver. 8: Watchfulness also over the senses is commended, as of great use to preserve the affections from being corrupted.

Ver. 1.] Listen then, all ye that are desirous to learn, unto the instructions which, out of a paternal affection, I bring from God unto you: hearken to them, though they correct your present manners; and let your mind be so attentive, that you may know what it is to have a right understanding in all things.

Ver. 2.] They are no frivolous or indifferent matters which I teach you; but the most excellent things, and absolutely necessary to your happiness: therefore do not merely attend to them, but strictly observe my precepts, as the law and rule of your life.

Ver. 3.] Do as I myself did, who remember, that when I was a child, the son of a most wise and pious father, and under the careful eye of an affectionate mother, who loved me most dearly above all her children; and while I was soft and flexible, and apt to receive good impressions, looked to my education with great circumspection;

Ver. 4.] My father was wont to tutor and instruct me (1 Chron. xxviii. 8, xxix. 2), saying, Mind my words, and faithfully retain them, not only in thy memory, but in thy affections; observe my commandments, and thou shalt enjoy long happiness.

Ver. 5.] And this is the thing I require of thee, not so much to seek after riches, as to treasure up wisdom; and endeavour to understand how to behave thyself upon all occasions; and when thou art well-informed in thy duty, do not forget it, nor turn aside from the way into which I will direct thee.

Ver. 6.] Quit all things in this world rather than forsake the precepts of wisdom; stick to them, and they will preserve thee from innumerable mischiefs; love them sincerely, and they will be stronger guard than money can procure thee.

Ver. 7.] And as there is nothing comparable to wisdom, so the first step to it is to know as much, and to prize it accordingly. Begin therefore to be wise, by looking upon the fear of God as above all earthly possessions, and by being willing, if it were needful, to give all thou art worth to know what is pleasing to him.

Ver. 8.] Thou canst not speak nor think too highly of this wisdom, as thou shalt find by happy experience. For if thou magnify it above all things, it will raise thy esteem, and make thee more disposed to the mind, than the world; yea all thine entertain it with ardent love, thou shalt become most illustrious in the sight of God and men.

Ver. 9.] Whosoever else thou hast to commend thee and gain thee honour, this shall add unto it, and make it far more amiable; the fairest ornaments, or the most beautiful crown that can be set upon thy head, shall receive lustre from hence; and be settled there the more securely.

Ver. 10.] Thus my father was wont to discourse to me, as I do to thee, my son; whom I earnestly again entreat (ver. 1) to consider what I say, and to believe it; and then I promise thee, what he did me, ver. 4. Let thou shall lead a long and happy life.

Ver. 11.] I have already taught thee, and will still inform thee in the wisest course unto it; not in those crooked ways of fraud and falseness, &c., which many take; but in the direct paths of integrity and truth, in which I intend, as I have done hitherto, to lead thee.

Ver. 12.] And if thy actions and designs have no other rule, thou shalt be at ease, and free from those straits and difficulties which others meet withal; and in case thy business shall require haste, this will be the safest, as well as the most inoffensive (if not the shortest) way to accomplish thy ends.

Ver. 13.] Resolve to try it, and though it should be contrary to thy present sense, yet do not refuse this instruction which I give thee: but take such fast
PROVERBS.

13. Take fast hold of instruction: let her not go: keep her: for she is thy life.

14. Enter in to the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men.

15. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away.

16. For they sleep not, except they have done mischief; and their sleep is taken away, unless they cause some to fall.

17. For they eat the bread of wickedness, and drink the wine of violence.

18. But the path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

19. The way of the wicked is as darkness: they know not at what they stumble.

hold of it as never, for want of care and pains, to let it slip out of thy mind; keep it as a most precious treasure, for all thy happiness depends upon it.

Ver. 14.] And if thou really intendest to be guided by me, remember the advice I gave thee in the beginning (ch. 1, 10), not so much as to enter upon their wicked course of life, or to keep them company, who regard not God and are injurious to men: or, if thou hast been seduced into it, be not persuaded by their seeming prosperity, and thriving condition, to continue in it.

Ver. 15.] Avoid it therefore with a just abhorrence; come not near it, but get as far as thou canst from their society; and decline all occasions that might invite thee into it, as dangerous temptations.

Ver. 16.] For as mischief is their business, so they pursue it with a restless diligence: there being those among them, for instance, that cannot be quiet, nor have any satisfaction, till they have executed their villainous intentions; but perpetually disturb themselves, that they may ruin others.

Ver. 17.] For they live by robbery and spoil; having no other meat and drink, but what is the fruit of their rapine and violence, and not of their honest labours.

Ver. 18.] Which makes a wide difference between them and righteous men; whose pure and innocent life is full of honour as well as joy; which increases continually together with their virtue; proceeding (like the splendour of the sun, which nothing can extinguish, nor hinder in its course) till come to the highest pitch of joy and glory.

Ver. 19.] Whereas those wicked people live most uncomfortably, as well as basely and vilely; going on blindly to their own destruction (of which they are in constant danger, and grows more and more upon them), and yet they know not (no more than men in thick darkness) what mischief it is that suddenly may befall them.

Ver. 20.] Therefore I do, not without reason, once more repeat my request unto thee (ver. 1, 10), that thou wilt give diligent heed to my advice; and seriously consider the threats and exhortations, which proceed from a sincere affection to thy welfare.

Ver. 21.] Read them over and over again, and keep them perpetually in mind: or rather preserve them studiously, and lay them up, as a most precious treasure, in the closest affections of thy heart.

Ver. 22.] For they will make all those exceeding happy, both in body and soul, that come thoroughly acquainted with them: and, having once seen their temper and condition be, will prove an universal remedy for all their griefs and troubles.

Ver. 23.] And charge thyself with this, above all other cares, to set such a strict guard upon the inward thoughts, motions, and affections of thy soul (which are besetted with many enemies), that thy consent be never obtained to any thing which thou oughtest to refuse: for thy living well or ill depends on this; and such as thy caution and watchfulness are in this, such will the actions of thy life be, which flow from thence.

Ver. 24.] And as they that defend a city against an enemy set a strong guard at the gates and posterns, so do thou upon thy ears and upon thy mouth, never speaking things contrary to truth, honesty, and religion, thyself; nor listening unto those that do, but banishing both, as far as is possible, from thy familiarity.

Ver. 25.] The eyes also are dangerous inlets into the heart; and therefore watch them well that they do not gaze about, and fasten on every object that invites them; but be fixed upon one spot, as thy thoughts ought to be, from which let nothing divert them.

Ver. 26.] And before thou fixest and resolvest upon any action, examine and weigh it thoroughly, whether it be agreeable to the rule of life, and the end thou aimest at: and so thou shalt be constant to thyself, and confirmed in a steadfast course of well-doing.

Ver. 27.] From which do not suffer thyself to be drawn aside, either to superstition on the one hand, or to contempt or neglect of religion on the other: let neither love of friends, nor hatred of enemies, neither hope of pleasure and gain, nor fear of pain and damage, neither prosperous nor cross events, ever move thee to turn into either extreme from the rule of virtue: but, whatsoever inclination thou findest that way, do not proceed to commit the least sin against God, or against thy neighbour.
My son, attend unto my wisdom, and bow thine ear to my understanding;
2 That thou mayest regard discretion, and that thy lips may keep knowledge.
3 ¶ For the lips of a strange woman drop as an honeycomb, and her mouth is smoother than oil;
4 But her end is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two edged sword.
5 Her feet go down to death; her steps take hold on hell.

The principal things to be learnt in this chapter are, not to believe every thing to be good for us that pleases the flesh for the present (ver. 3, &c.), but in the beginning of any pleasure, to look to the end of it; to avoid the company of harlots; to use due care in the choice of a wife; to love her too much, rather than too little; to restrain ourselves from inordinate affection, by the consideration of God's omnipresence, &c.

The proverbial sayings are obvious in ver. 3, 4, 15: I shall only give an account of my translating ver. 11 [5] the "assembly of judges": for in many other places besides those quoted there in the paraphrase, it signifies the seventy elders or senators who judged the people: as in Josh. xx. 6, and Numb. xxviii. 21, where R. Solomon thus expounds "unews" 22 "all the congregation." And so truly it seems plainly in the original Numb. xv. 21, &c. where the sacrifice is different from that prescribed in Lev. iv. 13, &c. and therefore the sin was different, and the congregation for whom this was offered, were the representatives of the whole congregation: or, as they now speak, the great Sanhedrin.

Ver. 1.] I cannot too often awaken thine attention (whoever thou art that puttest thyself under my instruction; see ch. ii. i. iii. 1, 21, &c.), especially in things of such moment as I am going to treat of: and therefore I again beseech thee, both to mind diligently, and to consider what I take to be true wisdom, and more than ordinary prudence.

Ver. 2.] Which, if thou observest, it will make thee so circumstanced and discreetly cautious, that thou shalt not only be able to preserve thyself from the most subtle and dangerous deceits; but upon occasion, to advise others, and keep them from being cheated.

Ver. 3.] As too many are by the arts of a harlot, from whom thou oughtest to estrange thyself as much as if she were not of the commonwealth of Israel; for she pretending the greatest love, allureth experienced youth by her flattering speeches, and sweet voice, perhaps, and songs, wherewith she enchanteth them; and making them believe they shall taste nothing but the most delicious pleasures, her soft and smooth cuttelements slip down glibly into their unwary hearts which are taken with her.

Ver. 4.] But the beginning of this love is not so sweet, as the conclusion is bitter: and therefore think of both together, and believe what I now tell thee, without making a trial; that after a short pleasure follows long pain, by impairing men's health, strength, estates, and credit; which they cannot reflect upon without trouble and vexation, and (if she do not quite destroy their reason) be filled with remorse of conscience, and anguish of spirit: for, like a sword that cuts on both sides, she wounds both soul and body.

Ver. 5.] In short, leads those that follow her to an unlively, shamefu. and miserable end: to have never so little to do with her, is to approach to certain and inevitable destruction; not only here, but in another world.
6 Lest thou shouldst ponder the path of life, her ways are moveable, that thou canst not know them.

7 Hear me now therefore, O ye children, and depart not from the words of my mouth.

8 Remove thy way far from her, and come not nigh the door of her house:

9 Lest thou give thine honour unto others, and thy years unto the cruel:

10 Lest strangers be filled with thy wealth; and thy labours be in the house of a stranger;

11 And thou mourn at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed, 12 And say, How have I hated instruction, and my heart despaired reproof; and 13 Have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined mine ear to that which instructed me!

14 I was almost in all evil in the midst of the congregation and assembly.

15 ¶ Drink waters out of thine own cistern, and running waters out of thine own well.

16 Let thy fountains be dispersed abroad, and rivers of waters in the streets.

17 Let them be only thine own, and not strangers' with thee.

18 Let thy fountain be blessed: and rejoice with the wife of thy youth.

19 Let her be as the loving hind and pleasant roe; let her breasts satisfy thee at all times; and be thou ravished always with her love.

20 And why wilt thou, my son, be ravished formed me of the danger, and taught me how to escape it; but alas! I was so sottish as not to obey them; so contumacious, that I did not so much as consider what they said unto me.

Ver. 14.] But gave up myself to follow my lusts, which in a short time engaged me in almost all kind of wickedness: from which the reverence of no persons could restrain me: but openly, in the face of the most public and solemn assemblies of God's people, even before the magistrates and judges (Numb. xxv. 7, xxxv. 12), I boldly committed them. See Arg. [6].

Ver. 15.] Such are the fruitless means of a man that hath quite exhausted himself in those lewd courses; which show how much better it is to follow the advice and councels of the aged and wise, a wise wife of thine own enjoy the pleasures thou desirest, and be content with them alone; innocence, chastity, and pure pleasures; as much different from the other as the clear waters from a wholesome fountain are from those of a dirty lake or puddle.

Ver. 16.] Of whom thou mayest have a lawful issue, which thou needest not be ashamed to own; but openly produce and send them abroad, like streams from a spring, to serve the public good; nay, a numerous progeny may be derived from your happy society, and match into divers other honest families.

Ver. 17.] Children that acknowledge no other father, because they spring from one whom thou enjoyest (like beautiful creatures of like kind), Let it be, with her, as the sweetest companion: in whose embraces take such satisfaction, as to forget all other, and to be excessively transported with her as long as you live. See Arg. [7].

Ver. 18.] Happy shalt thou every way be with such a wife; whom I advise thee to take in thy youth, and avoiding those filthy cruel harlots (ver. 9), to solace them in thy own country: being taught by thy comforting thyself to her, never to admit any stranger to thy bed but to keep it solely unto thee.

Ver. 19.] Love her and cherish her, with a most tender affection; and let her always seem amiable in thy eyes: if thou wouldst recreate and disport thyself (as some are wont to do with young fawns, and other beautiful creatures of like kind), let it be, with her, as the sweetest companion: in whose embraces take such satisfaction, as to forget all other, and to be excessively transported with her as long as you live. See Arg. [7].

Ver. 20.] Consider, my son (ver. 1), what I say, and deny if thou canst, that it is an unaccountable folly to take an impure harlot (to whom thou oughtest to be as great a stranger, as to her religion) which thou mayest more fully, more pleasantly, securely, whom no man can hide his private actions, but he plays false to himself, whereby he doth, wherever he ments according as he behaves himself.

Ver. 22.] If he be a wicked fornicator or adulterer, for instance, let him not think to escape, because he is so cunning that nobody observes him, or so powerful that none can call him to account: for his own this, that he shall inevitably perish (ver. 5), because he refused to follow these instructions; and not only misses of being happy, but like men that wander from the right way, precipitate himself into unexpected ruin (ver. 9—11), because he was such an egregious fool, as to take no warning by all that could be said to him; but still to commit innumerable sins (ver. 13, 14), though he was told the many inconveniences, nay misfortunes, they would bring upon him.

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.—For the securing the peace and happiness of a married life (which the wise man had commended in the foregoing chapter), he here adds two cautions: one against selfishness, the other against sloth, which make great discontent in a family, by bringing it to poverty. He illustrates both by elegant similitudes; especially the latter, by the example of the ant: who borrows of none, and yet is not in danger to starve; laying up in store, by a notable industry, sufficient provision in due season against a time of need. Which is the great Lord Bacon [2] ingeniously applies (in the beginning of his sixth book of the Advancement of Learning) to the improvement of arts and sciences, by every one's bringing his grain. And in this business he defines the slothful to be; whose only care it is to live upon the main stock; but not to improve it by sowing the ground of sciences over again, and reaping a new harrest. This is the sum of the first eleven verses.

And upon this occasion he annexes the description of a deceitful knave (ver. 12, &c.), who cares not by what wicked arts he lives, when he is reduced to poverty: whose character he gives from his mouth, his eyes, feet, fingers, heart, and tongue. And after a septenary of verses (ver. 16, &c.), which he represents as most odious to God, he returns to his former argument, to give caution against uncleanness, especially adultery (ver. 20, 21, &c.), which,

as it is many times the effect of idleness, so he shows is the way to bring one to poverty; nay, to collapse one's life, or to bring inevitably upon him some other mischief; not only infamy, but the hated and revenge of that person who is wronged by the adulterer; who hereby puts himself into a worse condition than that of a thief. [6] They that would see the terrible effects of this jealousy fully and lively described, let them read St. Chrys-ostom's work, ch. 23, where he observes, among other things, that εἰ ἔστιν ἀδικίαν μῶν ἀνάλλολα καὶ ἰδιωτικά. &c. "this disease is wont to breed and bring forth, not only an intolerable heaviness of mind, but an insupportable rage;" and that such when thou art come into the hand of thy friend; go, humble thyself, and make sure thy friend.

4 Give not sleep to thine eyes, nor slumber to thine eyelids.
5 Deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler.
6 If Go to the ant, thou sluggard: consider her ways and be wise:

observation; distinguishing, in this manner, between the poverty that comes as a traveller, and the want that comes as an armed man: that the "shipwreck of fortune falls upon prodigals, or such as are careless of their estates, by insensible degrees of the first: with soft silent pages, like a traveller, and is hardly perceived: but soon after necessitie invades him, like an armed man; that is, presses upon him so closely, that he must needs waive his leisure, or else there is no resistance to be made." And thereupon he gives this prudent advice, to "prevent the traveller, and to be well provided against the armed man."

But it is sufficient to have noted this here (out of his eighth book of the Advancement of Learning, ch. 2, parab. 5), which they that please may make use of upon occasion. In my paraphrase I have waived this exact curiosity; because I observe the wise man generally repeats the same thing, in other words, without any such distinction.

[c] As for the phrase I spoke of, it is, ver. 31, where it is said a thief shall restore sevenfold (as we translate the word), when the law of Moses enjoins no such requisition, but much less (xxx. 4, 5); and there is no reason to think the law was altered in aftertimes. Therefore I have followed another use of the word schivetajim, which signifies not any determinate number, but only such as is perfect and complete in its kind; as may be seen Gen. iv. 13, 51; Ps. xii. 7; Isa. xxx. 26.

Ver. 1.] And now, my son (see ch. ii. 1, iii. 1, 17), that no difference may arise between thy wife and thee; be advised by me not to pass thy word rashly for the money which thy neighbour or friend borroweth of another: much less stand bound for a stranger, whose honesty or ability is unknown to thee.

Ver. 2.] By the poverty that cometh upon thee, and before thou art aware leaves thee as naked as if thou wast stripped by a highwayman; not, extreme want seizes on thee unavoidably, like an armed man which thou canst find no means to resist. See Arg. [7].

Ver. 3.] By which means thou mayest be tempted to become the worst of men, a perfect shark, void of all faith and honesty: whose mouth never speaks a word of truth: but makes it his business, by lies, or flatteries, or slanders, or perjuries, to maintain himself in his idle courses.

Ver. 13.] His very eyes are instruments of deceit or mischief; for he makes signs with them to his companions, when they are to play their pranks: or if that be too broad, he secretly tends upon their toes, or signifies his mind by the motion of his fingers; for every part of him is employed to make his wicked meaning understood.

Ver. 14.] How should it be otherwise, when his heart is a shop, furnished with nothing but all manner of perverse inclinations? which are perpetually at work to contrive some mischief or other: and (if they can do nothing else) by casting suspicion into men's minds, one of another, to stir up hatred, dissen-mischief continually; he soweth discord.

15 Therefore shall his calamity come suddenly; suddenly shall he be broken without remedy.
16 ¶ These six things doth the Lord hate: yea, seven are an abomination unto him:
17 A proud look, a lying tongue, and hands that shed innocent blood, 18 An heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, feet that be swift in running to mischief, 19 A false witness that speaketh lies, and he that soweth discord among brethren.
20 ¶ My son, keep thy father's commandment, and forsake not the law of thy mother:
21 Bind them continually upon thine heart, and tie them about thy neck.
22 When thou goest, it shall lead thee; when thou sleepest, it shall keep thee; and when thou awaketh, it shall talk with thee.

sion, strife, brawlings, law-suits, and all manner of discord; which is the destruction of families and kingdoms.

Ver. 15.] And shall prove his own utter ruin: which, for this very cause, shall, sooner than he thinks of, in a terrible manner, come upon him; when he functions he hath carried his matters so cunningly, that nobody discerns his villany, he shall on a sudden be looked upon as the worst of mankind, and, like a vessel broken into little bits, be incurably undone.

Ver. 16.] For, among offences of this kind, nothing is more odious to the Lord (who is the dispenser of recompenses and punishments,) than nothing more opposite to the divine nature, and which he more severely punishes, than these six or seven things; which are commonly found in loose companions, such as I have now described:

Ver. 17.] First, pride and haughtiness of spirit; which, swelling a man with a vain opinion of himself, makes him condemn all others, and overlook them as below his notice. Secondly, falsehood or treachery; which stick not at any lies, or flatteries, or calumnies. And thirdly, a violent, cruel disposition; which makes a man rather imbrue his hands in the blood even of an innocent person, than not have him removed, who stands in the way of his designs.

Ver. 18.] To run to the fountain of all these, and of those that follow; a mind that thinks nothing but how, by fraud or force (though never so injurious to others), to satisfy some desire of pleasure, covetousness, or revenge; which produces three other abominable vices. First, forwardness to execute such mischievous intentions and desires cheerfully, without any check or delay:

Ver. 19.] Secondly, an atheistical impudence, which makes a man in open court (when he is upon his oath) testify any falsehood against his neighbour; and lastly, such malicious envy as loves to make the dearest friends fall out; and takes pleasure to see those at variance, who ought to be most closely united in brotherly affection.

Ver. 20.] And here, my son, I must remember thee of what I said in the beginning (ch. i. 8) about a reverend regard unto thy parents; especially when they warn thee against such wickednesses as these: do not make light of their admonitions; but observe the precepts of thy father, and let thy mother's command be a law to thee (see ch. i. 8).

Ver. 21.] Fix them in thy mind, and link thy affections so fast to them, that they may not only be continually before thine eyes; but seem the greatest ornament to all thy words and actions, when they are ordered by their directions.

Ver. 22.] Thou wilt find the benefit of giving early entertainment to such good counsel from thy parents, in every passage of thy whole life: for when thou goest about any business, it will guide thee to do it honestly and successfully; when thou liest down to sleep, it will make thee rest secure of the guardianship of the divine providence over thee; and when thou awaketh in the morning, suggest to thy thoughts how thou oughtest to behave thyself at home and abroad.

Ver. 23.] In the darkest times, and the most dubious cases, it will both direct and comfort thee; for every particular commandment of God (which they teach thee) is like a candle; and the whole law is like the light of the sun; to show thee thy way, and to exhilarate thy spirits, while thou walkest in it: may, the severest reproofs, which correct thy errors, and reduce thee to obedience, are the way to the greatest happiness.

Ver. 24.] As those instructions and reproofs, for instance, ought to be accounted, which preserve thee from being deluded by the flattering speeches and endearments of a lewd woman; from whom thou oughtest perfectly to estrange thyself, as from a sink of all wickedness.

Ver. 25.] Let me advise thee again (though I have done it oft. ii. 16, v. 3, 4, &c.), not to gaze upon her beauty, or upon her fine attire; but suppress the very first desire, which a glance of her may have kindled in thy heart; do not consent to pursue it in the least; much less suffer thyself to be caught in the nets of her wanton eyes, and thereby drawn into her dangerous embraces. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 26.] For such is the cunning of a harlot, that having got a silly youth into her toils, she will hardly let him go, till she have reduced him to the extremest beggary; and if she be another man's wife, a train is laid for that which is more precious by far than all the treasures he hath spent, viz. his dearest life; which he foolishly loses for the short pleasure of a sinful lust.

Ver. 27.] He may think, perhaps, to enjoy his pleasure so privately, that none shall know it; but that is as unlikely, as that a man should take fire secretly into his bosom, and so conceal it that it shall not break out and burn his clothes.

Ver. 28.] Who ever heard that fire will do no hurt, because it is closely lodged? or that anybody ever walked barefoot upon red-hot coals, and his feet escaped from being burnt?
31 But if he be found, he shall restore sevenfold; he shall give all the substance of his house. 32 But whoso committeth adultery with a woman lacketh understanding: he that doeth it destroyeth his own soul. 33 A wound and dishonour shall he get; and his reproach shall not be wiped away.

Ver. 29.] Even so it is sittish folly to imagine that a man shall suffer nothing, who lies with his neighbour's wife: let him be who he will that com- mits that crime, he shall not escape unpunished.

Ver. 30.] For he is not a common thief, who only steals a man's goods, and that perhaps out of extreme necessity, merely to satisfy his hungry appetite, which he knows not otherwise how to fill: such a one we are apt to pity, and do not expose him to shame, by whipping him, and laying stripes upon his back.

Ver. 31.] But when he is found out, he shall only make as complete a restitution (Ps. lxxxix. 12) as the law requires (Exod. xxii. 1, &c.), though that perhaps may be no less than all that he is worth. See Arg. [2].

Ver. 32.] But the adulterer robs a man of his wife without any such necessity, there being other and honest ways to satisfy his desires; and therefore hath no excuse, but must be looked upon as a stupid fool, void of common understanding; and when he is found out, be punished, not merely in his estate, but with the loss of his life (Lev. xx. 10).

Chapter VII.

1 My son, keep my words, and lay up my commandments with thee.

2 Keep my commandments, and live; and my law as the apple of thine eye.

Mon here sets before him, to divest him from such wicked courses. Particularly the character of these level women is to be studied; who are then most abominable, when they put on the mask of piety and devotion. As this strumpet doth (ver. 11), in her speech which she makes to the young man; where there are two things in my paraphrase, of which I owe some account to the reader.

[7] The one is in the beginning of it (ver. 11). Where I have taken schelamin, peace-offerings, of which there were three sorts (Lev. vii. 11, 12, 15), for the last of them, offerings of thanksgiving for blessings already obtained; not of prayer for the impetration of blessings from God (as Grotius and others understand the word) not yet received: my reason is, because she was so solicitous to have company at her feast upon this sacrifice that very day. Everybody knows that such sacrifices were to be of the best, either of bullocks, or sheep, or goats (Lev. iii. 1, 6, 19), and that the greatest part of them fell to the share of the person who offered them, that he might feast with God: that is, all except the fat upon the breast and rump of the sheep, and the breast and right shoulder; which was sufficient to make a liberal entertainment for his friends. But this is not so commonly observed, that though they might keep this flesh two days, before it was all spent, because there was such plenty of it, yet that is to be understood only of the first two sorts of peace-offerings; of thank-offerings; not of the eucharistical, or thank-offerings: which, as Philo observes, were to be eaten the very same day they were offered; "that they who had readily received favours from God, might as readily, and without delay, communicate to others. Which is the account Abarbanel also gives of this matter: and it is observable, that all sorts of bread were to be joined
CHAPTER VII.

3 Bind them upon thy fingers, write them upon the table of thine heart.

4 Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister; and call understanding thy kinswoman:

5 That they may keep thee from the strange woman, from the stranger which flattereth her words.

6 ¶ For at the window of my house I looked through my casement,

7 And beheld among the simple ones, I discerned among the youths, a young man void of understanding:

8 Passing through the street near her corner; and he went the way to her house, with this sacrifice, that every thing might be ready for the feast.

[6] The other thing is at the latter end of her speech (ver. 20), where by the word because I understand the full moon, as the Vulgar Latin doth. With which translation interpreters and fault, because it looks like a contradiction, they say, to call that doth belong in this verse to which signifies the moon to be covered; and therefore they translate it rather the new moon, as we do in the margin of our bibles. But they that can consult Lud. De Dieu upon Ps. Ixxxi. 3, will find good reason to take it quite otherwise; for the full moon, which giving light then till the night, made it a fit time for a journey, either in winter (as by the darkness of the night, ver. 9, I suppose it might now be) when the days are short; or in summer when the heat made them unfit for travel.

The proverbial sayings in this chapter, some make three, others four; all contained in two verses, 22, 23. With which I shall not trouble the reader; because I have made them plain enough in the paraphrase; and intend not to fill this book with like sayings out of other authors.

[6] I should only add, that rabbin in the last verse but one, signifying great men as well as nayni, I have expressed both: and Solomon himself, as well as Samson, became an example of the mighty men there mentioned, who were undone by lewd women.

Ver. 1. There is greatness, my son (Prov. ii. 1), to repeat the caution I have often given thee, against this and other vices: and to beseech thee to observe my instructions, and to lay up my commandments in such fruitful remembrance, that they may not fail to produce the fruit of obedience.

Ver. 2. For if thou wilt be ruled by them, assure thyself (as I have said before, iv. 4), thou shalt enjoy long happiness: therefore observe them carefully with a tender affection to them; and, looking upon them as thy safest guide and director, consent as soon to wound the apple of thine eye, as in the least to violate any of my laws.

Ver. 3. Do not merely read what I write, imagining thou canst have continual recourse to them here in this book; but be well acquainted with them, as to have them (as we speak) at thy fingers' ends; or rather, let them be transcribed from hence into thy very heart.

Ver. 4. There embrace them with ardent love; and set such a high esteem on wisdom, that thou mayest invite it more and more unto thee; till it be as familiar with thee as an only sister, born at the same time with thee; and thou understand and delight in all her precepts, as so near akin to thee that thou find them to be the very reason and sense of thy own mind.

Ver. 5. Which will be a powerful preservative to 9 In the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night:

10 And, behold, there met him a woman with the attire of an harlot, and subtill of heart.

11 (She is loud and stubborn; her feet abide not in her house:

12 Now is she without, now in the streets, and lieth in wait at every corner,)

13 So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face said unto him, 14 I have peace offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows.

15 Therefore came I forth to meet thee, diligently to seek thy face, and I have found thee, from the snares of the naughty woman: who, though her company be so pernicious, that God would have thee perfectly estranged from her, as if she were not of the commonwealth of Israel, yet hath powerful charms about her, to flatter those into her embraces who are not heartily in love with wisdom.

Ver. 6.] Of which a memorable instance comes now into my memory: saith the LORD, thou shalt be like one day from my chamber, through the lattices of the window of my palace.

Ver. 7.] I observed among the undisciplined and unexperienced striplings of the city, one that was as childish and void of consideration as he was youthful and eager in his desires:

Ver. 8.] Who, as if he had a mind to be undone, passed idly through the street, till he came to a corner, where naughty women used to haunt; walking in as stately a manner as he could devise, directly towards one of their houses.

Ver. 9.] It was in the twilight, while he might see his way, and yet hope to be concealed: in the close of the day; which was followed by a night as dark as pitch, and fit for such works of darkness.

Ver. 10.] There, on a sudden, I was surprised with the sight of a woman starting forth: who did not stay till he came up to her, but went to meet him in a gaudy lascivious dress, apt to allure a weak young man: who thought presently she was in love with him; when her heart, as full of subtility as his was of folly, is reserved only to herself.

Ver. 11.] This is her character: she is full of talk, and of bold unseemly courtship; unruly, and not to be controlled or broke of her will; idle also, and always gadding abroad, as if she had no business (but with her foolish lovers) at home.

Ver. 12.] Strongly does she stand before her door; and, if that will not do, she goes farther into the streets and places of greatest concourse; and more especially, waits at every corner (where she may look into two streets at once) to ensnare such as are apt, like silly birds, to be taken by her.

Ver. 13.] At one of those corners (as I said) she met this young fool; and, contrary to all the rules of modesty, caught him hard about the neck and kissed him: and after these amorous caresses put on still a bolder face, and, without any blushing, made this following speech to him:

Ver. 14.] I am a happy woman, in many blessings that God hath bestowed upon me, for which I have given him solemn thanks this very day: and, as religion and custom bid me, I have provided as good a feast as those sacrifices would afford, which I formerly vowed, and now have paid; having no want of any thing, but of some good company at home to rejoice with me. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 15.] Which made me go abroad to try if I could meet with thee (who art the very person whom I came to seek), that I might invite and earnestly beseech thee to be so kind as to bear me company:
16 I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt.
17 I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon.
18 Come, let us take our fill of love until the morning; let us solace ourselves with loves.
19 For the good man is not at home; he is gone a long journey:
20 He hath taken a bag of money with him, and will come home at the day appointed.
21 With her much fair speech she caused him to yield, with the flattering of her lips she forced him.

and, to my great joy, this is added to all my other happiness, that I have found thee speedily and most ophatic:

Ver. 16.] There shall no other pleasures be wanting when our feast is done; but from the table we will remove to my bed; which I have richly adorned with every thing that may please the eye; and made it soft also as heart can wish.

Ver. 17.] Where thou shalt be entertained likewise with the sweetest perfumes, that ours, or the neighboring chambers might not make myriah, aloes, and cinnamon; wherewith I have sprinkled my bed, to render it more grateful to thy senses.

Ver. 18.] Why do we waste our time then here in the street! I come along with me, and let us go thither; and there satisfy our desires to the full with love: we will solace ourselves with the sweetest pleasures; which shall not end till the morning-light.

Ver. 19.] For there is no fear we shall be interrupted or disturbed; the man (whom they call my husband) being from home, and not likely to return in haste; for he is gone to a place a great way off.

Ver. 20.] Where he hath much business to desploit; which will detain him so long that I am sure it will be full moon (and now the new dotli scarce yet appear, ver. 9) before he can be at home again.

See Arg. [V.]

Ver. 21.] In the representation of these, and many other like specious pretences (of great affection to him, of all sorts of pleasure, of secrecy, and safety in their enjoyments), she showed herself such a mistress of her art, that she bow'd the heart of the young man to become her disciple: and, having wrought upon his inclinations, she pursued her advantage with so much cunning, that she rather compelled than attracted him by her charming voice, and her soft altering language.

Ver. 22.] For he made not the least objection, but away he went immediately, and followed her like a great calf (as we speak in our language), or a stupid ox; that fancies he is led to the pasture, when he is going to be killed; or like a fool, who takes it for an ornament, when the stocks are brought for his correction, to be clapped upon his legs.

Ver. 23.] He goeth after her straightway, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks;

23 Till a dart strike through his liver; as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life.

24 ¶ Hearken unto me now, therefore, O ye children, and attend to the words of my mouth.

25 Let not thine heart decline to her ways, go not astray in her paths.

26 For she hath cast down many wounded: yea, many strong men have been slain by her.

27 Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

1 Doth not wisdom cry? and understanding put forth her voice?

proceeds in his design, by appealing to all that read those things, whether they be not sufficiently cautioned against those courses which ruin them; and abundant care be not taken to make them really wise and happy. For he knew none could answer those questions negatively, which he asks upon it: but take wisdom here, as it signifies in other places of this book, and hath been hitherto described. Whom Solomon now celebrates for her most venerable antiquity (as Aristotle ob- serves to Ptolemy, in Eusebius’s Prepar. Evangel. lib. xiii. p. 607), and introduces, like a most beau- tiful person, no less than a queen; or rather some divine being (infinitely to be preferred before that base strumpet spoken of in the foregoing chapter). Who having finished her own praises, which, the truth is, better agree to that heavenly doctrine after- ward delivered by our Lord Jesus Christ (who was the wisdom of the Father, both as the eternal APOCO subsisting with him before all worlds; and, as he was anointed by the Holy Ghost to declare to us all the counsel of God), concludes with an ear- nest invitation unto all to become acquainted with her instructions, if they meant to be happy, and would avoid the greatest miseries (ver. 32, 33, &c.).

There are so many notable lessons to be learnt out of this chapter, that it would make this preface too long; if I should mention them all. I shall there- fore name only one doctrinal point: that if this chapter be at all to be understood of the divinity of the Son of God (which the Arians believed), then both his eternity is most plainly here asserted, and also his divinity, which appears (I ver. 22, 30). And these two practicals: first, that it is a vain pretence we make to wisdom, if the fear of God and true virtue be wanting (ver. 13, 20); and, secondly, the whole chapter supposes what the last verse more particularly expresses, that every man’s death and destruction are from himself; who wrongs his own soul; and that against the de- sire and earnest frequent importunities of the wis- dom of God: unto which he will not hearken; but perversely rejects the reasonable reproofs and the wholesome advices, which, on many occasions, he meets withal, to prevent his ruin.

They that follow the Vulgar Latin fancy they find a proverb, trans sms sed guever, ver. 14. By which that we translate a froward mouth, they translate a mouth with two tongues: but I have followed the Hebrew, which speaks of a worse sort of perverseness than that phrase alone signifies.

Ver. 1.] Can you then hereafter pretend ignorance, and say you never had any caution given you against these snares? Or rather, have I not the greatest rea- son to chide you for your stupidity in hearkening unto those secret allusions to the deeds of darkness, when their shamefulness is so apparent! and you have had so many open and loud admonitions given you to be wiser: and such serious and earnest en- deavours have been used, by repeated instructions and reproofs, to reclaim you from your folly!

Ver. 2.] There is no public erit better heard and understood by all, when from a high place he makes proclamation to the people, than the rules of wisdom and virtue are: which do not lie concealed, nor can be altered at our pleasure: but present themselves continually to man’s thoughts whithersoever they go, being as plain as the highway, and remaining unmove- able and fixed notwithstanding all the attempts have been made to subvert them.

Ver. 3.] Let their business be what it will, whether in the courts of judgment, or among those that traffic in the city, or in their own private habitation, still they know what their duty is: which their own con- science, as well as God’s ministers, rings so con-
5 O ye simple, understand wisdom: and ye fools, be ye of an understanding heart.
6 Hear; for I will speak of excellent things; and the opening of my lips shall be right things.
7 For my mouth shall speak truth; and wickedness is an abomination to my lips.
8 All the words of my mouth are in righteousness; there is nothing froward or perverse in them.
9 They are all plain to him that understandeth, and right to them that find knowledge.
10 Receive my instruction, and not silver; and knowledge rather than choice gold.
11 For wisdom is better than rubies; and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it.

...continually in their cars, that they cannot avoid such informations.

Ver. 4.] Which they hear as plainly and distinctly as if wisdom itself should call to them from above, saying, Hearken, O men, of whatsoever rank and condition you be; whether high or low, rich or poor; for my instructions are common to you all.

Ver. 5.] Your fault is, that you are inconsiderate, and easily cheated (vii. 21, 22); or, which is worse, stupidly bent to follow your sensual appetite; as if you had no better inclinations: but if you will attend, I will make you more circumspect and wary; and dispose you to be led by prudent counsels.

Ver. 6.] Do not turn away your cars, but listen to my words; for I will teach you things most worthy of your notice and choice; which will conduct you safely in all the passages of your life; and lay before you such a plain, direct, and easy path, that if you walk in it you shall not miss of being happy.

Ver. 7.] For I will utter nothing rashly, or contrary to the truth; all falsehood, deceit, and whatsoever may do hurt, being so detestable to me, and so far from my thoughts, that the correction of such wickedness is the aim of my discourse.

Ver. 8.] Every word of which is exactly conformable to the rule of righteousness; there is nothing I enjoin but what is wholesome to the hearer and perplex you, or to abridge of your just liberty, much less to misguide and pervert you in the pursuit of what is good for you.

Ver. 9.] But whatsoever they may seem to inconsiderate and prejudiced minds, they will all manifestly appear equal and just unto him that uses his reason; and approve themselves, as I said, exactly conformable to the strictest rules of righteousness, unto well-disposed minds, who will be at the pains to know the difference between right and wrong, or between that which is good and that which is evil for them.

Ver. 10.] They will not think me unreasonable, when I command the very rebukes which I give them (though administrated by some sharp affliction, iii. 14), and set such a high price upon them, as to advise every one to accept them rather than silver; and to value the knowledge of God, and of themselves; and of all things else (which these corrections teach them), above the choicest gold.

Ver. 11.] For true wisdom is such an inestimable jewel, that the most precious pearls are trash to it; nor can our boundless fancies present any thing to our wishes, that is worthy to come in competition with it.

Ver. 12.] For what is there comparable to a prudent mind, which is not crafty to deceive, but so cautious as not to be deceived? And this I may boast is solely in my power to endow men withal; who ever give the safest, nay, infallible advices, and are disposed to discreet resolutions in the most difficult cases, than the subtlest head in the world, that consults not with me, can invent for his clients.

Ver. 13.] And my rules are as short as they are sure: for I teach men, in the first place, religiously to worship and stand in awe of the divine majesty; which is but a vain pretence; I further instruct them, that if they do not make them abominate all manner of evil, though but in design; more particularly, I hate that vain opinion men have of their own abilities to compass their designs, which makes them forget God, and despise the wholesome advice of honest men: as I likewise do the use of all unlawful means, though the end be good; especially lying, calumny, detraction, breach of faith, which every one must renounce who will have my friendship.

Ver. 14.] Who are the ablest counsellor in all deliberations; and give men the most certain, solid, and never-failing advice, for the effecting their desires, or being contented with disappointments: for I comprehend whatsoever is fit to be done or omitted in all undertakings: hence God, also with courage to persist in good resolutions, which are neither rashly taken, nor wrongfully pursued.

Ver. 15.] Kings themselves sit not fast on their thrones, though placed there by God himself, unless they be ruled by me: the wisest senators cannot support themselves and them, but by persuading them to enact and execute merciful laws for the government of their people.

Ver. 16.] In vain do their great captains, or other ministers, endeavour to defend them, but under the conduct and protection of my virtuous discipline: nobles and all the judges of the land lose their authority, if they do not faithfully observe the rules that I prescribe them.

Ver. 17.] Which are no less amiable than they are easily known: there needing no more to come acquainted with me, but only to love me: for they that love me are beloved of me; and as they will not fail to seek what they love, so they shall certainly find what they studiously seek.

Ver. 18.] And together with me, they shall find such riches and honour, as shall add to the greatness, and splendour, and stability, of their kingdoms and dignities; for not merely riches and honour are in my donation, but durable possessions; which will last the longer, because they are not gotten either by 20 I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment:
21 That I may cause those that love me to inherit substance; and I will fill their treasures.
22 The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old.
23 I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was.
24 When there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water.
25 Before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth:
26 While as yet he had not made the earth, nor the fields, nor the highest part of the dust of the world.
27 When he prepared the heavens, I was there: when he set a compass upon the face of the depth:

oppression, or by nigardice; for I teach men both to do justly, and to love mercy also (Dan. iv. 34).
Ver. 19.] Whereby I bring them in greater treasures than gold, that never so many, never so refined: a revenue of higher value than the purest and choicest silver in the world.
Ver. 20.] For I set their minds and hearts aright, and enrich them with excellent thoughts; which teach them how to use those earthly goods, and govern themselves with such exactness in all their private transactions or public administrations, as never to swerve from the steady rules of justice and equity.
Ver. 21.] In order to their happy settlement in a state of eternal peace and substantial satisfaction, which I confer on all those that sincerely love and adhere unto me; whose souls I will fill as full with abundance of inestimable riches, as their treasures are with silver and gold, and all other stores.
Ver. 22.] For the Lord himself hath no greater riches than me, who lead men to a participation of him, and communion with him (iii. 19, 20), with whom I was ever present (as well as always most dear unto him), not only when he began to create this world, but before he had made any of his works; when, as there was nothing but himself.
Ver. 23.] My sovereignty and dominion is from everlasting; and hath no superior to it: all antiquity comes infinitely short of mine; who was before the earth itself, the common mother of all mankind (Gen. i. 1).
Ver. 24.] When, as yet, there were no depths (Gen. i. 2), I was conceived in the mind of God long before the sources and springs: whose excellent waters, which are of greater value than any other, owe their rise unto me, the inexhausted fountain of all things.
Ver. 25.] Who had a being before the mountains, from whence those waters run, were settled; or there was so much as a hillock to be seen in the earth.
Ver. 26.] For as yet the Lord had not made the earth itself (as I said before, ver. 23), much less adorned it, and put it into this form of lofty mountains and spacious plains: no, there was not so much as the first atom of this globe wherein you tread.
Ver. 27.] But why do I speak of the earth alone? I was present when he disposed the heavens into this wonderful order, wherein we beheld them, as well as when he moved upon that confused abyss which they enclosed, and fashioned the earth into a regular shape.

28 When he established the clouds above: when he strengthened the fountains of the deep:
29 When he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment: when he appointed the foundations of the earth:
30 Then I was by him, as one brought up with him: and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him;
31 Rejoicing in the habitable part of his earth; and my delights were with the sons of men.
32 Now therefore hearken unto me, O ye children: for blessed are they that keep my ways.
33 Hear instruction, and be wise, and refuse it not.
34 Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors.

Ver. 28.] When he made the watery clouds also, with admirable wisdom, so firm in the air, that they shall not fall down altogether, but by drops upon the earth: and provided strong cisterns for the waters, which he set up there; from whence they rush out forcibly, and yet wear not away the passages he hath opened for them.
Ver. 29.] When he prescribed also to the sea its limits, that the waters thereof (though they swell and toss up and down) shall not pass over the shores wherein he hath confounded them: and when he settled the earth so steadfastly, like a building upon sure foundations, that it remains unmovable in the place he appointed for it:
Ver. 30.] Then was I with him, nay, very near unto him; contriving all these things: nor had he any higher pleasure than me, who, day by day, during the creation of the world, produced some lovely work or other: in which he rejoiced, to see how good and agreeable they were (Gen. i. 4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31).
Ver. 31.] More particularly, I displayed my skill in the vast variety of creatures, wherewith I have beautified this earth wherein you dwell; which afford a most delightful spectacle unto me, and unto all wise observers: who may see, that, above all the rest, my principal thoughts were fixed upon the children of men (Gen. i. 26), in whom I delighted exceedingly (as the Lord doth in me, ver. 30); beholding them made in the image of God, and, after his likeness, capable to converse with me.
Ver. 32.] Who may therefore justly expect (all these things considered) that you should cheerfully embrace my repeated counsels; and, as dutiful children, take the greatest pleasure in being obedient to them: for blessed, you cannot but see, blessed, beyond all expression, are they who observe (as all other creatures do) the laws that I have prescribed them.
Ver. 33.] Hearken, I beseech you, and yield to the voice of your own reason, and of God's holy word and spirit; which checks the irregular motions which you find at any time in you; and be so wise and considerate as not to slight and reject it.
Ver. 34.] But rather invite such instructions, by giving them thankful entertainment, and going thither where you may meet with them: for happy, more happy than can be expressed, is that man, who not only hearkens obediently when he is told his duty, but makes it his business to be rightly informed;
PROVERBS.

35 For whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord.

36 But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death.

CHAPTER IX.

1 Wisdom hath builded her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars:

CHAP. IX.

Argument.—In this chapter the wise man seems to me to illustrate more fully what he had delivered in the conclusion of the foregoing (ver. 32, 34, 35), concerning the satisfaction and happiness they might expect to feel, who would attend to the precepts, and submit themselves to the government, of that heavenly wisdom; which he had described to be acquainted with the secrets of the Almighty, and which he here again represents as a glorious queen, the daughter of heaven, adorned with all perfection (and the therefore uses a word of the general number, vol. 1, whereby to express her ex- cellences), living in a stately palace; unto which she invites all misguided souls, and promises them, if they will forsake their follies, the most delicious entertainment.

[6] Which is set forth under the notion of a feast, whereby the holy writers are wont to express (as the aptest resemblance of it that can be found) the high satisfaction, joy, and pleasure, which the principles of wisdom and virtue fill our hearts withal; when we have a true relish of them that we embrace them and digest them, and are enlivened by them to a pious life.

This is the substance of the parable; every part of which is not to be minutely scanned; nor shall I go about to say what is particularly meant by the seven pillars of wisdom’s house (though taking her house for the world, the seven pillars may well be thought the seven planets), what by her meat, what by her drink, &c. but look upon them only as a description of the ability of wisdom to impart complete satisfaction unto those that entertain her precepts. Which were principally taught in the schools of the prophets; whose business it was to instuct the people (as the scribes did afterward in the law of God; and being dispersed in several places of the country, I have conjectured their schools might be the house here spoken of, where wisdom had her habitation. I cannot say certainly how many of them there were, much less that there were just seven principal schools, which might be looked upon as the main supporters of religion and virtue: but there were more than one it is evident from the sacred history; where, in one city (1 Sam. ix. 13, 14), we find Samuel seated (in whose times these schools began to flourish); who, no doubt, how many of them there were, much less that there were just seven principal schools, which might be looked upon as the main supporters of religion and virtue: but there were more than one it is evident from the sacred history; where, in one city (1 Sam. ix. 13, 14), we find Samuel seated (in whose times these schools began to flourish); who, no doubt, afterward, we find, at Ramah (S ix. 20): and in another place called the hill of God, where the Philistines had a garrison, we meet with another company of prophets (1 Sam. x. 5, 10). And in.

2 She hath killed her beasts; she hath mingled her wine; she hath also furnished her table.

aftertimes there were sons of the prophets both at Bethel (where they seem to have been more an ciently, ver. 3,) and at Jericho (2 Kings ii. 3, 5), and at Gilgal (iv. 35).

These schools also were seated in high places, it appears from i Sam. iv. 6, 7, 10, 14, 2 Kings i. 9 (and may be meant in Jer. lii. 33, 34, 35). which agrees exactly with what is said here of wisdom’s crying upon the highest places of the city (ver. 3), to call all those who had an appetite to come and partake of her instructions. Which there was some hope all those might do, who were merely inconsistent and deluded (ver. 4), though scorners (as those called the prophets madmen) are so incapable of correction, that nothing will move them to become better: and therefore she passes them by, and leaves them to their beastly folly; which inclines them rather to listen to the enticements of such filthy strumpets as he had described, ch. vii.

Against whom there cannot be too much caution, the strumpet’s house being, as St. Chrysostom (Hom. ii. upon Matt.), calls it, the very shop of the devil; and therefore the wise man again gives her character in this chapter (ver. 13, 14, &c.), and represents the danger of being drawn in by her; that, if it was possible, he might make men sensible there is nothing more inconsistent with wisdom, than to give up themselves to those impure lusts, which have been the ruin of all those that have been led by them.

That is one of the profitable lessons to be learnt from this chapter, in which the wise man concludes his preface to the book of Proverbs. And therefore again repeats once more (ver. 10), that first principle upon which all religion is built; wherewith he began this preface (i. 7), “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.” Which they that want will be apt to make a laughter of all good instructions; and it is well if they be not angry at those who are so kind as to reprove them. If they be, it is best to let them alone, and not cast pearls before swine; as our Saviour teaches (v. 24), agreeable to the doctrine of the wise man, ver. 7—9, of this chapter.

Where the Lord Bacon (lib. viii. Advanc. of Learning, cap. 2, parah. 9) is very curious, and distinguishes between a scorrer and a wicked man (mentioned ver. 7), and between shame or reproach, and a blot: and consequently, between reproof given to the one and the other; “For a scorrer (saith he) only makes us lose our labour; but the other repays us with a stain and dishonour. When a man instructs a scorrer, his time indeed which he thus employs is thrown away, and others derive CHAPTER IX.

3. She hath sent forth her maidens: she crieth upon the highest places of the city.

4. Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither: as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith to him,

5. Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled.

6. Forsake the foolish, and live; and go in the way of understanding.

his pains, as a labour ill-placed: and the scorner himself also despiseth the knowledge which he is taught. Thus a man is put to shame. But the matter is transacted with greater danger in the rep-rehension of the other, because a wicked nature not only gives no ear to advice, but turns head against his reprehender, now made odious to him: whom be either wounds presently with contumelies, before his face, or traduceth after to others behind his back.

But doubt we not been thus nice in my paraphrase, because it is the manner. I observe, of the wise man to repeat the same thing in the same verse, in other words, throughout all this book: and a scorner signifies the worst of men.

(J) In the ninth verse also the same great person, following the Vulgar, and reading the words thus, "give occasion to a wise man"; and his wisdom will be increased," makes this witty observation (in the same ch. parab. 32), that "an occasion when it is offered, shows the difference between wisdom that is ripened into habit, and that which swims only in the brain and conceit, or is boasted in speech, but hath not taken deep root. For the former upon occasion, while it is expected, it may be exercised, the latter instantly quickened, addresses itself to the business, and is so enlarged and dilated, that it seems greater than itself: but the other, which, before occasion, was brisk and busy, now occasion is given, becomes amazed and confused: so that even he who presumed himself possessed of it, begins to be in doubt whether his preconceptions of such wisdom were not mere dreams and empty speculations."

But there being no such word as occasion in the original, and the word give seeming to me rather to refer to what the wise man is speaking of, viz. reproof or instruction, I have waived this observation; which will do well alone, but not be connected with the context, when you take it to represent. And here note this as a mark of a hopeful person, that is likely to become wise, if he be not galled with reproof, at which fools are wont to kick. This is a truth to be considered most seriously, by which every man may take a measure of himself, whether he be likely to come to good or not: if he cannot endure to be told of his faults, it is a shield! sign he is in the way to be undone; and hath not as yet so much as approached to the gates of wisdom.

Which admonishes us here of another great fault of mankind, (2) who are most eager after that which is prohibited to them. An observation which is as true of their fondness and readiness to embrace heretical doctrines (to which the fathers apply ver. 17), if they be preached in a corner, and made a great secret; as of their appetite after those pleasures, from which they are restrained, and cannot have with public approbation.

Ver. 1.] Do not imagine that I commend unto you some manner piece of knowledge or skill, but the most absolute and accomplished wisdom: whose worth and dignity are inexpresse: for, as this great

7. He that reproueth a scorner getheth to himself shame: and he that rebuketh a wicked man getteth himself a blot.

8. Reprove not a scorner, lest he hate thee: rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee.

9. Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser: teach a just man, and he will increase in learning.

10. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of world, I told you (viii. 26, 37, &c.), was built by wisdom in most excellent order and perfect beauty, so from every part of it we may learn what regard we ought to have to her holy precepts; which are taught everywhere, but especially in the schools of the prophets. See Arg. [a] [d] [p].

Ver. 2.] There, above all other places, a most plentiful provision is made for all hungry and thirsty souls (that are desirous to know what is good for themselves), who shall find no less life, and vigour, and strength, and inspiration in the contemplation of her sacred instructions, than the body doth when it partakes of a liberal and most delicious feast.

Ver. 3.] For nothing is wanting there, but only guests to accept of her entertainment; unto which her attendants and ministers (persons of uncorrupted purity and sincerity) are sent to invite you, with a loud voice and earnest entreaties, which cannot but be heard by whole cities and countries, unto whom the dwelling-places of wisdom and the food of souls lie openly exposed. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 4.] There is no man so silly but he may be welcome to it; or rather all such persons are desired to bethink themselves, how inconsiderately they have been seduced; and may be exercised, the foolish desires so long as to take advice of her. Let a man be never so much besotted with vice and wickedness, she doth not reject him, nor despair of him; if he will but hearken when she makes this gracious motion to the whole knot of them;

Ver. 5.] Draw near, consider, and lay to heart, the wholesome instructions which I propound to you; credit me so far as to rely upon the promise which I make you of the highest comfort, pleasure, and satisfaction, in embracing and obeying my precepts.

Ver. 6.] Do but make a trial, by forsaking all ill company, and those childish desires and senseless courses of which you cannot give an account to yourselves; and immediately, you shall have a taste of happiness, which will invite you to perfect it, by following hereafter the deliberate dictates of sober reason, and the grave counsels of prudent persons, who have discerning minds, and practise themselves what they commend to others.

Ver. 7.] As for those that deride religion, and scoff at all good admonitions, it is in vain to meddle with them; for reproofs are fittest for such persons: and he who performs that charitable office, not only loses his labour, but is like to be requited with reproaches; whosoever he be that rebukes one of those impious wretches, hath commonly all the dirt thrown upon him that his malice can rake together. See Arg. [d] [e].

Ver. 8.] Therefore men of that wicked temper wisdom doth not invite to her instructions, nor require her ministers to call upon them; but rather to pass them by, when they find by experience that they can do no good to such persons, but only draw their hatred upon themselves: from such it is wisdom to turn away, and bestow reproofs upon those who have so much understanding, as to see God's ministers intend their good, and accordingly thank them for it, and give them opportunity to do them farther service.
wisdom: and the knowledge of the holy is understanding.
11 For by me thy days shall be multiplied, and the years of thy life shall be increased.
12 If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself: but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it.
13 A foolish woman is clamorous: she is simple, and knoweth nothing.
14 For she sitteth at the door of her house, on a seat in the high places of the city,

Ver. 9.] For this is an undoubted maxim, that a man disposed to learn will grow wiser even by reprehensive; and the instructions given to a man inclined to goodness, will make him better, and much improve him: not only in knowledge, but in the practice of virtue (wheresoever a sinner grows worse by endeavours to reform him, and is only made more incapable of good advice, by beingexasperated and enraged by it). See Arg. [x].

Ver. 10.] And the very first, and indeed the principal thing that is to be instilled into all men's minds, without which they will learn nothing else, is a religious sense of the divine majesty, and an awful regard towards him (as I have observed already more than once, i. 7, ii. 5, viii. 13, but it cannot be too oft repeated). And next to this, that no knowledge deserves the name of understanding, but that which is delivered by the holy men of God, and disposes us to devote ourselves unto him in holy obedience.

Ver. 11.] Other knowledge may make thee subtle and cunning in thy worldly affairs, but this alone can make thee happy; and will certainly both prolong thy life (as I have frequently said, iii. 2, 16, iv. 10, 15, &c.), and lengthen it in health, peace, prosperity, and pleasure.

Ver. 12.] This is the true reason I invite thee so earnestly to imbibe my doctrine (ver. 5), not for my own sake, but for thine; who alone will either reap the profit of being truly virtuous, or suffer all the harm and mischief (which will not in the least redound to me) of thy profane scolds and jesters at religion and goodness.

Ver. 13.] Unto which profineness, as there want not temptations, so there is none more dangerous. I think, which makes me mention it so often (ii. 16, v. 3, vi. 24, vii. 10, 11, &c.), than the lewd and impious adulterers; who is no less bold and importunate than she is bewitching and powerful, to besot the minds of her stupid lovers; but perfectly ignorant of God and religion, and a stranger to all the principles of virtue.

Ver. 14.] Which she openly opposes, for (as if she would put a manifest affront upon them) in that very place where the ministers of wisdom call men to learn the fear of the Lord (ver. 3, 10), she sits in state at the door of her house, to divert their minds from all such thoughts, and drown them in sensual pleasures.

Ver. 15.] That is the very business of her life, to defeat all good designs: by drawing even those into her chambers of impurity, who were going straight forward to the schools of wisdom and goodness.

Ver. 16.] Whose words (ver. 4), she no less imprimis than profanely returns, and tells them, It is not she, but wisdom and virtue that make men fools; by confining their desires, and denying them the liberties which she invites them to come and enjoy in her embraces; where their dulness shall learn this unknown secret.

Ver. 17.] That there are no pleasures comparable to those which a man gains by stealth from them to whom they properly belong; no morsel so sweet, as that which is forbidden; but, having been long desired, he finds at last a private opportunity to taste of without danger. See Arg. [x].

Ver. 18.] But the poor deluded wretch considers not all this while (which I have often already represented, ii. 18, v. 5, vii. 27, and is all that I shall oppose to those sinful enticements) that she invites him to utter ruin both of soul and body (see ii. 13); and sinks all those down who accept of her invitation to the very bottom of that pit where the old giants are, who corrupted mankind with such filthiness and violence, that they brought a deluge upon the earth (Gen. vi. 4, 5, 11).

PART I.

CHAPTER X.

The Proverbs of Solomon.

1 The proverbs of Solomon. A wise son maketh a glad father: but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.—Here now properly begins the book of the Proverbs (as the title of this chapter tells us),

2 Treasures of wickedness profit nothing: but righteousness delivereth from death.

3 The Lord will not suffer the soul of the what hath been delivered hitherto being rather a preface, to awaken attention, and from sundry arguments to commend the wise instructions which now follow, to every one's practice: and to caution those who would receive benefit by these instructions, from such things as may hinder their instruction in the school of wisdom.

CHAPTER X.

4 He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand: but the hand of the diligent maketh rich.

These lessons, in its first part of the book (which reaches to the 17th verse of ch. xxii.), are delivered in short sentences; every verse being a lesson by itself; which commonly hath no connection with that which goes before and follows after: or if there be any, it is not so clear as to be easily made out. And these lessons are for the most part delivered, either by way of paradoxes: or, comparing opposites one with another; the wise, for instance, and the foolish, the diligent and the sluggard, the rich and the poor: and, in general, virtue and vice, assigning to each their proper rewards and punishments; or they are mere parables, that is, similitudes; in which one thing is compared to another that resembles it.

And be, in order to instruct all sorts of men in their several kinds of life, these lessons are very various; and do not merely inform them about their manners, but about the events also, which are wont (either frequently or sometimes) to accompany or follow such and such estates, offices, and actions of human life. And some are directions for single persons; others for the ordering of household affairs; and others for the government of kingdoms.

In short, some are divine precepts: others, civil advertisements for the management of ourselves in several passages of human life: to the observance of which he excites the reader sometimes by promises, sometimes by threatening.

It is, therefore, important that in a paraphrase I should preserve the sameness that is in many of these sentences: and it will be hard to abridge, as I have done hitherto, the contents of each chapter. Yet I shall attempt something in it: and though I cannot say there is an order observed in them all (they being only a collection of wise observations and parables, which were gathered by Solomon, and afterwards exegeted by other authors), yet the first sentence of this chapter seems not to have been casually, [a] but designedly set in the front of the rest. Because nothing contributes so much every way to the happiness of mankind, as a religious care about the education of children. Which parents are here advised to shun their children; and that they should not prove a grief and shame to them; and children are put in mind of the obedience they owe to their instructions, that they may be a joy to their parents.

The Lord Bacon, in his Advancement of Learning (lib. viii. cap. 2, par. 7), thinks that the goodness and heaviness which are in fathers and mothers, according as their children prove good or bad, are here so accurately distinguished by Solomon; that he would represent a wise and well-governed son to be chiefly a comfort to the father, who knows the value of wisdom and virtue better than the mother (which account the Hebrews also give of this matter), and therefore rejects more of the towardliness of his son; which he not only better understands, but hath taken perhaps so much more care about his education that the good fruits of it give him a greater joy than they can do to the mother. Who, on the other side, is more grieved, and disappointed at the contempt of a son; both because the affection of a mother is more soft and tender, and perseverance is conscious to herself, that by too much indulgence she hath tainted and corrupted his tender years." She is more at home also (it may be added), and therefore having her son's folly more in her eye, hath a greater share in the grief of it. But this is not to be too much pressed, I think, for both of them have such a share either in the joy or in the sorrow, that it is as hard to distinguish between them constantly, as it is to make a difference between the joy and grief for the well or ill doing of a son, and the well or ill doing of a daughter.

And therefore I have but touched upon this in my paraphrase of the first verse. Concerning which I shall note this farther, that whether these instructions were written with a peculiar respect to the education of Solomon's own son, or indifferently for all, it was most judiciously done to begin with such as this first part, which consists of rules and maxims; where he has granted necessity (as the forenamed writer observes in his seventh book, ch. 3), "that men drink deeply all pious and moral knowledge before they taste of politic, that they who are bred up in the courts of princes, and in affairs of state, from tender years, rarely attain to inward and sincere probity of manner. For not being seasoned with religion and the doctrine of manners, and offices of life, their judgments are corrupted and made to think, that there are no true and solid moral differences of things, but all things are to be measured by utility and success." And in this false opinion they are the more immovably settled, if to ill education there be added the fuel of bad books: which all those will reject with disdain, who shall be so happy as to make this book their early study.

In which there follow here immediately (and very properly) some instructions about getting riches and about the keeping and using them right (ver. 2, 3, &c.), that a curse may not be entailed upon them, and descend with them unto our children. And the next verse, ver. 5, which is annexed [2] (which Plato, as Eusebius observes, translated into his seventh book of Laws), concerning the fame of good and bad men after they are dead. About which the same great man beforenamed (the Lord Bacon) hath this note in the same eighth book, parab. 6, that "the name of good men suffers no derision either in this life, or in the blossom of their fame while they were alive," presently shoots up and flourisheth; and their praises daily increase in strength and vigour." But for wicked men, "though their fame through the partial favour of friends, and of men of their own faction, may last for a little time, a detestation of their name springs up: first after they die; and last those vanishing praises end in infamy, and, like bodies that putrefy, expire in a filthy and noisome odour." And thus the LXX. in this place, instead of memory of the just is blessed, or is with blessing or benediction, have these words, the memory of the just is with continuance, or praiseworthy; which is the true explication of the phrase. And, accordingly, the church commemorates the saints of God, recounting their worthy deeds, and praising him for them. Of which, see Mr. Mede, Disc. xxii.

The rest of the chapter consists of mixed observations, concerning the difference between wise men and fools, idle persons and diligent, ill-natured people and those who are candid and kind (ver. 12), and especially between the vices and virtues of the tongue, and their rewards and punishments (ver.
5 He that gathereth in summer is a wise son:
but he that sleepeth in harvest is a son that causeth shame.

6 Blessings are upon the head of the just: but violence covereth the mouth of the wicked.

7 The memory of the just is blessed: but the name of the wicked shall rot.

8 The wise in heart will receive commandments: but a prating fool shall fall.

9 He that walketh uprightly walketh surely: but he that perverteth his ways shall be known.

13, 14, &c.). And one remarkable observation is inserted (ver. 22), which belongs to [c] that head of diligence and laboriousness: upon which, he remembers us, no man is so to depend, as to imagine to obtain what he would have by that alone: but to look up to God as the donor of all good things, and giving success to our industry. Which was a thing little thought of by heathens, who were too prone to imagine all things requisite unto happiness to be placed in themselves. But the scriptures everywhere inculcate this, that it is God who gives wisdom to the wise, and victory to the valiant, and riches to the diligent, and good success to the prudent and potent, &c.

[3] Unto which add that observation also (ver. 21), which may be farther improved than is expressed in the parable, to this sense: That wicked men many times draw upon themselves that which they feared, by those very means whereby they study to avoid them. An example of which (as Bochartus observes in his Phaleg, lib. i. cap. 16. par. i.), we have in those that built the tower of Babel: who, for fear of dispersion, designed to build a city and a tower, saying, "Go to, let us build, &c., lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth," (Gen. xi. 4). But God so ordered it, that this very attempt was the occasion of their dispersion, and brought what they feared sooner upon them, atque ipsum mali remedium illius cessit in periculum; "the very remedy of the evil they would have avoided, leading them directly into it.

R. Let us with observation, that the precepts of wisdom, from the beginning of this chapter to the tenth verse of the eighteenth, are in a manner all concerning the danger of several sorts of vice and wickedness; and afterward they are all concerning other subjects: which, how true it is, I shall there consider.

Ver. 1.] Let the father's care in educating his children (especially his son, the heir of his family) be equal to the joy he will have in their well-doing: and let the mother beware that her indulgence do not spoil them; for she will have the greatest share in the heaviness which their wantonness will give them. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 5.] This is more necessary than the care of heaping up riches for them (which many times tempt men to fraud and oppression); for, though great treasures be gotten by such means, they will be so far from availing the owners in time of distress, that they will rather expose them to be a prey; when justice and mercy, with a little wealth, will procure safety and deliverance from the greatest dangers.

Ver. 3.] The reason is, the Lord hath treasures in store for the just, especially for the merciful man; and will send him such supplies in his straits, that he shall not starve, but rather have enough; but he will drive the wicked out of their ill-gotten possessions, whereby they think to secure themselves from want. Ver. 4.] And next unto virtue let children be bred up to industry; without which, indeed, they cannot be virtuous: and while he is a child, making is a trade: when he should gather the fruits of the earth, loses all the benefit of his former labours, is a shame to himself, and unto those that bred him.

Ver. 6.] The blessings of heaven shall visibly descend in great plenty upon the just and merciful man; but their own iniquity shall violently overwhelm those, to their utter confusion, who wickedly defraud and cheat their neighbours.

Ver. 7.] And though envy may sometimes cloud a good man for the present, yet after death an honourable mention shall be made of him; and he shall be commemorated with praises; when the memory of the wicked, who now perhaps are extolled, shall either perish or stink, and be abominated. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 8.] He that is truly wise will thankfully receive such good advice as these; and avoid the dangers of which he is admonished: but he whose wisdom lies only in his tongue (which moves upon all occasions, and will not let him learn of others), ruins himself, even by his own imprudent prating.

Ver. 9.] He that deals sincerely in all his actions is both safe and sure; but he that relies upon fraud and tricks of deceiving, shall find his cunning fall him at last; and besides, can never be secure that he shall not be detected and made a public reproach.

Ver. 10.] But he especially, that under pretence of kindness betrays his neighbour, and gives the sign to others, when he would have them circumvent him, is a common grievance; and shall himself, in the end, feel the bitter effects of his baseness: for he is worse than a man who, openly professing his malice, rails perpetually, and thereby sooner hurts himself than others.

Ver. 11.] The discourse of a good man (like a perpetual spring of wholesome water) always tends to the profit, comfort, and refreshment of those that receive it; but a wicked man, how fair soever his language be, doth but conceal the mischief which (like pestilent waters out of a deep pit) he designs to procuce when opportunity serves.

Ver. 12.] Such is the difference between hatred and love, that where all things are in quiet, hatred raises up disturbance, and makes a thrice the trife; when love pacifies the minds of those that it finds provoked by real offences, and composes all those contentions, for which there was too much occasion.

Ver. 13.] He that would be wise must seek the 29 The way of the Lord is strength to the upright: but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity.

30 The righteous shall never be moved: but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth.

31 The mouth of the just bringeth forth wisdom.
CHAPTER XI.

1 A false balance is abomination to the Lord: but a just weight is his delight.

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter consists of many promiscuous observations, concerning such things as will make men happy or miserable. It begins with an admonition concerning justice in our dealings one with another; without which society (which God designs, and takes a special care to uphold) cannot be preserved. And mankind being very apt to be regardless what they do towards God, or towards man, when they grow rich and great, he next gives a caution against pride and intemperance, as a certain forerunner of ruin. For it consisting in forgetfulness of God, confidence in men's selves, despising others, slighting good counsels, and attempting things out of the bounds of men's place and calling (all which proceed from stupid folly), naturally leads men headlong into destruction.

This he concludes with charity, (ver. 3, 4), and represents the vast difference between virtue and wickedness, in order to men's private safety (ver. 5, 6, &c.), and to the public security (ver. 10, 11). After which follow a great many prudent observations and advice for men's private, and for the common good; with such remarks upon many vices and sins, as are sufficient to invite to the one, and deter from the other.

[a] Among the rest there is one, ver. 21 (translated thus by us, "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished"), upon which there are as many glosses almost as there are interpreters. But I have only put together these two senses of the former part of the verse, which are most agreeable to the latter; and do not think fit to trouble the reader with the other, any farther than merely to inform him of this one thing: That most interpreters by hand in hand understand the hands of divers persons; but some few take it for the hands of one and the same person, who puts one hand instead of the other, and hence last seeming make the sense one of these two ways: either that though a sinner endeavour to hide his sin (as a man doth a thing which he holds in one hand and covers with the other), he shall notwithstanding he found out and suffer for it; or that, though wicked men do nothing, but like an idle person have their hands folded one in the other; yet they are not free from sin, which they are devising in their mind, and will draw a just vengeance upon them.

[b] In the next verse I have followed Bochartus, De Animal. Sac. par. 1. lib. ii. cap. 57; in his translation of those two words, εὑρίσκεται, προσέχει, which he renders, "her mind departed;" viz. from the love of her husband, but, I have not neglected the other sense, of which I think those words are capable.

2 When pride cometh, then cometh shame: but with the lowly is wisdom.

[1] In the twenty-ninth verse I have adhered to the opinion of the Lord Bacon (book viii. of the Adv. of Learning, ch. ii. par. 9), who takes it for the common grace of Learning, that all reports, both good and bad, in families and domestic breaches (but as may as well be applied to whole kingdoms, which are larger families), which whosoever cherishes among his children, or servants (or people), as a means to have his affairs better administered when they have an evil eye upon and hate one another, commonly finds his hopes turn to wind. For these alterations and changes, for the most part, succeed ill; and those disturbers of their own families oftentimes meet with vexations and ingratiations from those very persons whom (passing by others) they adopt as the objects of their special favour: nay, by this means they draw upon themselves ill reports and doubtful rumours; for it is not ill observed by Cicero, that all reports, both good and bad, come from domesties. Which two evils (he thinks) Solomon expresses by inheriting the wind: for the frustrating of expectations and raising of rumours are rightly compared unto winds. I have added in the paraphrase two other things belonging to wind: which makes a great noise, and leaves nothing behind it: for all make it an emblem of emptiness.

[2] The last verse is a wise consideration suggested to good men, when they are under the oppressions of the wicked: that if the just be afflicted (as Machiavel glosses), who seriously endeavour amendment of life, God will take a time to rejoin with these few men, who constantly and firmly persist in their wickedness. So the wise man (says he) admonishes us of two things. First, that the church is subject to the cross, which the cruelty of tyrants may lay upon it: but, secondly, those tyrants must one day answer for their cruelty by sharp punishments upon themselves: may, though they flourish for some time, a tedious time they are shaken out of their empires. Hither he applies those known words of the poet, Ad generum Cereris sine cade, &c.

Ver. 1.] It is not so small a sin as men imagine, to cheat their neighbour (though it be only a little manner), but extremely hateful and detestable to the great lord and governor of the world: as, on the other side, exactly just and equal dealing in all our commerce, one with another, is highly pleasing to him.

Ver. 2.] Do not entertain a haughty conceit of thyself, nor insult over others; for the folly of this appears, in drawing along with it that contempt and disgrace, which above all things such men would avoid: therefore be humble and modest: the wisdom of which is manifest, from the universal respect which it gains everywhere.

4 Riches profit not in the day of wrath: but righteousness delivereth from death.

5 The righteousness of the perfect shall direct his way: but the wicked shall fall by his own wickedness.

6 The righteousness of the upright shall deliver them: but transgressors shall be taken in their own naughtiness.

Ver. 3.) The integrity of those that uprightly observe the rules of virtue is their highest prudence, and safest guide, through all manner of difficulties and dangers: but the crafty williness of peridious men, who will be tied unto no laws, is mere folly; and shall be so far from preserving them, that it shall prove their certain destruction.

Ver. 4.] Heaps of wealth, amassed by extortion or covetousness, shall be as little avail as subsity and cunning, when God, in his righteous displeasure, shall punish the world by a common calamity: but justice accompanied with mercy (as hath been observed already), will befriended him that hath constantly practised them, and rescue him, even when there is no hope of safety (see Ecclus. xxix. 11—13, xl. 21).

Ver. 5.] Remember this (and be not manseated at the repetition of it, for it is a weighty truth), that there is no surer guide to direct men in the plain way to safety, or any other good, than a sincere and impartial preservation of all God's laws: but that the wicked shall perish by those very impious courses (of lies, suppose breach of promises, perjuries, and oppression) whereby they think to gain or to secure themselves.

Ver. 6.] Remember it, I say (for it cannot be too oft repeated), that the virtue of ungodliness and entirely upright men shall be their preservators, when they are in danger: but they that are governed wholly by their own depraved desires and interests, shall be entangled, and inevitably perish in their own naughty contrivances.

Ver. 7.] Do not imagine, therefore, that they have the advantage of others, who are loose from all laws. They may seem so to have for the present: but, besides what I have now said, it must be considered that death (and how suddenly doth that sometimes overtake them) utterly destroys all their projects and hopes: whatsoever they expected to accomplish by their riches, or their power, or their friends, it perisheth together with them.

Ver. 8.] Nay, before that, it is frequently seen, that a just man is unexpectedly drawn out of those straits and difficulties wherein he was perplexed, and the wicked (who, perhaps, brought him into them) takes the place which he hath left; falling into those very distresses from which the just is happily freed.

Ver. 9.] And more than this, a good man hath this advantage by his wisdom, that it sometimes instructs many how to evade those snares which the profane hypocrite, with counterfeit professions of friendship, lays to destroy his neighbours.

Ver. 10.] We see also in this, how amiable virtue, and how hateful vice is, that the inhabitants of a city generally leap for joy when good men prosper, and are advanced unto power: but are so far from pitying the downfall of the wicked, that they shout when they behold them tumbling from the high places to which they were raised.

Ver. 11.] Men of unbiased virtue make a city flourish by the blessings they procure for it from heaven, by their prayers, by their prudent advice, their pious admonitions, and their constant study of the public good: but the wicked, by their blasphemies, their evil counsels, their pestilent maxims, their impious doctrines, whereby they corrupt men's manners, utterly subvert the good estate thereof.

Ver. 12.] It is a great weakness to speak contemptuously of any man, or to render him ridiculous (for no man is so mean but he is sensible of despisal, and may find ways to show his resentment); therefore a thoroughly prudent person, whatsoever he thinks of others, saith nothing to their reproach.

Ver. 13.] A man whose trade it is to ingratiate himself by deceiving others, will not stick most treacherously to discover the secrets wherewith they have entrusted him; but a man whose mind is steadfastly fixed to be true and faithful to his neighbours, will study (though they have not desired him) to hide those things which, being known, may prove injurious to them.

Ver. 14.] Where prudent counsellors are wanting a nation goes to wreck, as certainly as a ship doth without a pilot: nor is one sufficient; but then a country is safe, when there are many wise men to govern affairs: that if one fail, there may enough still remain; or if what one or two sees not, others may be able to discern.

Ver. 15.] He is in great danger to be undone, who stands bound to pay the debts of another man, especially of a stranger (vi. 1), whose ability and honesty are unknown to him; and the way to be secure from that fear is, not only to avoid such engagements one's self; but to abhor to see other men enter into them.

Ver. 16.] Beauty and virtue in a woman advance her to honour; as formidable strength and power in men advance them to riches: and as their principal care is to keep their treasures, so hers should be to preserve her reputation.

Ver. 17.] He that hath a heart to be kind and bountiful unto his neighbours, will have this advantage by it, among many others, that he will not deny... what is fit and convenient to himself; whereas the covetous and hardhearted, as he hath no regard to his neighbour's welfare, so he barbs his own flesh by his sordid way of living.

Ver. 18.] He thinks perhaps hereby to raise himself, or his posterity, to greatness, but, like all other wicked men, will be deceived in his expectation; for the event of his actions never answers the design; but virtuous men shall infallibly reap the fruit of their pious, just, and charitable labours.

Ver. 19.] Thus God orders it in his providence, and thus it is in the nature of things, that virtue tends to make men happy: but the more eagerly any man pursues an evil thing, the more he is bent upon his own destruction.

Ver. 20.] Of all other men they are most odious to the Lord, who pretend to justice, kindness, and truth, but study and advise how to compass their ends, though it be by the wickedest means: as on the contrary, they whose exact observance of the rules of righteousness in the whole course of their lives testify the integrity of their hearts, are highly in his favour and love.

Ver. 21.] But though the wicked endeavour to strengthen himself and his family by powerful leagues and confederacies, and his successors also have mighty associates to maintain his acquisitions, they shall not be able to defend themselves from the punishment their iniquity deserves: but the posterity of the righteous need not be at such pains; but, though deserted by men, escape the danger into which the others fall, by the help of God alone. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 22.] As a golden ring is ill placed in the snout of a swine, which is always running in the mire; so is beauty ill bestowed on the body of a woman whose mind, having lost all savour and relish of virtue, carries her from her husband, to wallow in filthy lust, and adulterous pleasures. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 23.] The righteous desire nothing but that it may be well with all men; but the wicked wish for trouble and disturbance, especially that they may execute their malice and wrath upon those whom they hate: and accordingly God will deal with them; good things shall be the portion of the righteous, but his just indignation shall frustrate the expectation of the wicked.

Ver. 24.] You may see by this how miserably they are mistaken, who imagine none so wise as the penurious; that you shall find here and there a man who communicates readily and liberally to the necessities of others, and yet his estate is so far from being impaired thereby, that it increases: whereas the others, who are so saving that they will part with nothing, no, not upon the most just occasions, do not thrive at all, but by one means or other become beggars.

Ver. 25.] Let not him therefore that bestows benefits imagine thereby he shall be impoverished, for it is the certain way to enrich himself: and the larger his charity is, the more diffused for the refreshment of others, the greater abundance shall be poured on him, and the abler still shall he grow to do more good.

Ver. 26.] He that hoards up corn in a time of scarcity, on purpose to raise the price, shall fall into the popular hatred, and be loaded with many a curse; but he who then opens his granaries and sells at a moderate rate, shall not only have the people's good word, but the blessing of God.

Ver. 27.] He that, from the time he rises, studies nothing but how to do good to others, shall obtain favour both with God and man; but he whose business it is to do mischief, shall draw upon himself the evil by his own hand and that of others.

Ver. 28.] He whose confidence in riches, as the surest support and defence, makes him covetous, unjust and merciful, shall fail to decay like a withered leaf: but they whose pious dependence upon God makes them just and charitable, like a flourishing tree, shall thrive and prosper.

Ver. 29.] He that makes or cherishes dispensions and factions in his own family (or kingdom) may, by making a great bustle and stir, seem to be a notable man; but will not only be deceived in his expectations, but desolate his government, and bring his estate to nothing: may, it is oftentimes seen that he who is thus foolish loses all his authority, and becomes a servant to him who administers his affairs with a more prudent care. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 30.] The benefit the world receives from a just and charitable man is so great, that it may be compared to the fruit of the tree of life; which keeps mankind from being miserable: but he is the greatest benefactor of all, who communicates wisdom so charitably and reasonably, that he draws souls to the love of virtue.

Ver. 31.] But who is there so good as to do, or to suffer, no evil? And if God do not let the just and charitable man (mark what I say), they who are so useful and beneficial to the world, go without correction; who can think that the wicked, who is good for

CHAPTER XII.

1 Whose loveli instruction lovelh knowledge: but he that hateth reproof is brutish.

CHAP. XII.

Argument.—This chapter begins with admonition, often inculcated in this book, concerning the affection wherewith a man, that would be wise and good, ought to receive charitable reproofs. And there are several things also repeated, concerning the providence of almighty God; in punishing men according to their wickedness, and delivering good men from those who seek their destruction; which is notably expressed in three verses, one after another (ver. 5—7), where he observes how the wicked, laboured to compass their ends, by cozenage, or by violence, even by blood (especially if they can privately make a man away), not only miscarried in their designs, but are unexpectedly over-turned and subverted out of their places, wherein they behave themselves with such injustice and cruelty.

There are divers instructions, also, here repeated about several virtues and vices; especially those of the tongue. Among which Melanchthon commendeth this to the remembrance of the reader, ver. 22, [a] "lying lips are an abomination to the Lord:" who recommends to us (says he) the love and care of truth: both in doctrines concerning himself, and in arts, and in all honest covenants and contracts. For truth being among the chiefest and most conspicuous virtues, therefore the contrary vice is condemned, by a terrible word, and called abomination. For such an evil as God detests with singular indignation (for idols are called জাদাস্যো; "abominations, or abominable things") which is principally true of such lies as are on purpose invented to destroy men's fame; and much more of such as are devised for the taking away their lives, and the ruin of their families: such as these David often complains were contrived against him.

The Lord Bacon hath made notable remarks also upon another passage in this chapter (ver. 10), where he observes concerning the former [b] part of the verse, that "there is implanted in man's nature a noble and excellent affection of pity and compassion, called here mercy: which extends itself even unto brute creatures, that are by divine ordinance subject to his command. And therefore this compassion hath some analogy with that of a prince towards his subjects: nay, further, it is most certain, that the worthier any soul is, the larger is its compassion. For contracted and degenerate minds imagine these things appertain not to them; but the mind that looks upon itself as a nobler portion of the universe is kindly affected towards inferior creatures, out of the communion there is between them: wherefore we see that there were under the old law many precepts concerning this, which were not so much merely ceremonial, as institutions of mercy. As that of not eating flesh with the blood in it, and such-like." I suppose he means those mentioned Exod. xxiii. 5, 19; Deut. v. 4, xxii. 6, 7, xxv. 4. For, as Grothus has, rightly observed, it is very laudable to exercise kindness towards brute creatures, that we may keep ourselves the more remote from all manner of cruelty towards men. Which the angel, the Jews think, reproved in Balaam when he chid him for striking his ass three times. For thus they bring in the angel speaking to him, in the great commentary upon Numbers: If I am required to demand satisfaction for the injury done thy ass, concerning whom there is no law of justice, nor covenant of our fathers, how much more for this, that thou goest about utterly to root out a whole nation!

I omit what the same Lord Bacon there says (book viii. of the Adv. of Learning, ch. 2, parab. 11), concerning the ancient Es bruces and Pythagoreans, and concerning some people now in the Negrol's country, and the present Turks, who are full of affection to brute creatures; and only observe that he looks upon the latter part of the same verse as a kind of caution added by the wise man; lest we should think he patronizes all sort of mercy and compassion. "No, the mercy which expiates wicked persons from being cut off by the hand of justice is not mercy, but more cruel than cruelty itself. For cruelty is exercised upon single persons only: but this kind of mercy, by the grant of impunity, arms the whole band of impious men against the innocent." For, "the metrics of the wicked, he understands mercy shown to the wicked: who, in an unusual form of speech, and disagreeing to the opposition which the wise man, in this proverbial saying, makes between the righteous and the wicked. And, therefore, it is not to be embraced, nor to be looked upon as a true exposition: in which, though I believe he followed Drusius, yet he hath very little company besides. And the sense rather lies as I have expressed it in the paraphrase: in which, if I have added more than interpreters do, I am confident it will appear to him that considers not to be without reason. For these words, "the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel," seem to me to have the same sense with that proverbial speech among the Greeks, ἐφικτὸς ἐστιν ἅμα ἀποφαίνειν. In the twelfth verse I have expressed both senses of which the word ἔνοελ is capable: which signifies both a net and a fortress. And so I have done in the next (ver. 15), which may be rendered two ways. Either, that by prevaricating with his lips, a wicked man lays snares, or [c] that he is himself ensnared by his prevarications. In the same manner I have comprehended more senses than one, in several other verses; which, if I should particularly mention, it would enlarge this preface beyond its just length. Else I should have made some remarks upon ver. 15, where the danger of self-love and self-conceit is represented: which hath ever 3 A man shall not be established by wickedness: but the root of the righteous shall not be moved.
4 A virtuous woman is a crown to her husband: but she that maketh ashamed is as rottenness in his bones.
5 The thoughts of the righteous are right: but the counsel of the wicked are deceit.
6 The words of the wicked are to lie in wait for blood: but the mouth of the upright shall deliver them.
7 The wicked are overthrown, and are not: but the house of the righteous shall stand.
8 A man shall be commended according to his wisdom: but he that is of a perverse heart shall be despised.

He that is despised, and hath a servant, is better than he that honoureth himself, and lacketh bread.

10 A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast: but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.
11 He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread: but he that followeth vain persons is void of understanding.
12 The wicked desireth the net of evil men: but the root of the righteous yieldeth fruit.
13 The wicked is snared by the transgression of his lips: but the just shall come out of trouble.
14 A man shall be satisfied with good by the fruit of his mouth: and the recompence of a man's hands shall be rendered unto him.
15 The way of a fool is right in his own eyes: but he that hearkeneth unto counsel is wise.

35, 30, xi. 35), when they that assaulted them are quite extinct.

Ver. 6.] True prudence, directing a man to effect his own peace and honor, means, when it is as certain a note of folly to rely wholly upon a man's own judgment, as it is of prudence to hearken to the advice of others.

Ver. 7.] He is far happier who makes no show in the world, but hath a competent estate, than he who appears in great splendour and pomp abroad; but wants bread to eat when he is at home.

Ver. 10.] A good man takes care that his beast be well used, and have food and rest convenient for it; which is more than men bent upon wickedness will do for their neighbours: for their very kindnesses, being treacherous, are a cruel cheat; nay, the highest expressions which they make of tenderness and compassion (whereby they induce others to repose a trust in them) are intended merely as a cover for the mischief they mean more securely to do them. See Arg. [6].

Ver. 11.] He that takes pains in an honest employment, suppose in tilling his land, shall find it requires him with sufficient, if not plentiful provision for himself and family; but, falling into the company of loose and wicked persons, will find at last (by the desperate courses into which they will lead him) that he wants not only bread, but understanding.

Ver. 12.] The wicked desires two things: first, to do as much mischief as he can by his wiles and arts of deceiving; and then to be secure in his wickedness: but the righteous make everybody the better for them: and thereby enjoy that safety, which the other have only in their wishes and desires.

Ver. 13.] The wicked ensnares himself by that deceitful talk wherewith he designed to have ensnared others: but the righteous escapes the danger; nay, by his prudent discourse, avoids very great difficulties wherein otherwise he might have been entangled. See Arg. [6].

Ver. 14.] There is no man gives good counsel and advice (especially in public affairs), but he shall reap the fruit of it abundantly himself; and there is no good work he does for the benefit of others, but God shall require it, and make it turn to his own good account.

Ver. 15.] A fool is so conceited that he consults nobody but himself; for whatsoever he doth, in his own opinion he is always in the right: but a wise man will not rely upon his own judgment alone; but, suspect-
CHAPTER XIII.

16 A fool's wrath is presently known; but a prudent man covereth shame.

17 He that speaketh truth sheweth forth righteousness; but a false witness deceit.

18 There is that speaketh like the piercings of a sword; but the tongue of the wise is health.

19 The lip of truth shall be established for ever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment.

20 Deceit is in the heart of them that imagine evil; but to the counsellors of peace is joy.

21 There shall no evil happen to the just; but the wicked shall be filled with mischief.

22 Lying lips are abomination to the Lord: but they that deal truly are his delight.

23 A prudent man concealeth knowledge: but the heart of fools proclameth foolishness.

24 The hand of the diligent shall bear rule: but the slothful shall be under tribute.

25 Heaviness in the heart of man maketh it stoop: but a good word maketh it glad.

26 The righteous is more excellent than his neighbour: but the way of the wicked seduceth them.

27 The slothful man roareth not that which he took in hunting: but the substance of a diligent man is precious.

28 In the way of righteousness is life; and in the pathway thereof is no death.

Ver. 22.] It is thought no great matter if a man break his word, or any way deceive his neighbour; but know, that this is a thing exceeding hateful to the divine majesty; and, on the contrary, they that faithfully perform their promises, and in all things deal truly with their neighbours, are no less acceptable to him. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 23.] A prudent man conceals his knowledge, and will not make a show of being so wise as really he is: but a fool publishes his ignorance, as if he was ambitious that every one should know he is a fool.

Ver. 24.] He that taketh pains in an honest employment, shall take his ease at last; nay, raise himself to dominion and power; but he whose sloth makes him live by sharking and deceit, shall bring that tooll upon himself which he would avoid, when his poverty and villany have reduced him to be a slave.

Ver. 25.] Anxious cares and solicitude how to live depress the spirit of a man, otherwise magnanimous: but the kind and encouraging discourses of a friend (much more the gracious promises of God) erect it, nay, make it glad.

Ver. 26.] As in other things, so in this, a righteous man is more excellent than his neighbour, that he doth not delude himself with vain hopes; nor miss his end, as the wicked doth in all his designs.

Ver. 27.] There is nothing more vile than a lazy fellow that lives by cheating; who, if he catch, shall not be able to keep his prey: but he is a valuable man, who by honest diligence getteth wealth, which shall durably remain with him.

Ver. 28.] True goodness leads unto endless prosperity and happiness: nor is there any one action of virtue that tends to make a man miserable; as all manner of wickedness doth.

CHAPTER XIII.

1 A wise son heareth his father's instruction: but a scorner heareth not rebuke.

2 A man shall eat good by the fruit of his mouth: but the soul of the transgressors shall eat violence.

3 He that keepeth his mouth keepeth his mouth: but the soul of the transgressors shall eat violence.

CHAP. XIII.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter begins as the foregoing did, with an admonition about receiving instruction and reproof with due regard to them; especially from parents, who cannot be thought to intend any thing but the good of their children. And as he did there, so here again the wise man gives fresh advice about the government of the tongue, and about diligence and industry; and hath several observations, not much different from what he made before, of the advantage which the righteous have of the wicked in a great many instances, which are easy to observe in the paraphrase.

And in the eighth verse he seems to me to teach [a] contentedness of mind; by showing that the poor have a great advantage of the rich in an evil time. Some, indeed, take the sentence quite otherwise, Life: but he that openeth wide his lips shall have destruction.

The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing: but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat.

As if the wise man intended to represent the great advantage rich men have of the poor, in this sense: A rich man, when he fears any evil from his enemies, can divert it by a sum of money: but a poor man, when he is threatened, dare not stay, but runs away: and others there are who run a middle way, and think he intends to show, that each of them has his advantages of several kinds. But considering the opposition that is usual in this book, between one part of the verse and the other, this seems not to be the meaning; yet I have mentioned it, that they who do not take the opposition to be as that expresseth it in the paraphrase, may have their choice, and follow which sense they like best. As for that of Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. iii. Pedagogy, cap. 7, who thus glosses upon the former part of the verse, ιδον πετρην μεταφυσε ωριστα, "if a man be rich, he shall be saved by giving away to those in want," it doth not answer to the exposition of the verse, unless we should interpret it thus: As for the poor, they shall have no rebuke for not giving, because they have nothing to give. But I look upon this as not genuine; though his admonition upon this occasion be excellent, which is this: He that earnestly presses to go up to heaven must cast away την ενεργειαν της άτμοσφαίρας, but he that is conned with the mountains, will divide benevolence: and by relieving those that are afflicted, partake himself of true rest and refreshment.

Which it is impossible to find any way but in [c] virtuous courses, as the fifteenth verse suggests to us; the sense of which, according to the plain import of the Hebrew words, I have expressed in the paraphrase as the last part of it sounds in our language, it will not be incongruous to take the meaning of the whole thus: If a man have understanding enough to be thoroughly good, he will find things favourable to his honest desires; but they that take evil courses meet with great difficulties, and are forced to go backward and forward, and waste much money, to bring their ends to save themselves, perhaps, from ruin.

[c] There are several other notable sentences in this chapter, upon which, if I should enlarge, it would be to write a book. The only two which Melancthon singled out for the observation of his scholars are, the one of them in ver. 10, concerning pride: upon which he remembers them of the Greek proverb, Ὠφος ῥιόν εν μιγτών, "a mountain cannot mix with a mountain!" i. e. two high men will never agree together; and of another excellent saying among the Latins, Crede mihi, sapere, est non mulium sapere; "believe me, to be wise, is not to be over-wise." For whose minds are infected with a vain opinion of themselves, either cannot see the truth, if it be against their thoughts, or, if they do, they will not acknowledge it, for fear they should yield, and confess themselves overcome.

[d] The other is ver. 23, the latter part of which he renders differently from all that I have read, "he that is wise, and maketh his mouth poor;" et alii sine modo cumulant, "and others heap up without any measure;" that is, to no purpose, when a little will suffice. Which is a wise saying, but not agreeable to the Hebrew text.

I shall only add, that as the chapter begins with an admonition to hearken to reproof (especially from parents), which is repeated again in the middle, ver. 13, 18, so it concludes [e], in the last verse but one, with an advice to parents not to spare the rod, if reproof will not do: which is but necessary in very young children; because there is no other means, perhaps, to make them understand the difference between good and evil, decent and unseemly; but only to make them smart for the one, and to give them some sensible pleasure for the other. Some children there are, are so disposed that they must be thus treated; and it seems a wonderful piece of wisdom in the old Lacedemonians (as Plutarch relates in his Laconical Institutes), that, out of a universal love and care for each other's good, made it lawful for any man to correct the child of another person, if he saw him do amiss. And if the child complained of it to his father, he would speak very sharply with his son, "look every man only after his own children, servant's, and cattle; but every man looked upon what was his neighbour's as his own, ἐπει δὲ μητροτοιοῦ και πατρότοιοι, και νεοτόιοι και παιδία, that there might be, as much as was possible, a communion among them, and they might take care of what belonged to others, as if they were their own proper goods."

Ver. 1.] A good child will reverently receive and obey both the instruction and reprehension of his father: but there is no hope of him that laughs and scoffs when he is admonished or chidden for his faults.

Ver. 2.] He that speaks well of others, or gives them faithful counsel, shall reap the benefit thereof himself; and so shall they that peradventure exult, or deceive them, suffer themselves that injury which they desired to do their neighbours.

Ver. 3.] It is worth a man's pains to watch over his tongue; for he that carefully observes every word he speaks, preserves himself from much trouble and danger: but he that blurts out every thing that comes into his head, not minding what he saith, is in the ready way to ruin.

Ver. 4.] There is nothing gotten by sloth, neither riches nor learning; which he in vain desires that will not labour for them: but the diligent and industrious shall never want satisfaction, but enjoy perhaps, a great deal more than he desired.

Ver. 5.] A good man not only avoids, but hates, all manner of falsehood, both in word and deed: but the wicked delights to abuse others with such abominable lies and frauds as make him no less loathsome than a stinking carcass, and so contemptible, that he dare not show his face for shame.

Ver. 6.] The justice of all honest and upright designs will be a sufficient security to them; but all wicked contrivances are overthrown by their own iniquity.
CHAPTER XIII.

7 There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing: there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches.

8 The ransom of a man's life are his riches: but the poor heareth not rebuke.

9 The light of the righteous rejoiceth: but the lamp of the wicked shall be put out.

10 Only by pride cometh contention: but with the well advised is wisdom.

11 Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished: but he that gathereth by labour shall increase.

12 Hope deferred maketh the heart sick: but when the desire cometh, it is a tree of life.

13 Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed: but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded.

14 The law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.

Ver. 7.] You will be deceived, if you judge of men by the outward appearance; for there are those who have the vanity to make a great show in the world, when they are not worth a farthing: and others, who are so cunning as to resemble their vast estates under the garb of poverty.

Ver. 8.] Rich men are not always so happy as they are imagined; for their wealth sometimes only serves to make them accused of high crimes, and then to bring them off with a huge sum of money, which they pay to save their lives: but nobody is apt to find fault with the poor, or to bring any charge against them. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 9.] The happiness of the just is great and illustrious, like the light of the sun, and increases still to their endless joy: but the happiness of the wicked is weak and dim, like the light of the candle, and will at last be utterly extinguished.

Ver. 10.] They that have a high conceit of themselves, and will yield to none, declare their folly, in that they can do nothing without strife and contention: but they that are so humble as to be advised by others, do all things prudently, in quietness and peace. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 11.] Wealth ill-gotten (by lying, gaming, cheating, &c.) soon wastes away: but what is gotten by honest labour, swells to a greater heap, which makes a man's riches.

Ver. 12.] The delay of that which a man eagerly expects is such an affliction, that it differs little from a lingering disease: but when he enjoys what he hath long looked for, it restores him presently to his former vigour and liveliness.

Ver. 13.] He that despises the good admonitions or counsellors that are given him, is his own enemy, and destroys himself: but he that reverently submits to the divine commandments, maketh God his friend, who will reward him for it.

Ver. 14.] The instructions of a good man ought to be as a law to him that receiveth them: for, like the water of a perpetual spring, they are most beneficial; especially to preserve him from those pernicious and destructive principles whereby too many are ensnared.

Ver. 15.] A prudent, plain, and regular behaviour, is most amiable and acceptable to all men; but the conversation of such as live by no law but their own caprice, like rough way, is grievously uncanny. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 16.] All prudent persons are so cautious not to discredit themselves, that they undertake nothing but with due deliberation, and what they understand: but a fool discovers his weakness to be greater than was thought, by rash meddling with matters out of his reach.

Ver. 17.] A messenger, or a minister, that wickedly betrays his trust, is so injurious to his prince, or him that employs him, that he shall not escape a just punishment: but he that faithfully discharges this office (healing, suppose, or preventing differences and breaches) procures safety to himself, as well as to the person that used his service.

Ver. 18.] He that proudly rejects instruction, and disdains to be checked in his low courses, is likely to be a beggar, and exposed to the public scorn: but he that is so humble as to give a due regard to reproof, and to correct his errors, not only gains a just esteem, but is likely to rise unto dignity and honour.

Ver. 19.] It is a high satisfaction to enjoy what we earnestly desire: but fools herein defeat themselves; being so wedded to their wickedness, that they will not quit it, if that must be the condition of their being so happy.

Ver. 20.] He that keeps company with wise and good men is likely to be so himself; that is, to be happy; but he who associates himself with the wicked shall be so certainly ruined as he will be unavoidably infected with their wickedness.

Ver. 21.] The wickedness of sinners pursues them to their unavoidable destruction: and the good which righteous men do will infallibly return into their own bosom and reward them with many blessings.

Ver. 22.] A man that doeth good with his estate takes the surest course to settle it upon his posterity for many generations: but the wealth of him who regards not his own sinful lusts and pleasures, shall be transferred from his family unto one that is truly virtuous.

Ver. 23.] A poor man many times makes a plentiful provision for himself and his family, out of a few acres of land which he manages judiciously and honestly: but there is a sort of men whose larger estates are wasted; either for want of skill to improve their ground, or because they do not pay the hireling his wages. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 24.] Fond affection, which maketh a parent forbear to chastise his child for the faults that cannot otherwise be amended, is no better than hatred; for it helps to undo him: therefore he that truly loves his child must not be so indulgent; but as soon as ill inclinations begin to appear, while he is tender and flexible, give him early correction as well as admon-
PROVERBS.

23 Much food is in the tillage of the poor: but there is that is destroyed for want of judgment.

24 He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes.

25 The righteous eateth to the satisfying of his soul: but the belly of the wicked shall want.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 Every wise woman buildeth her house: but the foolish plucketh it down with her hands.

2 He that walketh in his uprightness feareth the Lord: but he that is perverse in his ways despiseth him.

ARGUMENT.—[2] As the foregoing chapter began with a description of a towardly child, so this with the character of a good mother of a family: who by her prudent care makes it flourish: when a lewd woman throweth the house (as we say) out of the windows: for so the wise man observeth: "She pull down the house with her own hands:" that is, misman the family without any other help. There needs no more than a bad wife to undo a family.

[3] A little after this (ver. 1) there follows an admonition for the man without doors, as here for the woman within; that he do not neglect his husbandry. Of which oxen, every one knows, were the principal instruments: being not only employed in that country (as they are here) in ploughing the ground, and carrying home the crop, but also in treading out the corn. The strength also of the ox (which is here mentioned) is celebrated in all authors: and hence bulls are called abbarim, i.e. robust, among the Hebrews, who were very careful about the breeding of these most profitable creatures. It is not my business to inquire after the different dancing and whose names we render here, in this verse, by the same English word), but certain it is, they are used promiscuously for either sex; and the latter without any respect to age: though most commonly it signifies one grown to maturity, which we call an ox.

[4] Upon the next verse but one (ver. 6), the Lord Bacon (in his seventh book of the Adv. of Learning, ch. 2) hath made this useful gloss: "He that comes to seek after knowledge, with a mind to scorn and censure, shall be sure to find matter enough for his humour, but none for his instruction." One reason of which is, that this humour of detriding all things springs from a great pride and conceit of their own wit, which diverts them from the path wisdom, not from others, but wholly from themselves: and so (as the wise man observes) they are not likely to find it where it is not to be had. When he that attributes less to himself, and hath the humility to listen to instruction, in a short time attains great wisdom. I cannot wholly admit the opinion of Junius: who thinks the wise man means, that he who hath accustomed himself to laugh at all wholesome counsel, and in some strait or other begins to think what is best to do, commonly finds himself at such a loss, that he cannot see his way out of it. And it may be applied to those also who, having mocked at religion all their days, at last desire to understand it; but cannot, through their own inveterate disposition to it.

[5] In the next verse I have joined these two senses together, which it may have according to the different acceptation of the word minnaged, signifying either before, or from before.

[6] The next (ver. 8), I take to be that which the Lord Bacon, minding the sense rather than the words, thus translates (Advancement of Learning, book viii. ch. 2, parab. 30, Prudens adversit ad gressus suos, stultus divertit s. dolos. Which his English translator (who refers this to Prov. xxvii. 12, which is quite to another purpose) reads thus, "A wise man is weary of his way, a cunning fool seeks evasions." Upon which that lord thus descants: "There be two sorts of wisdom; the one true and sound, the other counterfeit and false, which last Solomon doubts not to call folly. He that applies himself to the former, takes heed to his own ways and actions; as which we render here, in this verse, by the same English word), but certain it is, they are used promiscuously for either sex; and the latter without any respect to age: though most commonly it signifies one grown to maturity, which we call an ox.

[7] There is the same difficulty in the ninth verse that was in the seventh; for the word falsa is translated by some mock, by others censure; and so (besides what I have comprehended in my paraphrase) there may be this sense of the words;

[8] And so on through the rest of the chapter.
CHAPTER XIV.

6 A scorner seeketh wisdom, and findeth it not: but knowledge is easy unto him that understandeth.

7 Go from the presence of a foolish man, when thou perceivest not in him the lips of knowledge.

As the Lord Bacon (Advanc. of Learning, book viii. ch. 11, pars. 25) glosses upon that verse in these words: Solomon here separates the fruit of the labour of the tongue and of the labour of the hands, as if it were an index of one, and wealth the revenue of the other. For it is commonly the custom, that they who talk liberally, boast much, and promise mighty matters, are beggars; and receive no benefit by their bargains, or by any thing they discourse of. Nay, rather, for the most part, such men are not industrious and diligent in their employments; but only feed and fill themselves with words, without any signs, unless, perhaps, once (Lev. xx. 17), of which which he here make a just doubt made. As for the chitchea, nobody doubts but it signifies a sin-offering, as well as sin; yet with respect to our translation, I have endeavoured to express both senses of these two words in my paraphrase.

Ver. 1.] He hath a great treasure, whatsoever he be, that hath a wise and virtuous wife; for she alone, by her diligent and prudent administration, is able to raise her family, and increase its riches and reputation: but she that is foolish, and void of goodness, by her negligence, ill management, and luxury, without any assistance, will lay it low, and waste all that hath been gotten by her predecessor's care. See Arg. [46.]

Ver. 2.] He that sincerely discharges his duty in all the actions of his life, hath a due regard and reverence to the Lord; from which all virtue flows: but he that cares not what he doth, so he doth but satisfy his own lusts and passions, lives in a profane contempt of his majesty; which is the very fountain of all wickedness.

Ver. 3.] A fool is so insolent that he boldly calumniate and wounds the reputation of others, though it comes home at last, with a terrible back-blow, upon himself; but wise men are careful of their words, not to offend, much less abuse, the meanest person; and thereby they remain in safety.

Ver. 4.] If the fields lie fallow and be neglected, a famine must needs follow: but good husbandry bestowed upon them makes great plenty. See Arg. [7.]

Ver. 5.] A person of integrity will not be prevailed withal, either for fear or favour, to justify the least untruth: but a man of no conscience, who hath accustomed himself to lying, cares not how many falsehoods he testifieth; which he utters without any difficulty.

Ver. 6.] He that scoffs and jeers at every thing he reads or hears, would be thought wise; but losses all his pains which, perhaps, he takes to he so; when a serious person, who doth not think himself too wise to learn, easily and quickly attains the knowledge of things which profit for his life. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 7. Observe a fool (and a wicked man is no better) as diligently as thou pleasest, and thou shalt never learn any good from him; and therefore it is best to flee the company of such persons, whose discourse thou perceivest tends to nothing but vice and mischief. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 8. The greatest cunning and subtlety that a truly wise and good man studies, is to understand what he ought to do, and what to avoid, upon all occasions: but all the skill of wicked men, such is their folly, lies in cheating tricks, and in devising arts of circumvention and deceit. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 9. Lewd men, as if were but a sport, care not what injury they do their neighbours, and when they have done, laugh at those that talk to them of making satisfaction: but among men exactly virtuous there is nothing but goodwill, which makes them live without offence, or presently reconcile themselves to those they have offended. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 10. Nobody can know what another suffers, so well as he himself: and he alone is privy to the greatest part of those griefs which spring from the happy conclusion of his sufferings. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 11. Men of sincere integrity are happier in a mean cottage than the wicked are in their palaces: for, when the great and potent families of those wicked men are overturned, the despicable family of the sincerely pious shall flourish and grow illustrious.

Ver. 12. Examine every thing strictly and impartially, and he not led merely by thy appetite; for that makes many actions seem innocent, which in the issue prove deadly destructive. See Arg. [h].

Ver. 13. Do not think that every one that laughs is merry, or that profuse and inconsiderate joy is true pleasure; for it leaves the heart more heavy and sad afterward, especially when the mind reflects upon it; nay, such is the vanity of this present life, there is no joy without a mixture of sorrow; which ofttimes treads so close upon its heels, that it immediately follows.

Ver. 14. He that, to avoid a danger, revolts from those virtuous courses, unto which he knows he ought to go no further, will bring upon himself misery enough by his own devices: but a truly good man, even in this, far superior to him, that though he should suffer, his own integrity, and the clearness and quietness of his conscience, give him abundant satisfaction.

Ver. 15. It is a mark of great silliness to be credulous; that is, to take all those for friends who make profession of it, and easily to follow every one's advice: for a prudent man is suspicious, and proceeds cautiously; examining before he trusts, and considering well before he does as he is advised. See Arg. [i].

Ver. 16. A wise man, being admonished of his error and of his danger, is afraid of incurring the divine displeasure; and instantly starts back from that evil way into which he was entering, or wherein he was enticed: but a fool storms at those that would stop him in his course, and proceeds boldly and securely to his own ruin.

Ver. 17. He whose anger is presently kindled, and breaks out when he is offended, may do such things, when the fit is upon him, as none but a fool would be guilty of; but he is nothing so bad as him, who, suppressing his wrath, lets it boil in his breast, and deliberately contemplates how to take a cruel revenge: for most men are inclined to pity the weakness of him that is nasty, but this man's wickedness is odious and execrable unto all.

Ver. 18. Inconsiderate men will never leave their folly, till they feel the woful effects of it: but they who are cautious, and advised, will heartily embrace all those precepts of instruction, and endeavour to arrive at the perfection of knowledge; which will prove a singular ornament and glory to them.

Ver. 19. Evil-doers had best not be insolent in their prosperity: for they may not only be brought low, but have been seen to humble themselves before the face of these good men whom they had oppressed: the most impious of them, that stuck at nothing which would support them in their wickedness, have been forced to wait as humble suppliants at the gate of that just man (whom they despised and abused), and implore his favour and relief.

Ver. 20. There is little sincere kindness left in the world; for if a man fall into poverty, his near neighbour, nay, even he that professed friendship to him before, not only forsakes him, but lates his company; but if a man grow very rich (let it be by what means it will), there are many that before took no notice of him, who will pretend to love him; nay, the greatest persons offer him their favour.

Ver. 21. But let such men know that it is a greater, yet more difficult, task, to make them imagine, and shall be severely punished, to overlook their poor neighbour, and deny him their charitable relief: which whosoever compassionately affords him, not only doth a good deed, but shall be amply rewarded for it.

Ver. 22. No! I tell you, (when it is so known a truth) that they miss their end, and do but contrive their own ruin, who carry on mischievous designs against the innocent: but they that take the same pains to study how to do men good, shall never fail of that bountiful reward which is secured to them by the faithful promise of God.

Ver. 23.] If a man take pains in any honest employment, though never so mean, it will bring him in some profit: but to spend one's time in talking only, and perhaps boasting what he can do, tends to nothing but to make a man a beggar. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 24.] Riches are a singular advantage and ornament to a wise and virtuous man, who knows how to use them: but such is the folly of wicked men, that their wealth makes them the more vile, and only gives them the greater means to show what senseless fools they are.

Ver. 25.] An upright man will not fear to endanger himself in justifying the truth, to save the lives of those that are falsely accused: but false and deceitful men boldly pour out lies and calumnies, though thereby they destroy the innocent.

Ver. 26.] A religious care to please the Lord in all things, gives a man the firmest resolution, and the strongest confidence of security and protection in all dangers. And his children after him may flee to God for safety, and hope to fare the better for their pious father's sake.

Ver. 27.] There is nothing makes a man live so comfortably and happily as this religious care to avoid every thing offensive to his majesty; which, like a perpetual spring, gives endless satisfaction: and diverts a man from those dangerous ways, wherein others are entangled to their utter destruction.

Ver. 28.] The honour and splendour of a king depend upon the multitude, wealth, and strength, of his subjects: whom, therefore, he ought to cherish: for if they be wasted by unnecessary wars, or forced into other countries by oppression and unjust executions, it proves the ruin of his kingdom.

Ver. 29.] He declares himself to be a great man, and to abound with prudence, who is not soon provoked to anger by reproaches, or ill usage: by which, if a man be hastily inflamed, he exposes his folly, and makes it apparent to everybody.

Ver. 29.] There is nothing conduces more to health and happiness, than a quiet, gentle, and contented mind: but envy, and suchlike fretful passions, is as miserable a torment and consuming disease as rottenness in the bones.

Ver. 30.] He that defrauds or oppresses the poor, forgets God, who can reduce him to the same condition: nay, affronts his majesty, who hath promised to be the defender of such helpless people; therefore, whosoever hath any respect to God, will he so far from injuring, that he will show mercy, and do good to him that is needy.

Ver. 31.] When a wicked man falls into calamity, his heart falls him, and he is driven away from all his confidants, like the chaff before the wind, by the consciousness of his own wickedness: but a righteous man is not dismayed in the greatest dangers; but remains steady and confident, even in death itself.

Ver. 32.] A prudent person makes no unseasonable demonstration of his wisdom; but lets it lie quiet in his own mind, till there be a fitting opportunity to do good with it; whereas fools cannot contain themselves, but presently vent whatsoever they know, though it be so small, in every company whereunto they come.

Ver. 33.] Justice and piety raise a nation to the highest degree of prosperity and glory, especially when mercy, humanity, and kindness, even unto strangers and enemies, are joined with them: which pacifies the divine anger, and turns away many calamities: which the contrary sins bring down upon a people, till they make them vile and miserable. See Arg. [7].

Ver. 34.] A prudent and dexterous minister of state, who understands his business, and is faithful in it, must needs be very acceptable to his prince: whose anger nothing more provokes, than one who regards not his master's honour, but, by his ill management, disgraces his government, and brings all things into confusion.
CHAPTER XV.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter begins with that aphorism which [a] the Lord Bacon (Advancement of Learning, book viii. ch. 2) hath set in the front of all those which he hath called out of this book; for example of that sort of wisdom which is to be exercised in business, upon various occasions. And he applies it particularly to a man's behaviour towards a prince, or other great person, when he is angry with him. "Two things (saith he) Solomon advises in this case: the one is, that an answer be made; the other, that it be soft. The first of which obtains three precepts. First, that you beware of a sad and sullen silence; which either charges the fault wholly upon yourselves, or impeaches your master of injustice, as if his ears were not open to a just defence. Secondly, that you beware of delaying the answer, and of craving longer time for your defence; because that plainly betrays you are desiring some cunning and counterfeit apology, having no present answer. Thirdly, that by all means an answer be made: an answer, I say, not a mere confession or submission; but with some sprinklings of an excuse let fall here and there. For it is not safe to bear yourself otherwise, unless you have to deal with very generous and noble dispositions, which are rare. But then, this answer (which is the second and principal thing here advised) must be very soft and temperate, not harsh and peremptory: for that will make the business worse than if it had never been meddled with at all; and increase that wrath which you should study to appease."

Melancthon also, I find, in his short lectures upon this book, commends this lesson very much to his scholars; but looks upon it as a general precept for the preservation of peace, and avoiding unnecessary contentions; which arise out of pride, ambition, morosity of nature, emulation, wrath, superstition; which move men either to give ill words, or to return worse to those that are given them; endeavouring to overcome by sharpness and bitterness, not by lenity and moderation. And the truth is, the Hebrew word we translate answer, signifies as well what is first said, as the reply to it. So that Solomon here gives this caution, that we should not think it enough not to begin strife and contention; but if others begin it, we should not continue it; by fair answers, and by contriving to make an end presently by mollifying the matter, and yield much for the common tranquillity's sake. And he thinks it is a precept of the same nature with that of Pythagoras, stir not up fire with a sword; and commends those excellent verses of Euripides:

Δεν ηγούμενος, Σταυρί, Ὑψηλής,
Ο μὴ αὐτοκίνησε τῶν ἱερῶν σβησθῆναι.

And next to this precept he commends to his scholars [9] that in ver. 8, which is all that he glances upon in this chapter: and thinks it is a caution against wisting in ceremonious worship, without moral virtue. Concerning which he says so many things, useful for these present times, that I cannot but here give the sum of them.

There are three sorts of works saith he, mentioned by the prophets, concerning ceremonials, and concerning moral virtue, and concerning faith. For the first of these, ceremonials, or external signs, God instituted some for two causes: first, that they should be signs of the promises; secondly, that they should be the nerves of the public congregation: because God would not have his church be hid in obscurity, but he commanded his disciples to differ from all nations, other nations, voce et ceremonia. But here we must prudently consider how ceremonies are to be used; because men are prone to false worship, and especially to the abuse of ceremonies: which they take for righteousness, and think thereby to merit remission of sin: which persuasion spread itself largely among mankind in the heathen world, among the pharisaical Jews, and in the Roman church. Yet the wiser hitherto themselves corrected this error, of trusting to ceremonies without moral good works. Plato, for instance, saith, that "God loves worshippers ον εσπημα πτωχοτος, διδασκαλικον των προσαργών, not that can artificially compliment him with gestures and outward shows; but that in truth, honour, and virtue." But the scripture goes a great deal farther; and teaches us also to add faith in God, and in our Lord Jesus Christ. Moral good works will please God, when done for this end: not that we may merit thereby remission of sin, but that we may be obedient to God, and teach others to know him, and to celebrate him. And there are also ceremonies instituted by God, are pleasing to him, when they are done for this end, not to merit remission: but, because they are signs admonishing us of the promises, to stir up our faith; and likewise because they are signs of ceremonies, "signs of what religion we profess;" and, lastly, quite suit nati congregations, because "they are the nerves whereby the congregation" of Christian people are joined together, and preserved in unity. These true ends, saith he, ought to be understood by the church, and impions opinions to be removed. And for such good ends, one would think none should question, much less quarrel with those few ceremonies which our church hath imposed on the name of God's service. That this was his opinion, also, appears in his comments upon the fiftieth Psalm: where he saith, that "even human ceremonies are, in some sort, the nerves of discipline:" and condemns only those that make them effectual for the remission of sin. But his mind is delivered most fully, in a discourse which I find in the second volume of his works, concerning the method of preaching: where he directs preachers to tell the people in general, that all ceremonies are not to be abolished: as appears by this, that then we must take away baptism and the cu-
CHAPTER XV.

7 The lips of the wise disperse knowledge: but the heart of the foolish doeth not so.

8 The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord: but the prayer of the upright is his delight.

9 The way of the wicked is an abomination in to be despatched at once; the servants are in an uproar, the whole house rises, and there is nothing well done in that confusion."

[c] The two verses before this some have connected; but there is no necessity of it; though it be a great truth, that passionate men are apt to make disturbance even at feasts; which men of temperate spirits endeavour to appease, though affronts be offered them. Accordingly Seneca gives that excellent advice of Seneca, "let dissension begin from others, but reconciliation from thee." It is there observed by Bochartus (lib. ii. De Animalibus Sacris, cap. 32, par. 1.), that herba, or, as some translate it, green pottage, was the poorest; and an ox put up into a stall, and there fitted (or, as the Talmudists understand the phrase, a crammed ox), the noblest entertainment in those countries. For it is reckoned among the provision made for the tables of Solomon and Nebuchadnezzar; and in the New Testament, the marriage provision which the king made at his son's wedding were oxen and faddings (Matt. xxii. 4); and the fatted calf was brought forth to entertain the returning penitent. An ox in those countries was in other countries, as he observes out of Dioscorides: who notes, that Homer never sets any other cheer before his heroes but this; no, not at marriages or any other meeting: though he introduces Agamemnon often treating the princes of Greece.

Ver. 1.] A mild, submissive, and yielding answer, to him who severely chides, pacifies wrath, and prevents the farther progress of it: but sharp, contemptuous, and saucy language, incenses it more, or raises a passion, where there was none before. See Arg. [d]

Ver. 2.] A wise man gives profitable instructions, and understands also how to speak so sensibly and prudently, that it shall make the knowledge he imparts both acceptable and useful; whereas fools have nothing but silly stuff to utter; or pour out their thoughts so indiscreetly and confusedly that they only serve abundantly to declare their folly.

Ver. 3.] There is nothing either in heaven or earth that can be more offensive, than a man, whom the world holds to be wise, or the wisest, who is everywhere, and observes the most secret motions and actions of men both good and bad.

Ver. 4.] He skillfully employs his tongue to give wholesome instructions, especially to heal differences and make peace, is an incomparable blessing to the place where he lives, and makes it a paradise: but he that abuses his tongue, to poison men with ill principles, to lie, to calumniate, to make hatreds, doth most miserably disturb mankind, and (like a blighting wind) blasts all the comforts of their life.

Ver. 5.] He that regards not, or rejects, the instruction of his father, or tutor, or superior, whose love is equal to his authority, will always be a fool: but he that is willing to receive even rebukes, from whomsoever they come, and carefully observe them, hath already attained a great degree of wisdom; and prudently consults his own welfare and happiness.

Ver. 6.] A truly just and merciful man is very rich, whether he hath little or much; because he is well contented, and what he hath is likely to continue in his family; but there is much disquiet and trouble in the greatest revenues of the wicked; which can neither stay long with him, nor give him any satisfaction while he enjoys them.
unto the Lord: but he loveth him that followeth after righteousness.

10 Correction is grievous unto him that forsaketh the way: and he that hateth reproof shall die.

11 Hell and destruction are before the Lord: how much more then the hearts of the children of men?

12 A nearer lovethe not one that reproveth him: neither will he go unto the wise.

13 A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance: but by sorrow of the heart the spirit is broken.

14 The heart of him that hath understanding seeketh knowledge: but the mouth of fools feedeth on foolishness.

15 All the days of the afflicted are evil: but he that is of a merry heart hath a continual feast.

16 Better is little with the fear of the Lord, than great treasure and trouble therewith.

17 Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.

18 A wrathful man stirreth up strife: but he that is slow to anger appeaseth strife.

19 The way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns: but the way of the righteous is made plain.

20 A wise son maketh a glad father: but a foolish man despiseth his mother.

21 Folly is joy to him that is destitute of wisdom: but a man of understanding walketh up-rightly.

CHAPTER XVI.

1 The preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the LORD.

CHAP. XVI.

ARGUMENT.—[a] This chapter begins with a most necessary observation, which a good man ought always to have in his mind (for which cause it is repeated, with little difference, twice more in this chapter, ver. 9, 33, and again ch. xix. 21), the sense of which our translation seems to have missed. For it ascribes both the preparation of the heart, and the answer of the tongue unto the Lord (which is true in this regard, that without him we can do nothing); whereas the Hebrew words run plainly thus, man hath the disposing of the heart; he may, with God's leave and common assistance, intend, propound, resolve within himself, what he will say and do; but that he shall be able to utter things in that order he hath premeditated; or, if he be able, shall attain the end of his deliberation, and eloquent speech, is more than he can undertake; for that is as the Lord pleaseth. This seems to me to be better opened by Melanchton than any one I have read. Who truly observes, that such sayings as these do not take away the liberty of man's will or choice; but only show, that even the best men sometimes err in their choice; and that the success doth not always answer. For we must diligently distinguish, saith he, between our election and the success; and remember, that we need a double help of God, for the making a happy choice: one of judging right, and the other afterward of governing events. For unless our judgment be ruled right, many errors happen; as we see in Josiah, Zedekiah, Demosthenes, Pompej, Cicero; who all ered in eligendo bello. "in their pleasure, both to himself and others), to have given it so seasonably, that a business was easily effected by it, which had not been done without it.

Ver. 21.] The way to be perfectly happy, a truly wise man sees, is to raise his thoughts, desires, and hopes above this earth, and to have respect to God in all his actions; which will make him truly noble and great; and preserve him both from all mean and base practices, and from the most horrid dangers here, and utter destruction hereafter.

Ver. 25.] Trust not in riches and power, but in the great Lord of the world, who possesses and disposes all things; for he will overturn the family of haughty men (who, forgetting him, trample upon their inferiors), though never so strongly supported: but will preserve the poor widow, who hath no helper, in her right, when such insolent persons invade it.

Ver. 26.] For the Lord abhors all wicked designs, and mischievous contrivances: but the kind consultations and discourses of such as seek the welfare and comfort of others are no less pleasing to him than they are pure.

Ver. 27.] He that is so greedy of money, that he cares not how he gets it, instead of raising his family, confounds it; but he that hangeth bribes, and all unlawful ways of gain, shall prosper, and continue it.

Ver. 28.] A good man thinks it is soon enough to speak, when he is asked about a business, and deliberates within himself to speak nothing that is not to the purpose: but bad men are rash, and forward to utter their mind; and generally do more hurt than good.

Ver. 29.] The Lord is far from giving any regard to the wicked, whose business it is to do evil, though they implore his favour: but sends good men help, when they pray unto him, as readily as they were wont to send relief to others.

Ver. 30.] It is a wonderful pleasure to behold all the beautiful works of God, which present themselves to our eyes: but nothing gives such intimate satisfaction, and makes a man so cheerful in well-doing, as to hear a fair report of his own honest actions; or to receive the good news of the well-doing of other virtuous men.

Ver. 31.] He that lends an attentive ear to wholesome reproof, and is obedient to it, is to be numbered among the wise, and shall at last be able to give good instructions unto others.

Ver. 32.] And whosoever he be that refuseth, much more that contemneth, such instructions and reproves, he sets his own soul at naught, and desipeth the means of safety: but he that diligently hearkens to it, knows what is good for himself, and keeps his soul from being lost for want of understanding.

Ver. 33.] A brief instruction of wisdom and virtue is this, to have an awful sense of God; with a devout affection to him, and fear to offend him: and as this is the best disposition for wisdom; so humility, and patient submission, in a low condition, is the best preparation for honour and preferment.
3 Commit thy works unto the Lord, and thy thoughts shall be established.

and besides, God hath armed kings with a power to make laws of their own, not repugnant to his laws; but built upon them, either by demonstrations, or probable reasons. God sometimes moves the mind of kings also, and gives them singular motions (as other excellent artisans have), because he will by that means save mankind, &c. Thus it was a singular motion in Solomon's reasoning about the mother of the child. And in the judgment of Gonzaga, in the last age, upon the Spanish governor of Milan under him; who having held a noble person captive a long time, would not deliver him to his wife (when she petitioned and offered a large sum of money for his redemption), unless he might lie with her; and after he had obtained his desire, then caused her husband to be killed, and delivered him dead to her. Which when Gonzaga heard, and had examined, he compelled him to marry this woman; and as soon as he had done that, he condemned him to be immediately beheaded, and gave her all his estate.

But we are not from such places as this to infer, that kings cannot give a wrong judgment: though this be as good a conclusion as from these words, the priest's lips shall preserve knowledge, to conclude that Solomon was a different man from other kings; for Solomon may as well pretend to infallibility, as priests from that place of Malachi. Nay, if we respect either the form of this precept, or the plenitude of God's promise for ability to perform it, we must confess, this place is more plain and peremptory for kings, than any can be brought for the highpriestly infallibility, in giving definitive sentences. And yet all the places (as a famous divine of our own speaks, Dr. Jackson, book iii. upon the Creed, ch. 19) that can be brought either for the king's or priest's authority, rather show what manner of men they should be both in life and judgment, than assure them of any infallibility of judgment, if they be absolute in life, and regard not the laws of God. True, the great authority of any, still the notoriously infamous lives of popes discredited the titles of sanctity and infallibility (which from the conceit of their predecessors' integrity, they had usurped), and enforced their flatterers to frame a distinction of sanctity in doctrine, separated from sanctity of life. I thought it not amiss to say thus much upon this subject, because I find even Maldonate himself, in his notes upon this place, hath the confidence to conclude that the pope must needs have this privilege, which is promised to kings; when it is apparent kings are not infallible: and consequently, by his own reasoning, popes cannot be so.

There is another notable sentence, which would deserve a larger gloss than I have given in this paraphrase; which I must pass by, because this preface is already prolonged to a great length.

[c] I must omit Melanchton's glosses upon this verse, and shall only premise that I may have room for his pertinent observation upon ver. 10. "A divine sentence is in the lips of the king," &c. These words (says he) affirm the whole political order, magistrates, laws, distinction of dominions, contracts, judgments, punishments, to be things ordained by the wisdom of God among men. And since we know political order to be the work of God, we ought to love it, and study to defend it; and modestly for God's sake obey it; and give thanks to God who preserves it; and look upon those horrible furies of the devil and men, who disturb this order, to be displeasing to God: as this whole doctrine is explained, Rom. xi. 36. But what is this divine sentence in the king's lips? It is the laws (says he); and judgments according to the laws:

5. Every one that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord; though hand join in hand, he shall not be unpunished.
6. By mercy and truth iniquity is purged; and by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil.
7. When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him.

Lord Bacon (Adv. of Learning, book vi. ch. 3), not obscurely, that "profoundness of wisdom may help men to fame and admiration: but it is eloquence which prevails in business and active life."

[c] The other is verse 26, where I have put two senses together, according to the different acceptations of the Hebrew word amath, which signifies either to take pains or to be without sound. But I can see no reason why Maldonat should favour the LXX. translation; who against the stream of all other interpreters, apply these words to an ungodly man's digging up evil to himself, as if the meaning were, he digs a pit for himself, and the words he speaks are the cause of his punishment, as if he were born: unless ersonated from his fundations for the Spanish inquisition, which he was desirous to introduce every where. The very best of them, it appears by him (who was one of the most learned and judicious interpreters in the Romish church), are most devoutly bent to our destruction: for he cannot forbear here to allege that inquisition as a proof of the ungodliness of the Spanish inquisitions, Hispantium perspicuum est, &c. "This is apparent by the example of the Spanish inquisition," whereby he that speaks any thing rashly against the faith, is deservedly delivered to the fire; which I wish were done everywhere.—Thus, in the most literal sense, this Jesuit's lips are as a burning fire; in which he would have us not only singed, but devoured: in pursuance of this maxim of Solomon. Which others honestly interpret of those calumnies, discords, seditions, which evil men raise by their tongues, to the destruction of their neighbours. For so it follows (verse 29), "A froward man soweth strife," &c.

Ver. 1.] Men may deliberate, and contrive, and order in their mind, what, and in what manner and method they will speak: but whether they shall persuade and prevail or not for such an answer as they expect, may, be able to deliver themselves with such eloquence as they imagine, cannot be resolved by them, but depends upon the pleasure of the Lord. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 2.] Such is the blindness of self-love, that men can find no fault in themselves; but imagine all that they contrive and do, to be free from blame; which, when the Lord examines, who searches into the very intentions of men's hearts, is found to be very defective, if not vicious.

Ver. 3.] When thou undertakest any thing, implore the divine blessing; and committing the success of it to God's providence, leave it to him to give what issue to it he pleaseth: which is the surest way to have thy honest designs accomplished.

Ver. 4.] The Lord disposeth all things throughout the world to serve such ends, as he thinks fit to design; which they cannot refuse to comply withal; for if any men be so wicked as to oppose his will, he will not lose their service: but when he brings a public calamity upon a country, employ them to be the executioners of his wrath. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 5.] There is no man so great, but if his mind grow lofty and arrogant, forgetting God, and insolently oppressing his neighbour, he is hateful beyond all expression unto the Lord; who will take vengeance on him, and pull him down, though he make never so strong confederates to support himself: for if he avoid the judgment, another shall overtake him: nay, his wickedness shall perish him from generation to generation (xi. 21).

Ver. 6.] The most effectual means to appease men's anger for private offences, or to divert the anger of God in public calamities, is to exercise mercy and loving-kindness, with justice and faithful performance of promises; especially when they proceed from an awful regard to God, and religious dread of his displeasure; which will make a man careful to decline every thing that is evil, and thereby escape the punishment that attends upon it.

Ver. 7.] The best way to have our enemies reconciled unto us, is for us to be reconciled unto God: for such is that tenderness of mercy, and such is the love which the Lord hath to virtuous persons, that when all their designs and actions are such as he approves, he inclines even those that were their foes to become their friends.

Ver. 8.] A small estate honestly gotten, and charitably enjoyed, is much to be preferred before vast incomes heaps up by oppression, and kept without hospitality.

Ver. 9.] The mind of man designs an end, and contrives what means to use, and reckons perhaps what success they will have: but the Lord determines what the event shall be, and orders his motions perhaps to such an issue, as never came into his thoughts.

Ver. 10.] God is present in a singular manner unto a pious king, inspiring his mind to divine sagacity in doubtful and obscure things; that his resolutions and decrees may be received like oracles; and all causes be decided by him so justly and exactly, that no man can be wronged in the judgment which he passes.

Ver. 11.] And it is worthy of his care, that there be no corruption in private no more than in public justice; for it also is of divine institution: the great Lord of all requiring just and equal dealings in all our commerce one with another; which he hath ordained should be managed with scrupulous integrity, in the smallest, as well as in the greatest matters.

Ver. 12.] It is not enough to good kings that they do no injury; but they abate with the highest detestation, all oppression, cruelty, extortion, &c. not only in themselves but in others; for they know that justice, mercy, and true religion, support their authority, and make their kingdoms durable.

Ver. 13.] And calumniators, or flatterers, find no acceptance with such princes; but they delight in those that will not deceive them by false, unjust, and malicious informations; and make him their favourite.
PROVERBS.

15 In the light of the king's countenance is life; and his favour is as a cloud of the latter rain.

16 How much better is it to get wisdom than gold? and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver?

17 The highway of the upright is to depart from evil: he that keepeth his way preserves his soul.

18 Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall.

19 Better is it to be of an humble spirit with the lowly, than to divide the spoil with the proud.
20 He that handleth a matter wisely shall find good; and whoso trusteth in the Lord, happy is he.

21 The wise in heart shall be called prudent; and the sweetness of the lips increaseth learning.

who deals sincerely, and tells them the truth, though it may seem ungrateful to them.

Ver. 14.] The wrath of a king strikes such terror into him, with whom he is offended, as if the sentence of death were pronounced against him: but, as ill men and fools exasperate it the more, so a virtuous and prudent courtier appeases his anger, and makes a reconciliation.

Ver. 15.] And when a king will be pleased to look graciously upon a man, especially after he hath been incensed against him, it not only revives, but gives him the greatest joy; for from his favour he promises himself all manner of happiness; as a plentiful harvest follows the showers of rain, which, in the spring, refresh the corn.

Ver. 16.] But, after all is done, to get so much wisdom as to know the difference between good and evil, and to understand how to behave a man's self upon all occasions is, beyond all expression, better, and more to be chosen, than the greatest treasures of gold and silver, which either the favour of princes can give, or his own industry acquire.

Ver. 17.] This is the constant aim and endeavour of upright men, the beaten path, as we may call it, in which they travel, to decline every thing that is evil: and he who makes this his care, looking well to all his actions, that he do nothing amiss, looks well to himself, and preserves his soul and body from destruction.

Ver. 18.] Insolent behaviour is the forerunner of utter destruction: and when men lift up themselves in their own thoughts, and overlook all others with contempt, they are in the greatest danger to stumble; and not to see that which will give them such a grievous downfall, as will break them all to shivers.

Ver. 19.] Therefore it is much better to submit to the meanest condition, nay, patiently to bear injuries, with afflicted, but meek and lowly persons, than to lift one's self to the prejudice of others, and by trampling upon them to partake with the proud in their rapine and spoil.

Ver. 20.] He that understands his business thoroughly, and manages it prudently and discreetly, is likely to have good success; but none so happy, none so sure of prospering in his design, as he that confides more in the Lord than in his own skill and industry.

Ver. 21.] He whose mind is well furnished with wisdom, cannot but win a great reputation, and be highly esteemed for his prudent counsels and resolutions: but if he have the powerful charms of eloquence also, to convey his mind delightfully unto others, it will add a greater value to his wisdom, and make it more diffuse and instructive unto the world. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 22.] A clear understanding and right judgment of things, like an inexhaustible spring, gives perpetual comfort and satisfaction to him in whom it is; and makes him very useful unto others: but the deadly and destructive vileness and vanity, and therefore if they undertake to instruct others, they only make them like themselves.

Ver. 23.] The mind of a wise man instructs him to speak judiciously and pertinently: and make him not only communicate his thoughts to others, but with such weight of reason as increases their learning.

Ver. 24.] Especially when he can deliver his mind in pleasing and delightful words, flowing from him with a natural eloquence, as honey drops from thecomb: which ravish the affections, and touch a man's heart to the very quick; when he needs either comfort or cure for any inward disease wherewith he labours.

Ver. 25.] But there is never more need of caution, than when we hear a moving orator; therefore this instruction may be here necessary to be repeated (xiv. 12), examine every thing strictly and impartially; and be not led away merely by thy fancy and thy appetite; for they make many things seem innocent, which, in themselves, and in the issue, are deadly and destructive.

Ver. 26.] It is a powerful motive to a man to take pains in an honest employment, that all his labour is for his own preservation; his mouth begging this favour of him, that he may not starve: and, on the contrary, he that spends his time in giving trouble and vexation unto others, will find it fall upon himself: for he cannot speak so much as an evil word, but it will return upon him, and fly back in his own face. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 27.] And it is not a little pains that an ungodly lawless man takes, to plot and devise mischief; wherein he labours, as if he was digging for a treasure; and one way is, to brand his neighbour with false names and slanders, and thereby utterly destroy his reputation.

Ver. 28.] Others of them have such a perverseness in their spirit, that it is their business to disturb the world and raise dissensions among those that would live in peace; by backbiting, detracting, and whispering false stories making a breach even between princes and people, husband and wife, nay, the dearest friends and familiars, if they hearken to their tales.
CHAPTER XVII.

30 He shutteth his eyes to devise froward things; moving his lips, he bringeth evil to pass.
31 The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness.
32 He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.
33 The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord.

Ver. 29.] Another sort live by rapine and open violence; who are not content to do wrong themselves, but persuade others to enter into their society; and then lead them into the most pernicious courses.

Ver. 30.] Which they do not fall into by chance; but with profound study contrive the ruin of others; and the sign being given, they furiously execute the mischief they have designed.

Ver. 31.] Old age is very venerable, when a man's past life hath been truly virtuous and useful: which is the best way also to prolong one's days: and bring one to that great honour which is due to those who have long done much good to mankind.

Ver. 32.] He that can suppress the vehement motions of anger, deserves more praise than those mighty men who quell the enemies that oppose them: and he that hath power to govern all his own inclinations, affections, and passions, by reason, hath a nobler empire than he that subdues cities and countries by force of arms.

Ver. 33.] Acknowledge the divine providence in all things, even in those which seem most casual: for though men cast the lots into the lap of a garment, or into a hollow vessel, and thence draw them out again; yet is it the Lord who directs entirely in what order they shall come forth, and so determines the matter in doubt according to his pleasure.

CHAPTER XVII.

1 Better is a dry morsel, and quietness therewith, than an house full of sacrifices with strife.

CHAP. XVII.

Argument.—In the first verse of this chapter, the wise man observes how happy that family is which lives in peace and perfect agreement one with another; though they have not a mean estate. And next to this how happy a thing it is if there be but one wise and virtuous man in a family (suppose he be but a servant) when any dissensions and differences arise in it. For so the lord Bacon (Advane, of Learning, book viii. ch. 3, parab. 2), expresses [a] the second verse; whose words I will set down, because if they hit not the sense completely, yet they very pitifully express a part of it, and carry in them a very important truth. "In all troubled and disagreeing families (saith he) there is commonly some servant or gentle friend, who, being powerful with both sides, may moderate and compose the differences that are among them. To whom, in that respect, the whole house, and the master himself, are much engaged and beholden. This servant, if he aim only at his own ends, cherishes and aggravates the divisions of the family: but if he be sincerely faithful and upright, certainly he deserveth much; so as to be reckoned as one of the brethren; or at least to receive a fiduciary administration of the inheritance."

[b] And after some other documents, there follows a notable rule for the making peace, and ending all differences; whether between particular persons in families, or between kingdoms (ver. 9); upon which the same great person thus glosses (ib. parab. 27), "There are two ways of proceeding to arbitrate differences and reconcile affections. The one begins with an act of oblivion of what is past; the other begins with a repetition of wrongs, subjoining apologies and excuses. Now some think this last to be the only way; insomuch, that I have heard a prudent person and great statesman lay down this maxim: He that treats of peace, without a recapitulation of former differences, rather deceives men's minds with the sweet name of agreement, than composeth them by equity and moderation of right. But Solomon, a wiser man than he, is of a contrary opinion; approving an act of oblivion, and forbidding repetition. For in repetition, or renewing the memory of the causes of difference, there are these inconveniences: not only that it is, as we say, unguis in ulcer, 'raking in the ulcer,' which very much exacerbates, but also endangers the breeding of new quarrels while they are debating the old (for the parties at difference will never accord about the terms of their falling out); and lastly, in the issue it brings the matter to apologies: whereas both the one and the other party would seem rather to have revil'd the offence, than to have admitted excuses for it."

Melancthon thinks this and the next three verses, 10—15, to be sentences near of kin; all belonging to the right method in judging, which is comprehended in that saying of Christ's, "If thy brother sin against thee, tell him of it between thyself and him;" and interprets this ninth verse thus (taking chafing for there, which we translate chief friends): He that eagerly admonisheth him that ereth, cures him, and makes no public disturbance; saves the man, and preserves public concord: but this order being neglected, thence arises out of brawlings, discords of princes, wars, and devastations.

[c] Now an evil man only seeks scoldings or contentions (as it follows, ver. 11); i. e., saith he, he doth not seek truth, nor the good of the church, but troubles without end. Thus Cleon and Aleibiades in the state, scetrred seeds of war at Athens: the cynics and academies contradicted every body among the philosophers: and lately, Valla, Cornelius Agrippa, Carolostadius, &c., had the like scolding natures. They seek not truth; but contradict things rightly spoken, or wantonly move unnecessary disputes, and will not yield when they are admonished, but with greater rage defend their errors. Of such Solomon here saith in the next verse, "it is better to meet a bear robbed of her whelps, than a fool in his folly." An example of which we meet withal in our times with a new witched papist, who defends the most manifest errors. Thus he. But that which the Vulgar translates semper jurgia
3 The fining pot is for silver, and the furnace for gold: but the Lorō trieth the hearts.
4 A wicked doer giveth heed to false lips; and a liar giveth ear to a naughty tongue.
5 Whoso mocketh the poor reproacheth his Maker; and he that is glad at calamities shall not be unpunished.

The truth of the next verse (ver. 12) is admirably opened by Bochartus (lib. iii. De Animal. Sacrif., cap. 9, par. i.) who observes four things concerning the bear, out of good authors. The first every one knows, that a bear is an exceeding fierce creature: the second is, that the female is more fierce than the male: the third, that she is more fierce than ordinary, when she hath whelps: and lastly, that when she is robbed of them she is fiercest of all, immemorial in modum, "even unto rage and madness." The scripture notices of two other places besides this, 2 Sam. xvii. 8; Hosen xii. 8, where St. Jerome observes that the writers of natural history say, among all wild beasts none more fierce and cruel than the bear, in two cases especially, when she wants food, and when she is robbed of her whelps. The reason of this last is that parents; which will agree more with the comparison which the wise man here makes: for a bear cannot be more in love with her whelps, than a fool is with his absurd opinions and resolutions: and as a bear falls upon the next person she meets withal, taking him for the robber; so dodd a fool upon every one that stands in his way, though he be never so much obliged to him. He spareth none in the heat of his passions, but furiously abuseth them, &c.

[6] Unto what is expressed in the paraphrase upon ver. 17, concerning "a brother being born for adversity" (which I have referred, as the best interpreters do, unto a friend), this may be added, as the plainest translation of the Hebrew words: "He that is a true friend (spoken of before) is born (that is, becometh) a brother in adversity." He was a friend before; this makes him a brother; and so he is to be esteemed.

[7] There is a phrase in the nineteenth verse, "exalteth his gate," which is variously taken by interpreters. I have expounded it literally; not for the mouth, but for the gate of a house or other place; and have put two senses together.

[8] Various glosses also have been made upon the beginning of ver. 22, "a merry heart doth good like a medicine:" where, because the particle like is wanting in the Hebrew, other constructions have been made of the words; some, for instance, having taken them thus; "a merry heart makes a medicine work better," or do more good. But he that can consult Bochartus (in his second book of Sacred Animals, ch. 16, par. ii.) may find so many examples of the effect of that which they call amor similitudinis; that he will not think it unaccountable to supply it (as our translators have done) in this place of the Proverbs.

6 Children's children are the crown of old men; and the glory of children are their fathers.
7 Excellent speech becometh not a fool: much less do lying lips a prince.
8 A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it; whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth.

Just before in the twenty-first, I shall here observe, that there is no doubt but Solomon, having frequent occasions to speak of the same matter, varied the words sometimes, but not the sense; and so the collectors of his sayings put down both. And he might speak the other of this matter, having an example before his eyes of the great weakness of his own son; who, it is not unlikely, was a perpetual grief to him. There is also something observable in this verse, which was not in the other, viz. that the untowardness of children have many times different effects upon the parents: provoking the fathers to anger and exasperation; and the mothers to grief and sorrow, to which their tenderness more inclines them than to the other passion. There are several ways also of expounding the latter end of this verse, viz. when it is, "Children's children are the crown of old men; and the glory of children are their fathers." I have expressed the sense of our translation; and had respect, in the next verse to that (ver. 27), to both readings of the word which we render "excellent."

Ver. 1. There is more satisfaction in a bit of dry bread (without butter or oil, &c.) in the open field, and in the hand of the poor, than in a house full of the best cheer in the world, attended with brawling, contention, and strife.

Ver. 2. Proximity and prudence are so much better than mere riches and noble birth, that a wise and faithful servant sometimes arrives at the honour of being appointed the governor of a son, whose folly and wickedness makes him a discredit to his family; nay, he is left not only executor of the father's will, or trustee for the children; but his merit, perhaps, are rewarded with a portion of the estate, which is to be distributed among them. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 3. The art of man hath found out means to prove whether gold and silver be pure or not; but the heart of the children is a deeper and more inscrutable than that of the best man, to understand and discover what they are by sharp afflictions and troubles.

Ver. 4. A man that designs evil unto others, hearkens greedily unto him that will tell false and mischievous stories; and there never wants such a man, of the very same mind with himself; for he who gives his mind to lying and falsehood, listens to him that speaks the most pestilent things.

Ver. 5. He that derides a man because he is poor, forgets God, who can bring him down to as low a condition; nay, affronts his majesty, who hath promised to take a peculiar care of such friendless persons: nor is he much better, who rejoiceth at the calamity of others, which will bring unavoidable punishments upon himself.

Ver. 6. The honour and comfort of parents lie in a numerous progeny, which doth not degenerate from their ancestors' virtue; and that which makes children illustrious, is their being descended from worthy parents; whose wisdom and virtue reflect an honour upon their posterity.

Ver. 7. It doth not become a fool to discourse of grave and weighty matters; which, as they are above him, so are not regarded out of his mouth, though he
CHAPTER XVII.

9 He that covereth a transgression seeketh love; but he that repeateth a matter separateth very friends.
10 A reproof entereth more into a wise man than an hundred stripes into a fool.
11 An evil man seeketh only rebellion: therefore a cruel messenger shall be sent against him.
12 Let a bear robbed of her whelps meet a man, rather than a fool in his folly.
13 Whoso rewardeth evil for good, evil shall not depart from his house.
14 The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water: therefore leave off contention, before it be meddled with.
15 He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the just, even they both are abomination to the Lord.
16 Wherefore is there a price in the hand of a fool to get wisdom, seeing he hath no heart to it?

should speak excellent things; but it is much less seemly for a prince to be lie and deceive; which, as it is below him who represents the God of truth, so it makes him despicable, and destroys his authority, when his subjects cannot rely upon his word.

Ver. 8.] A gift is so tempting, that it can no more be refused than a lovely jewel by him to whom it is presented: and such is its power, it commonly prevails over all men, despatches all business, carries all causes; and, in a word, effects whatsoever a man desires.

Ver. 9.] He that passes by and buries in oblivion a transgression that hath been committed against him, takes the best course to preserve friendship, and to make himself universally beloved; but he who takes up that fault again, and objects it fresh when it was forgotten, breaks the strictest bands of amity, and makes an irreconcilable separation. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 10.] One reproof penetrates deeper into the mind of an ingenuous man, and works a greater alteration there, than a hundred stripes will do for the amendment of an obstinate fool.

Ver. 11.] Who seeking nothing but to have his own will, and being so refractory, that he hath shaken off all restraints, or to his governors, is wholly bent upon mischief, and cannot be restrained: it remains therefore only, that a severe execution be done upon him to cut him off in his folly, without mercy. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 12.] There is less danger in meeting a bear in the height of her rage, than a furious fool in the pursuit of his unruly passions and desires: for it is possible to defend a man's self against the one; but there is no way to hinder the brutish motions of the other. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 13.] It is so unnatural for a man to return evil to him from whom he hath received nothing but good, that the punishment of his ingratitude shall not rest in his own person, but descend upon his posterity to all generations.

Ver. 14.] When men begin a quarrel or a difference, they know not where it will end: for the very first breach is like cutting the banks of a river, which presently overflows the neighbouring grounds, but cannot easily be reduced into its bounds again. It is best therefore to make peace immediately, before both parties be involved in such troubles, as, like a deluge of water, lay all desolate.

Ver. 15.] It is hard to say, which is most detestable to the Lord, he that pleads for a wicked man, and, more than that, acquires him; or he that pleads against the righteous, may, plainly condemns him. Certain it is, they are both most highly obnoxious to his disapprobation, who is the fountain of justice; and, as he would have it exactly administered, so he hates those who endeavour to confound the nature of good and evil among men.

Ver. 16.] What good doth a great estate in the possession of a fool? Can he therewith purchase wisdom how to use it? alas! he wants understanding to desire it, and to procure good instructors, in which his riches (if his mind were good) might be serviceable to him.

Ver. 17.] Time makes proof of a friend; who, if he be sincere, loves not merely for a fit, nor alters with the change of one's condition; but continues steadfast in adversity, as well as in prosperity: nay, in straits and distresses, shows himself more like a brother than a friend. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 18.] He is very inconsiderate, whose kindness makes him forward to pass his word for the payment of another man's debts (vi. 1, xi. 15), and especially to enter into bonds in the presence of his neighbour for whom he engages: which may make him more careless about the payment than he would have been, if unknown to him he had been security for him.

Ver. 19.] He vainly pretends to the love of pitty, who accustomed himself to bawling and contention: which as necessarily draw along with them abundance of sins, as lifting up a man's self above his estate, in raising sumptuous buildings, brings him to ruin; or as breach of the public peace opens wide the flood-gates to all iniquity. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 20.] A man of wicked designs, which he resolves to accomplish by any sort of means, shall find himself deceived in his expectation: and he who employs his tongue to deceit and fraud, pretending fair to men before their face, but blustering them behind their back, shall, by that very means, bring mischief upon himself.

Ver. 21.] Great is the care which ought to be taken in the contract of marriage, and in the education of children: for if a son prove vicious and lewd, it will be such an inexpressible grief to his father, that he will take no comfort at all in any thing he enjoys (ver. 29).

Ver. 22.] And consequently it will shorten his days; for as nothing conduces more to health than a cheerful spirit, which serves instead of physic; so nothing destroys it more than sadness and grief, which con-

CHAPTER XVIII.

I Through desire a man, having separated himself, seeketh; and intermeddles with all wisdom.

CHAP. XVIII.

ARGUMENT.—[a] There is so much difficulty in the first two verses, which hath produced so many various interpretations, that I scarce know which to follow. Some take that word which we translate separateth himself, in a good sense; others in a bad: I have chosen the latter, because it seems so more agreeable to the rest of the words. But the Chaldee interpreter gives a quite different sense, both of that word, and of some other in these verses: and De Dieu hath shown there is such reason for it, that I think I was obliged here to take notice of it, and to paraphrase upon it.

By niphrad, which we render separateth himself, he understands a man divided, uncertain in his own mind, who can stick to nothing; but wanders about in his own thoughts. And the last word in the first verse, jithgalla, which we translate intermeddles, he translates, is left desolate. And in the next verse, taking behith galtot for wandering up and down, not for discovering or revealing, as we do, the paraphrase will run thus:—

Ver. 1. An inconstant man desires many things, and seeks satisfaction: but whatsoever he seeks, he never meets with it, but is defeated and disappointed in all his designs.

Ver. 2. And this is a certain character of a fool, that he never fixes in any thing; but chooses rather to gad up and down, and rove from one inquiry to another, than give his mind, to true wisdom and prudence, in which he hath no pleasure.

The Lord Bacon aims at this, I suppose, when he briefly expresses the sense of Solomon thus: Pro desiderio ornat cereris, omnibus immiserit se: "A hare-brained man seeks to satisfy his fancy, and intermixeth himself with all things." According to that of Seneca, Vite sine proposito, languida est et vagia: "A life that proposeth no end to pursue, is faint, sickly, and vagrant."

It is the word niphrad in a good sense, then the paraphrase must run thus:—

2 A fool hath no delight in understanding, but that his heart may discover itself.

Ver. 1. He that lives retired and sequesters himself from all company and business, out of a true affection to wisdom, endeavour to have a sound knowledge and understanding of things.

Ver. 2. But a vain man addicteth himself to his studies, for no other end but only to vaunt with a show of wisdom, which he doth not love.

[a] As for the Vulgar translation, it is so remote from the Hebrew, that I shall only observe a handsome application which the Lord Bacon hath made of the second verse, to a quite different purpose from all interpreters that I am acquainted with. The words there run thus: Non recipit studium verba prudentium, nisi ea dixerit qua versatur in corde ejus. Which is commonly understood of "accommodating one's self to the humour of a fool," who otherwise will not regard what is said to him: but that great man applies to the ways of dealing "with men of corrupt minds and depraved judgments." "Who presuppose that honesty grows out of weakness of wit, and want of experience; or only out of a silly belief given to preachers and schoolmasters, to books and popular opinions. And, therefore, unless you can make them plainly perceive that you know what is in their very heart, when you exhort and admonish them; and are as well acquainted with their depraved principles and crooked rules, and leave us fully discovered and deeply sounded them as themselves, they will despise all manner of virtue and the most excellent counsels; according to that admirable oracle of Solomon, A fool will not receive the words of the wise unless thou speakest the very things that are in his heart;" i.e. an honest man can do no good upon the wicked unless he know all the covers and depths of wickedness. In which Machiavel himself hath done some service; by discovering plainly what men used to do, not what they ought to do. (Advanc. of Learning, book vii. ch. 2.)

[b] The next verse may have a connexion with these two, and intend to describe the worst of wicked men, who seek for glory by being so bold as to soen religion, and all the teachers of it. Such men are the most of Solomon's fools: in whom an excellent person (whom the Hebrews call zæc, in opposition to Adam) should not be discouraged from pouring out good instructions, as he shows in the following words (verse 4).

[†] Then, after a caution to judges (ver. 5), to search into the merits of a cause, and not merely to look to the quality of the person that appears before them; he observes in several of the mischiefs done by the tongue, ver. 6—8. In the last of which the word mithkalahamin, being of uncertain signification (because it is but once more used, and in this book, to the same purpose), I have taken in two or three of the senses of which it is capable: as he that pleases to examine will be satisfied.

[‡] Rabbi Levi observes, that in the tenth verse there begins another sort of precepts of a different kind from those that have been hitherto delivered from the beginning of the tenth chapter to this place. All which have been in a manner concerning the danger of such vices, as sloth, hatred, anger, envy, being hairbrained, and such mischiefs in parts of that folly, against which he hath given many general cautions. But now he proceeds, as that Jewish doctor thinks, to an argument of another nature, directing men in the management of affairs of state, or in domestic business, &c. Which is true in part, but not an exact observation: for there is no especial part of his discourse which is much less essential in the following chapters, as any one may see that will read them: and so there are several political maxims, and others belonging to different matters, in the chapters foregoing. Even that observation which here immediately follows (ver. 11), concerning a rich man's confidence in his wealth, rather than in the divine providence and protection, was delivered in part before (x. 13). And the very next concerning pride and humility (ver. 12), in xx. 33; xvi. 18. And that also (ver. 16), about gifts was touched in xvi. 8.

[¶] The thirteenth verse is referred by some to judgment. It is, I have long been used to call cognitores, and in good authors congeritores, is much to do the office of a judge; who ought to take the greatest care to know the truth before he gives a sentence. For if it be a shame to a private person, in ordinary discourse, to answer a matter before he hears it, much more will it be to a magistrate, if in matters of justice and judgment, he come to a resolution, before he hath taken full cognizance of them.

[‡] Some would connect the seventeenth verse with the foregoing, but I have taken it separately. And there being several ways of interpreting it, either politically, with relation to causes brought before a judge; or spiritually, with relation to what is transacted in a man's own soul; I have followed our translation, which seems to me nearest to the Hebrew. In which a just man is not the person of whom Solomon speaks; but the mark of the nominative case (as grammarians call it) is set before the word first. So that it hath the same meaning with our vulgar saying: One tale is good, till another be told: Though I think there is more in it; and the lord Bacon hath made this excellent discourse upon it; which I have not neglected in my paraphrase:

"The first information (says he, Adv. of Learning, of book viii. ch. 2, parab. 17), in any case, if it a little fix just in the mind of the judge, takes deep root, and wholly seasons and predisposes; so it can hardly be taken out, unless some manifest falsehood be found in the matter of the information; or some cunning dealing, in exhibiting, and laying open the same. For a bare and simple defence, though it be just and more weighty, can hardly compensate the prejudice of the first information, nor is of force in itself to reduce the scales of justice, once swayed down, to an equal balance. Wherefore it is the safest course for a judge, that nothing touching the proofs and merits of the cause be intimated beforehand, until both parties be heard together: and it is best for the defendant, if he perceive the judge to be pre-occupied, to labour principally in this (so far as the quality of the cause will admit) to discover some cunning shifts, and fraudulent dealing practised by the adverse party, to the abuse of the judge."

They that expound this verse (as the ancients generally do) concerning private judgment, within a man's own mind, follow the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin; and commonly make this the meaning:—A good man, before he minds another man's faults, will first narrowly look to his own; and call himself to an account, before he inquire after the miscarriages. This is an excellent sense (if the words would bear it), which some of the Luthers follow: however, all the translators have taken it, "Justus initio est accusator sui, postea inquirit in aliun:" and runs into a long discourse concerning self-love, and men's blindness to their own faults, and quick-sightedness in springing other men's; citing the known sayings of Cæcilius, Horace, and Persius, to this purpose. But though he takes the just man here to be opposed to the hypocrite our Saviour speaks of, who minds the mote in his brother's eye, and neglects the beam in his own, yet he acknowledges that the Greek word in the LXX. belongs to the law, and the civil courts, viz. ποιητὴς τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, which is the allegations of the accuser, before the other party is heard; and hath this remark out of Deuteroesenes: "It is hard to pull out of men's minds the opinion they have first conceived." Which Verres, among the Romans, understood so well, that it was his common trick to accuse those whom he had injured: for men are apt to favour the plaintiff, supposing he cannot have the impudence to complain without a cause. Nay, there are those in the Roman church that apply the Vulgar translation this way; to this sense:—"A just man is so prudent (as well as honest) as to relate all that concerns his cause sincerely, without concealing any thing; even accusing himself if he be guilty: whereby he procures greater favour, and prevents what his adversary would have said: who, be sure, would have laid it open to his disgrace, if he had craftily omitted any thing," &c.

But I will not trouble the reader with any other of their interpretations; which are devised merely to make good that translation. The truth of ours may be further justified from the next (ver. 18), which belongs to the matter of civil controversies: which, if the judges could not determine, were referred to God's decision by lots.

[‡] But I have said enough, if not too much of this: and therefore shall only observe a few reflections which Melancthon makes upon the twenty-second wicked, to overthrow the righteous in judgment.

A fool's lips enter into contention, and his mouth calleth for strokes.

A fool's mouth is his destruction, and his lips are the snare of his soul.

The words of a talebearer are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the belly.

He also that is slothful in his work is brother to him that is a great waster.

Those words also show, what comfort and delight there are in an agreeable marriage; and therefore we ought to fee fornication, and keep in mind the saying, which he that entereth God will judge, &c., and the punishment of God inflicted upon the inhabitants of Canaan for their confirmed lusts. Nee est dubium, magnam partem calamitatum, &c. 'Nor is there any doubt that a great part of the calamities among all mankind are the punishments of filthy lusts. Let us think not of our disorderly carriage toward God; for the more he is displeased with impiety, the more carefully we ought to preserve chastity: and let us observe that rule, To shun sins, is to shun the occasions of sins.'

1. He that affects singularity inquires into all manner of things, according as his vain-glory humour leads him: which makes him also bend himself with all the wit he hath, to overthrow the sedate reasons of wiser men. See Arg. [a].

2. For a fool will never take any pleasure in true understanding; but all the design of his studies is, to make a vain ostentation of wisdom unto others: this is his chiefest pleasure, to hear himself discourse; that is, discover the folly that is in his heart. See Arg. [b].

3. Into whatsoever company or society (suppose into the schools of wisdom) a profane person comes, he brings along with him contempt of God, and religion, and good men: and (as one wickedness grows out of another) that contempt improves into inoffensive, and reproachful language of them. See Arg. [c].

4. A man of great understanding is never exhausted, nor wants matter of useful instruction: his mind being like a fountain, out of which wise thoughts spring perpetually; and flow in abundance, with a torrent of eloquence, for the common good and benefit.

5. Apologies may be made for it, but it can never be made consistent with honesty and goodness, to have respect to the person, not to the cause, which is brought before one in judgment: for by that means the wicked is favoured, because he is rich, or because he is a friend, &c. and the just man loses his right and is oppressed, because he is poor, or none of the judge's acquaintance.

6. If a fool finds others scolding, or contending, he will thrust himself into the quarrel; but is so much the more stupid instead of making them friends, he increases the difference, till from words they come to blows; in which he escapes not without some share of them to himself.

7. For, in all other cases, a fool uses his tongue so imprudently, that he ruins himself by his own discourse: and if he go about to defend what he saith, he is but the more entangled, to the certain hazard of his life.

8. A whisperer of false stories makes a great show of harmlessness, if not of love and kindness, when he backbites others; nay, seems perhaps to do it very unwillingly, with great grief of heart, and not without excuses for the persons from whom he detects; and yet, by making them the most deadly wounded; and sink deep into the midst of those that hear them. See Arg. [d].

9. There is so little difference between a slothful man and a prodigal, that they may be called brethren: for he that looks not after his business, must needs come to poverty, as well as he that is a spendthrift.

10. The almighty power and goodness of the great Lord of the world, are the surest defence in all manner of dangers: unto which a virtuous man may have the confidence cheerfully to resort, and hope to find protection; nay, to be there as safe as if he was in an impregnable fortress. See Arg. [e].

11. He that is of the most sordid mind thinks otherwise, and places his security in heaps of wealth, which he fancies hath a power to do anything, and is able to defend him (like a high bulwark, which none can scale) from all assaults: but alas! this is only his own vain opinion; he is safe merely in imagination.

12. When a man's spirit grows lofty by prosperity, forgetting God, and despising his brethren, it is a certain forerunner of his utter destruction: as on the other side humility, meekness, and patience, in a low condition, are the best preparation for honour and preferment.

13. He that is so forward as to answer to a business before he hath heard the state of it (that is before he understands it), thinks, perhaps, to show the quickness of his apprehension: but, by his imper-tinent discourse, declares his egregious folly, and makes himself ridiculous. See Arg. [f].

14. There is a vast difference between outward and inward evils; for a manly spirit will support us under bodily sicknesses and outward afflictions: but if the mind itself have lost its courage and become abject, cast down, and oppressed with grief 15 The heart of the prudent getteth knowledge; and the ear of the wise seeketh knowledge.
16 A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men.
17 He that is first in his own cause seemeth just; but his neighbour cometh and searcheth him.
18 The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty.
19 A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and their contentions are like the bars of a casle.

and sadness; it is not in the power of man to raise and lift it up.

Ver. 15.] He (therefore) that hath so much understanding, as to consider what is good for himself, will take the greatest care to possess his mind with the true knowledge of God, and of his duty to him; and be so wise as to listen to those that can give him right information; for it is this alone that can preserve the mind from being dejected and broken.

Ver. 16.] There is no man so mean but he may make his way, whithersoever he desires, by gifts and presents: which will produce his enlargement, if he be in prison; and, more than that, bring him into favour with great men; nay, purchase him the honour to wait upon princes.

Ver. 17.] A man may seem to have a good cause, who hath got the start of his neighbour, till he come also to examine his information, and open the whole matter before the judge: any, more than this, he hath a great advantage who first possesses the judge's mind with the justice of his cause; for it will not be easy for his adversary to find out his tricks and to confute him, without a diligent search and curious inquiry into what he hath alleged. See Arg. [7].

Ver. 18.] But in some cases it is very hard to make an end of suits, where the reasons are strong on both sides, or the parties contending both very powerful to maintain their pretensions: and then the casting of lots is an equal way to determine the controversy, and put each of them in quiet possession of that which falls to his share.

Ver. 19.] But there are no contentions so sharp and obstinate as those among brethren: who grow so refractory when they have transgressed against each other, that it is easier to take a strong city, or to break the bars of a casle, than it is to compose their differences, and remove all the obstructions that lie in the way to their hearty reconciliation.

Ver. 20.] The tongue is so hard to govern, and so much depends upon it, that (it cannot be too often repeated, xii. 2, 14) we ought to take as great care about the words we speak, as we do about the fruit of our trees, or the increase of the earth, which we are to eat; for, according as they are wholesome and good, or unsavoury and bad, so will the pleasure and the pain be between with we shall be filled. See Arg. [6].

Ver. 21.] The good or the harm that the tongue can do, both to a man's self and unto others, is more than can be expressed; for many have cut their own throats by incurious words, or brought themselves off from danger by prudent answers: in like manner, by false accusations, it destroys other men, or saves them by testifying the truth; and this may be laid down for a general rule, that they who love to talk much shall suffer by it.

Ver. 22.] He who hath married a wife that is truly a help meet for him, hath met with a most excellent blessing; and ought thankfully to acknowledge the singular favour of God, in guiding his mind to make so happy a choice. See Arg. [4].

Ver. 23.] Boldness doth not become a beggar, but modest entreaties and duteful supplications, which is the proper language of the poor and miserable: and if they meet with a stern or harsh answer from the rich, it is no wonder; and they must still humbly deprecat their displeasure.

Ver. 24.] A friendly person is prone to do all neighbourly offices, which is the very end of friendship, and the way to preserve it: and such a friend is sometimes found, who loves so heartily, that he sticks closer to his friend in any strait, and assists him more faithfully, than a brother.

CHAPTER XIX.

1 Better is the poor that walketh in his integrity, than he that is perverse in his lips, and is a fool.

CHAP. XIX.

ARGUMENT.—[a] This chapter begins with a compari-}son between the rich and the poor; whom, in an-}other regard, he had compared together in the last}verse but one of the foregoing chapter. "The sense is plain enough; and it is, ἠδικήσας πάντας οὐκ ἄρεις, ἀνθρώπους, one of those proverbs which contains much wisdom in it," as Greg. Nazianzen speaks (Orat. xxvi. p. 455, 459), who applies it unto Christians of mean understanding, and simple speech; that understand not γνῶναι στοιχεῖα; neither the instances of Pyrrho, nor the syllogisms of Chrysip-pus; nor the depraved cunning of Aristotle's arts, nor the witchery of Plato's eloquence; which, like the Egyptian plagues, had infected the church. There is no need (says he) of any of these: but a poor man that " walks in his simplicity," ὁ πίπτων ἐκ λόγου καί γνώσεως, as he paraphraseth it ("poor in discourse, and reasoning, and knowledge"), and relies upon plain simple words, is much better (and will in this way be saved, as in a small cogboat) than a fool (for he is no better) that knows how to wind and turn every way in his discourse; and most unlearnedly trusts to his demonstrations, &c. But this must be acknowledged not to be the literal and his heart freteth against the Lord.

For Solomon, in the next verse, observes two great springs of all our miscarriages; want of understanding, and want of deliberation. To make too much haste in a business is the way not to speed (according to the known proverb); and to run blindly upon any thing is no less prejudicial to us in our undertakings. That is the meaning of the first word, which we translate also: both he that affects things without knowledge, and he that pursues what he understands without deliberation, run into many mistakes, and commit many sins. So some render the word νεφεξ (soul), "the desire of the soul," the appetite, which must be always governed by prudence; or else it will run a man upon racks, which shallipte him later on. For which miscarriage, he shows in the next verse (ver. 3), he must blame none but himself, and never in the least reflect upon God, as if he were negligent of us, or hard to us: which men are prone to think when they have foolishly undone themselves.

Then follows an observation which he had made before, ver. 3, but here repeats, in different words, over and over again (ver. 4, 6, 7). For it is a lamentable thing to see how little true friendship there is in the world; most men altering and changing together with the fortune (as we call it) of those whom they pretend to love. If they be rich, they are courted by every body; but poverty shows how insincerely. The books of all ancient authors are full of such sentences; which I shall not so much as mention. [c] But note that in the midst of these, he inserts (ver. 5) an observation (which he had formerly made) of a greater wickedness in human nature; which moves them either publicly to accuse others falsely, or secretly to buckles the person of those whom they shall escape unpunish- ed. For "there is no word so secret that shall go for nought, and the mouth that believeth the soul," as the wisdom of Solomon excellently speaks (i. 11). This is repeated also again in this very chapter (ver. 9), with the alteration only of one word. The reason of which is, that Solomon (as I have noted before), using often the same axioms, sometimes varied the phrase, though not the sense: and the collectors of his sayings thought good to set down his different forms of speech, for the same thing. In both verses the LXX. plainly understand him to speak of such lies as are pernicious and hurtful to others in particular; and in the latter of them, they take the destruction which the wise man threatens unto such liars, to arise from their own wicked words. And so I have expressed it in my paraphrase. There are those who think that this sentence is repeated in the ninth verse, as an ad- monition to the rich men spoken of in the verses foregoing: who break their promises with those that depend upon them; and give good words when there is no need of them: but will do no good when men call for their assistance. These shall suffer for their falseness. But this seems to be strained, and not agreeable to the meaning of the Hebrew text.

That which follows (ver. 10) is a notable admo- nition of the confused and disorderd state of things here in this present world; wherein we too often see men, void of wit or goodness, wallowing in pleasure; that is, abounding in all things that can gratify their senses, which they please most ab- surdly: and mean men getting into power, and lording it over their betters, &c. These things are very unconscionably, saith Solomon; and the latter of these more unconscionably than the former: but so it will be unless men become wise and good; for most are made worse by prosperity, which they know not how to use. Therefore it is a true rule of the son of Sirach (Eccles. xxxiii. 21), "Fodder, a wand, and burdens for an ass; and bread, correction, and tole; and shy that word which is best in the condition that is proper for him; and therefore a slave should be kept under, and a brutish sot be restrained from taking all his pleasure. For no man is fit to govern another that cannot govern himself; as the next verse intimates; and the more power any man hath, the harder it is for him to command his passions: which may be suggested in the twelfth verse: for the young lion, to whom a king is compared, as he is the strongest, so is the fiercest of all other.

From hence, the wise man passes to some domestic observations (ver. 13—15, 18, 19). Upon which if I should make any remarks, it would extend beyond its just bounds. The translator will see where I have put two senses together: which I could not do in the twenty-third verse; and therefore shall here give a short account of it.

All interpreters, except one, understand it as our translation hath rendered it; by supplying a word before abideth satisfied. Only Lud. de Dieu thinks the parts of this verse are opposite as the rest used to do; and renders it, which we translate satisfied (which signifies full in the Hebrew language) understands proud and haughty people (as they who are rich are too prone to be), who are here op- posed to him that fears God; as they are in Luke i. 50, 51, 53. And the paraphrase will run thus: He that is possessed with such a religious sense of God, that he fears to offend him, has a happy mind; but he that is swollen with pride and forgets God, when worldly goods flow in upon him, shall lie down at last in sorrow, and never want something or other to afflict him. And something of this sense the LXX. seem to have had in their mind; who make the members of this verse opposite one another. Understanding by ἐξετάσθη, he hath no fear of God. For so their translation runs: "The fear of the Lord is a man's life," ἑκάστος ἰδέως, &c. "but he that is without fear (viz. of God,) shall abide in places where there is no knowledge to govern him." i. e. run blindly into all manner of ruin.

The next verse is a most elegant, but hyperbo- lic, description of a man that hath given up him- self to sloth: who refuses to do things as easy as to pull his hand out of his bosom; and as necessary as to eat and drink. This being the plain sense, I have not varied from the common translation of the word σαλλαχαθή; which everywhere signifies a pot, or dish, or something like it; and can only by a metaphor be applied to the bosom, or arm-holes. But we must either so understand it, or else take the first word, tamen, "hide," in a very improper sense: for there can be no cause for hiding the hand in a pot. Therefore we must either translate it as we do, or understand by hide, putting or thrusting the hand into the pot or CHAPTER XIX.

5 A false witness shall not be unpunished; and he that speaketh lies shall not escape.
6 Many will entreat the favour of the prince; and every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts.

dish; and thus translate the whole verse: "A slug-guard puts his hand into the dish; but will not so much as move it thence unto his mouth."

[7] The next verse, as Melancthon well notes, is an observation concerning the way of advancing the world. Some are so bad, they must be handled with great sharpness; specially such profane men, as with an epicurean contempt deride admonitions, and grow thereby more furious. But there are those who grow better, even by the example of severity against notorious offenders; as the Gideonites came and sought peace, when they saw their neighbours destroyed; and the punishment of Si-samites made Otanes more cautious, when he was placed in the seat covered with his predecessor's skin; as Herodotus relates in his Terspichore. But then there are a third sort, who need not so much; but, being admonished, are obedient to those that tell them of their faults. To such, a reproof, at the most, is sufficient.

[8] In the next two verses I have had respect to both constructions, of which they are capable. But, in ver. 28, I have omitted the sense which some great Hebræians give of the words; as if an angodiily witness sought only by false colours to deceive the judge, and thereby pervert judgment. For a witness of Delial seems to me rather to signify such an impudent varlet as sticks not boldly to testify to the greatest lies.

Ver. 1.] A poor man who acts sincerely, and hath no guile in his mouth, is far happier, and more to be commended, than he that gathers great riches by fraud and circumvention: which he takes to be cunningly done, and is full in the end. See Arg. [c].
Ver. 2.] Ignorance and inconsideration are equally mischievous; for a mind that knows not what it ought to choose, and what to avoid, can never do well: and if a man hastily and unadvisedly pursue an end (which he reasonably propounds to himself), and will not take time to deliberate, he must needs commit many errors. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 3.] Yet he is unwilling to take the blame upon himself, but commits this grand error after all the rest; that when his own folly, and perhaps wickedness, hath led him to many misfortunes, he imagines God is unkind to him: and is vexed, not at himself, but at the divine providence; against which he perpetually murmurs.

Ver. 4.] Together with riches a man gets many (and perhaps great and powerful) friends, though he had none before: but he that hath most need of them, is so far from getting any, that, if he had one, he loses even him, when he grows poor. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 5.] A false witness, who fears not in open court to accuse the innocent, shall meet at last with a just punishment: for shall he escape, who privately calumniate and vents his malice in lies to the prejudice of his neighbour. See Arg. [d].

9 A false witness shall not be unpunished; and he that speaketh lies shall perish.
10 Delight is not seemly for a fool; much less for a servant to have rule over princes.
11 The discretion of a man deferreth his anger; and it is his glory to pass over a transgression.

Ver. 6.] A prince never wants suitors for his favour, which the greatest persons seek with the humblest submission: and every one loves, or pretends to love him, whose liberality is so well known every where, that it hath procured him the name of a bountiful giver.
Ver. 7.] All the kindred of a poor man not only forsake him (as was observed before, ver. 4, xiv. 20) but hate his company, as a disgrace or a trouble to them; and therefore no wonder if his companions and relations grow strange to him: he urges them with their former protestations or promises of kindness, but finds they signified nothing; and if he earnestly implore their pity, it is to no purpose.

Ver. 8.] He that is so considerate, as to value wisdom above riches and, accordingly, to store his mind with virtuous principles, is the truest lover of himself: and if he strictly observe them, and conduct his life by these rules, he shall find the profit of it.

Ver. 9.] He that testifies to a lie, to the perverting of justice, if the judge do not find him out, shall be punished by God: and he who privately whispers slanders against his neighbours, and kindles strife and contention among them, shall perish by those wicked practices.

Ver. 10.] Pleasure doth not become a man void of understanding; who is never more ridiculous than when he can do what he lists; and yet empire less becomes a vile slave; who is most intolerably insolent, when he can wantonly dominate over the greatest persons. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 11.] The world thinks him stupid, who is patient; and without sense of honour, who passes by injuries: but the more understanding any man hath, the slower he is to perceive and to punish; and the greater his spirit is, the greater his glory and praise, not to revenge a wrong when he hath opportunity.

Ver. 12.] But none find it more difficult than a king, especially in the heat of his youth, to bridle his wrath; the signification of which is as dreadful to his subjects, as the roaring of the young lion to the rest of the beasts: and on the other side, any token of his favour and kindness is so comfortable, that as the dew restores those herbs, which were parched by the hot beams of the sun; so it revives those who were almost struck dead with the terror of his rage. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 13.] Two things make a man exceeding unhappy; a dissolute son and a scolding wife: for the former breaks the heart of his father, to see him like to prove the utter destruction of his family: and the other drives a man to undo his family himself, when he is no more able to live at home with her, than to dwell in a rotten and ruinous house, through the roof of which the rain drops perpetually.

Ver. 14.] The singular providence of God, therefore, is to be acknowledged in a virtuous wife; which is not so easy to get as an estate. For a house, with all its furniture, and land belonging to it, may descend upon us, without our thought, from our progenitors: but great care and prudence are required in the choice of a wife, that knows how to manage a family rightly; who is not found neither, without the peculiar direction and blessing of the Lord.

Ver. 15.] As labour makes men vigorous and rich, so slothfulness (and with it these two miserable effects:) that it insensibly sinks the mind into a dull stupidity and unconcernedness about the most necessary things, and thereby reduces them unto extreme beggary and want: to which may be added a third; that it tempts them to shirk, and use dishonest arts for a livelihood.

Ver. 16.] He that carefully observes the commandments of God, as the rule of his life, hath a due care of himself, and consults his soul's safety: but he that minds not what he doth, despising all orders and rules of life, is regardless of his own good, and will be very miserable.

Ver. 17.] He that takes compassion on the poor and relieves his necessities, doth not impoverish, but enrich himself. For the Lord looks upon what is given unto the poor as lent unto him: and he will not fail to make him a full compensation; or rather return the benefit he hath done to others, with large interest and increase of blessings, upon him and his posterity.

Ver. 18.] Give due and timely correction to thy son for his faults, before he hath gotten a habit of them, and there be little hope of his amendment: but neither proceed to such cruel usage of him, as to make him weary of life, and not to care what becomes of him; nor yet be moved merely by his roaring to abate of thy necessary severity towards him.

Ver. 19.] For he whose wrath exceeds all bounds, and makes him severe beyond measure, and endues his children and consequently himself (nay, all men that are immoderately angry bring great mischiefs upon themselves; and if you help them out of one danger, it doth not make them cautious, but they run into a new trouble;) and yet, if he do not punish him at all, he tempts him to go on in his sin; and the same case, whether he shall punish him or not, will return again.

Ver. 20.] Listen unto good advice, and be not impatient of reproof; no, nor of correction for thy faults: but receive all thankfully; and learn thereby that wisdom which will do thee service, when all things else will fail thee.

Ver. 21.] There are many designs and contrivances in the minds of men, which they think are so well laid that they cannot miscarry; but are all defeated nevertheless, the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand.

Ver. 22] The desire of a man is his kindness: and a poor man is better than a liar.

Ver. 23.] The fear of the Lord tendeth to life; and he that hath it shall abide satisfied; he shall not be visited with evil.

Ver. 24:] A slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom, and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again.

Ver. 25.] Smite a scorner, and the simple will beware: and reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge.

Ver. 26.] He that wasteth his father, and chasing away his mother, is a son that causeth shame, and bringeth reproach.

Ver. 27.] Cease, my son, to hear the instruction that causeth to err from the words of knowledge.

ARGUMENT.—[a] The first precept in this chapter is against drunkenness, as an evil to wisdom, even in common things: much more in those of everlasting consequence: for that it commonly expels out of men's minds all reverence both to God and others: inclining them to take the license to say or do anything without restraint or discretion; and what unruly passions it excites and the brain is disturbed with it, is known to all, and need not be here recited. The word homoh, which Solomon here uses, and which we render railing or outrageous, includes them all: signifying that discomposed, unquiet, and restless state of mind, which expresses itself in some wild motion or other, according as men are naturally inclined. But nothing worse can be said of it than this, that it makes men either stupid sots, or profane scoffers at religion and all sobriety.

[b] Next to this he advises every man to take heed how he suffers himself to be drunk with anger: for nothing else but an intoxication therewith, can make a man so distracted as to fly in the face of justice.
For so that word hitphonh properly signifies, not to produce the king (though most interpreters, even Bochartus himself, so render it), but to be angry at him; which is a kind of madness; for whereby he is provoked to such fury, as in young lions, who are the fiercest of all others. I have therefore expressed both senses of the word, and they may not only have good counsellors, but be inclined also to hearken to them, or else he will not be happy.
Jeremiah was an excellent monitor, but Zedekiah would not be ruled by him; and so Jerusalem was destroyed; as, on the other side, Hezekiah in former times hearkened to Isaiah, and then it was preserved.
Hae est principalis sententia hujus dulcissimi dicti.
But I rather look upon this to be that which they call a tropical sense, not the literal; and therefore I only note it here, together with this wholesome admonition of that author which follows: "That kingsdoms cannot be well governed only by human wisdom; but the assistance of God must be imported both in giving of counsel, and in bowing the will of men to obedience, and in governing events,"

[c] In the next verse I take isah to signify a more than ordinary man; one of the highest rank; and that in wisdom: for it is opposed to a fool; and therefore so I have expounded it.

[d] As I have also understood it in ver. 5; where Solomon observes that there are no men so cunning but there are others as subtle to find them out.
Concerning which art of finding out men, the great lord Bacon hath given many notable rules (in his second chapter of book viii., of the Advancement of Learning); for though the knowledge itself falls not under precepts, because it is of individuals; yet instructions for the deducing of it may be given. And he observes six ways whereby the knowledge of men may be drawn out and disclosed.
By their faces and countenances; by words; by deeds; by their nature; by their ends; and by the relations of others. What he says upon these heads, the reader may there find. I shall only mention this single observation of his; that "the weakest and simplest sort of men are best instructed by their natures (according to which they commonly act), but the wisest and most reserved, are best expounded by their ends and aims."

[e] The next verse is very variously expounded; but our translation seems to come nearest to the sense of the Hebrew words: which may admit also of 2 The fear of a king is as the roaring of a lion: whoseo provoketh him to anger smiteth against his own soul.

this construction; which approaches nearer to any other, besides that which we follow:—It is the common inclination of mankind, when they are in need or danger, to call for relief or help from him whom they have obliged: but there are very few, that in such a condition will approve themselves to be faithful friends.

[f] The eleventh verse may also be expounded quite contrary ways. Because the word hitphonh signiifies both to make one's self known, and to make one's self a stranger unto others. All the ancient interpreters follow, as cues doth, the first sense; which seems most genuine; for nature commonly bears its inclinations in children so plainly, and they are so strong and violent, that they cannot dissemble them. Yet that (which is the other) is no absurd sense, which would be the drift of these words. Even children are so cunning as to hide their inclinations; and therefore it is not easy to guess in their childhood what they will prove when they come to man's estate. But this is not so common as the other.

[g] The next verse some good interpreters expound wholly concerning the happiness a people is in, when the subjects are so humble, that they are inclined meekly to obey their superiors; and their superiors so wise, that they solicitously provide for their safety and good government. Thus Melanthon observes, that in government these two things must concur; good counsel in the governors, and obedience in the people: both of which Solomon acknowledges to be the surest foundation of great wealth and prosperity. But these, saith he, must concur in a king; who must not only have good counsellors, but be inclined also to hearken to them, or else he will not be happy.
Jeremiah was an excellent monitor, but Zedekiah would not be ruled by him; and so Jerusalem was destroyed; as, on the other side, Hezekiah in former times hearkened to Isaiah, and then it was preserved.
Hae est principalis sententia hujus dulcissimi dicti.
But I rather look upon this to be that which they call a tropical sense, not the literal; and therefore I only note it here, together with this wholesome admonition of that author which follows: "That kingsdoms cannot be well governed only by human wisdom; but the assistance of God must be imported both in giving of counsel, and in bowing the will of men to obedience, and in governing events,"

[h] The fourteenth verse is alleged by the lord Bacon, as an instance of one of the mere colours of good and evil: teaching us that all is not good which men praise, nor all bad which they disapprove.
For as fraud, the wise man here observes, makes them dispraise that to which they have a mind; so in other cases, out of ignorance, or out of partiality, or faction, may, sometimes from natural disposition, men both dispraise that which is praiseworthy, and commend that which is good for little.

But there are other authors, who give a quite dif-
3 It is an honour for a man to cease from strife; but every fool will be meddling.

4 The sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest, and have nothing.

5 Counsel in the heart of man is like deep of the Vulgar Latin hath produced in the next verse. Which seems to intend no more than this; That a good king separates the bad from the good by a due execution of his laws; which is like the winnowing of corn; that which he doth not approve is to be bad from it, by drawing the wheel over it. For as the flail is the instrument among us of beating the corn out of the husk, so in these hot countries, they made this separation by a wheel drawn by oxen over it: which both pressed out the corn, and brake the straw; as may be seen in Isa. xxviii. 27, 28, and many other places, wherein our present man, N. Fuller, hath explained in his Miscellaneis (lib. vi. ch. 12), and Dr. Hammond hath applied to that place of the psalmist, Ps. lxxviii. 13, though it seemed to me there to have another meaning. Others by the wheel understand here such a sore punishment as that mentioned 2 Sam. viii. 2; xii. 31. and then the meaning is, He will use the utmost rigour he can against the wicked, and fright men from their wickedness.

[2] The plainest sense also of ver. 27, seems to be that in our translation: the latter part of which the lord Bacon (with some others) refers to the inquisitive search of man's mind into all manner of things. "For though the wise man says (in Bacon) that the man who is wise may cut all the works of God; yet this does not derogate from the capacity of a man's mind, but may be referred to the impediments of knowledge (such as the shortness of life, janglings among learned men, and refusing to join their studies and labours, unfaithful and depraved tradition of sciences, with the attendant grumbling of those who have this present state is entangled): for no parcel of the world is denied to man's inquiry or invention, he declares in another place; where he saith, The spirit of man is as the lamp of God; wherewith he searcheth into the inwards of all secrets." Thus he in the beginning of his Advancement of Learning. Which, if it be not the full import of the words, is nearer than the several others given of them: who by the "candle of the Lord," understand either the knowledge of God himself, which penetrates into the secrets of all men's thoughts; or else his divine favour and love; the sense of which marvellously recreates and refreshes the soul: and is as it were the life of man, penetrating through his whole body.

[3] Upon the next verse Ki-lamukh hath this note: That by chesed, the mercy, which Solomon here commends unto a king, we are to understand, an exceeding great excess of goodness and kindness; even towards those who are not worthy of it: and by emeth, truth, his keeping his word exactly, and loving and sincerely professing this virtue. Which truth will keep him from all harm; but it is that excessive degree of goodness alone, which establishes and settles him in the throne of his kingdom. A proverb directly contrary to the wicked maxim of Machiavel, as Shickard observes in his Mischipat Hammelch, cap. 4.

[4] The last verse some take to be a description of the depraved condition of human nature: which makes men as lathen to be cured of their sins by sharp and severe rebukes, & c. as to be beaten till lumps be raised in the flesh, & c. So they make tam-rickhore, the cleansing or scorning of an evil man, to be the subject of what he speaks. And then the paraphrase should run thus; To rub up a wicked ferent sense of these words: particularly Luther and Melancthon: who by konch do not understand a buyer, but an owner or possessor; and imagine the meaning of this proverb to be, that men are not weaned from sin, though they repent, but after God hath taken it away from them, then they commend the happiness they have lost. The last-named writer heeps up abundance of excellent sentences out of the ancients, like this of Thucydides, &c. the present is always greevous,"

Which arises out of fickleness and inconstancy; or because they are cloyed with what they have long enjoyed; or are impatient of some inconveniences in their present state; but chiefly out of consideration, that all conditions will have something troublesome in them; and out of great unthankfulness to God, and insensibility of his providence, which disposes things better than we can do ourselves. But the phrase betaal, which we translate bounty, scarce admits of this sense; and therefore I have not taken notice of it in the paraphrase.

Whether penasim, in the next verse, signifies rubies or pearls, or any other sort of precious stone, or none in particular, is not very material: but Bochart, I think, hath demonstrated that it signifies pearls (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 6, De Saur. An.), and therefore I have so translated it. And it is not an impertinent argument, which he alleges for this (chap. 8), that wisdom in the scriptures is frequently compared to pearls, or preferred before them; as it is here in this place.

In the seventeenth verse, under the name of bread of deceit, may be comprehended all things got wrong, and which destroy the peace and comfort of man in the beginning, will bring sorrow and pain in the conclusion: and therefore so I have expressed it in the paraphrase.

There is little difficulty in the verses that follow till we come to the twenty-fifth verse. Where the Vulgar Latin hath been so extremely corrupted, that various interpretations have thence arisen of a very plain sentence, as the words run in the Hebrew. Which are directed against sacrilege, as protestant writers universally acknowledged. "A corruption (saith Mr. Cartwright himself) which never more infested the world than in this age: in which most men not only give nothing, but do all they can to take away from that which their ancestors have given, to the service of God, and the support of his ministers, of schools, or of the poor. By which they are guilty not only of their own destruction, but of the loss of the souls of others." The only difference between them herein is, that some take the words to be a censure of the hypocritical wickedness of such, as after they have committed sacrilege, and such-like sins, think to make God amends by vows, and sacrifices, and prayers. Thus Luther and Melancthon, and among the reformed (as they are called) De Dicen, who adds this new conjecture, that the first word mokesch may be interpreted by a snare, i.e. fraudulently and craftily; and then the sense is this: A sacrilegious man hides devices to rob God of things that are consecrated to him; and then makes vows, in hope by them to expiate his sacrilege.—The whole sentence he also observes may be otherwise disposed; but it seems to be so forced and unusual, that I shall not mention it.
CHAPTER XX.

11 Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right.

12 The hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord hath made even both of them.

13 Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty; open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread.

14 It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth.

15 There is gold, and a multitude of rubies; but the lips of knowledge are a precious jewel.

16 Take his garment that is surety for a man, and chide him sorely for his sins, as is grievous to him as to beat him till he be bruised, and so sore, that he complains his very bowels are hurt and in anguish by it. This I have not wholly neglected; but yet followed the common exposition: which is, that the severest corporal punishments are necessary for the cure of some offenders.

Ver. 1.] Let him whose design it is to be wise and good, take heed of accosting himself to excess of wine, and such-like liquors: which is inconsistent with it: for drunkenness not only dispenses a man to be abusive and scurrilous, in deriding even things most serious and sacred; but to be so fardious, tumultuous, and quarrelsome, as declares him both to be a fool, and incapable of being otherwise. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 2.] The displeasure of a king strikes terror into men, and makes them tremble, as they are wont to do at the roaring of a young lion, which comes with open jaws to devour them: it is best therefore to submit to him; for whatsoever provokes him, especially by angry and exasperating language, brings his own life (as well as his soul) into very great danger. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 3.] It is below a wise man or one that is truly great, to scold and brawl: or, if a quarrel be begun, it is no disparagement to him (but the noblest thing he can do) to withdraw himself from it, and let it rest: but ill looks and ill words love to thrust themselves into contention; and fancy when they are engaged in strife, they are bound in honour to maintain it. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 4.] The smallest difficulty frights a lazy person from the most necessary undertaking: for instance, he will not rise to plough his ground in autumn when the morning air grows sharp, for fear of catching cold: by which means he exposes himself to far greater hardships; for in the harvest-time, when plenty crowns the labours of other men, he turns beggar, and nobody pityes him, or will relieve him.

Ver. 5.] There is nothing but may be compassed by wisdom. For though the designs and intentions of another man, especially that hath a deep wit, are as hard to be sounded as waters that lie in the secret caverns of the earth; yet there are persons of such penetrating understandings, and of so great a reach, that they will find means to discover them and draw them out. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 6.] It is such an honour to be kind and to do good to others, that a great part of mankind value themselves very much upon the mere pretence of it: every one of them boasting what he hath done, or will do upon occasion: though, alas! in a time of trial, it is very hard to find so much as one of them that will be as good as his word. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 7.] But whosoever he be, that is endowed with this rare virtue of being just to his word; and so sincerely charitable, that he persevereth in his virtue to the end of his days: he shall not only fare the better for it, and enjoy great satisfaction in himself, while he lives; but his children after him shall reap the happy fruits of his unfeigned love to God and man.

Ver. 8.] A prince attentive to his people’s good who doth not give up himself to pleasure, nor abandon all his care of his affairs to his ministers, but sits constantly himself to do justice to his people, prevents a world of mischief by his very presence in the courts of judgments: and by his strict observance how things are carried, and careful search into men’s causes, keeps both judges and pleaders, and all men else within the bounds of their duty; and applies fitting and seasonable remedies to all the public grievances.

Ver. 9.] There is no man so perfect, that he hath nothing left to do; for who can, and say truly, that he hath not the least evil affection remaining in him, no unruley passion stirring in his soul? or that he is so free from every sin, that he needs no further purifying.

Ver. 10.] It is not so small a sin as men imagine, to cheat and cozen their neighbours: for instance, to buy by a weight or measure, too heavy and big, and to sell by those that are too light and scanty for these are alike displeasing to the Lord; nay, such injustice is detestable to him beyond expression.

Ver. 11.] It is not hard to give a shrewd conjecture, what a child is like to prove when he is brought up: for not only young men, but little children, make early discoveries by their behaviour, by their contrivances, by their dealings one with another; nay, by their very sports and pastimes, and such things wherein they delight, whether their future life will probably be modest and honest; free, that is, from lasciviousness, impurity, and such-like vices; wise also, in learning and speech; just, and of a good wit, and of a good heart, and ful of neighbourly kindness, and of a good name in the world.

Ver. 12.] As the Lord is to be acknowledged the fountain of all good; particularly of those excellent and useful senses whereby the knowledge of all things is conveyed to us; so the truly wise disposition which we observe to be in any child, to listen to instruction, and to make a clear understanding to discern, with a sound judgment to resolve aright, are likewise, above all things, to be peculiarly ascribed to the divine grace. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 13.] But our industry must be joined with God’s blessing, in the faithful improvement of those faculties, or good inclinations he hath given us. And therefore let not idleness make thee indulge thyself in too much sloth; which is the way to beggary: but get up betime, and apply thyself, with attentive care, to some honest labour; and then thy desire of all things necessary shall not want satisfaction.

Ver. 14.] The buyer sometimes is as unjust and deceitful as the seller (ver. 10); for when he cheapens a commodity, he discharges it to such a degree, as if he thought it nothing worth: but having purchased it, upon his own terms, he goes away and brags how stranger: and take a pledge of him for a strange woman.

17 Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel.

18 Every purpose is established by counsel; and with good advice make war.

19 He that goeth about as a talebearer revealeth secrets; therefore meddle not with him that flattetheth with his lips.

20 Whoso curseth his father or his mother, his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness.

21 An inheritance may be gotten hastily at the beginning; but the end thereof shall not be blessed.

subtle he was, and laughed at the simplicity of him that sold it at so vile a rate. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 15.] Some think themselves rich and powerful, and happy, because they have treasures of gold, or perhaps heaps of pearls, or other precious stones: but among all the jewels, or ornaments, or furniture, that are esteemed, there is none comparable unto true wisdom; especially joined with eloquence; which can do more than them all. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 16.] It is rank folly to trust to him, who is so rash as to be bound for one, whose ability and fidelity are utterly unknown to him; especially for a woman whose loose way of life makes her credit justly suspected; therefore have nothing to do with such an inconsiderate person, without the utmost security that he can give thee, for the payment of what he owes thee.

Ver. 17.] Do not satisfy thy appetite of wealth by fraud, lying, or bribery; nor thy desires of pleasure by adultery or fornication: for though this may be sweet for the present, it is but like the pleasure of gritty bread, which may relish well to a hungry man, when it is first tasted; but being chewed hurts the palate, cuts the gums, or breaks the teeth, with the sharp and rough gravel that is in it. See Arg. [k].

Ver. 18.] Rashness spoils the best designs; which must be carried on prudently, and with good advice, if we would have them proved successful: and above all other, warlike expeditions are not to be undertaken without great deliberation; nor can be well managed without exact conduct, and subtle contrivance: unto which the victory is commonly more to be ascribed, than unto force.

Ver. 19.] He whose trade is it to ingratitude himself by defaming others, will not stick most treacherously to discover the secrets wherewith they have intrusted him (xi. 13), therefore suspect a fawning fellow, and have no familiarity with him; for his drift is, to entice thee to talk what he intends to carry about to others.

Ver. 20.] He that not only slighteth and despises, but reproaches, and wishes mischief to his father or mother, shall bring the heaviest punishments upon himself, and on his posterity: who the happier they were before, shall be the more miserable, by falling from a flourishing, into the most dismal condition.

Ver. 21.] Make not too much haste to be rich, for though, with a great deal of bustle and stir, an estate may in a short time be raised up, yet the foundation of it being laid in rapine, extortion, or fraud, it moulders away many times as suddenly as it was gotten: and it is certain will not prosper unto many generations.

Ver. 22.] Be patient, and do not so much as resolve to take revenge for any injury thou hast received (of which thou art not the proper judge, nor like to do exact justice in it), but leave thy cause to the Lord, and expect his righteous sentence; believing steadfastly he will not only do thee right, but defend thee from further injuries; which thou fearest, perhaps, thou shalt invite by thy forgiving those that are past.

Ver. 23.] To buy by one weight, and to sell by another is extremely odious, not only to all honest men, but much more to the Lord; which was said before (ver. 10): but is a sin so heinous, and yet so commonly practised, that this is fit to be repeated again; that it is a most wicked thing to cheat another, though it be but in a little matter (ver. 11).

Ver. 24.] There is no man great or small, that can take one step towards any thing he designs, without the permission and direction also of the Lord; who overrules their motions unto ends so far distant from men's thoughts, that it is impossible for them to know what the event shall be, of any thing they undertake.

Ver. 25.] There are two pieces of profaneness, which entangle him that is guilty of them, in great troubles: nay, bring ruin upon him. First, when he makes no distinction between things holy and common; but converts that which was consecrated to God (the first-fruits, suppose, or such-like sacred things) to his own proper use: and secondly, when he vows his distress to give something unto God, but having obtained his desires, studies how he may be loosed from his obligations. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 26.] Such impious persons can no more stand before a religious prince, than the chaff before the wind: but he disperses them all, and threshes them (as we speak) so severely that the country is clean purged, and freed from such wicked wretches. See Arg. [m].

Ver. 27.] That active spirit, which the Lord hath breathed into man, is like a torch lighted at the divine understanding, to guide and direct him in all his motions; and to make reflections upon them afterward; nay, to penetrate also into the most secret designs of other men, that he may not be deceived by them. See Arg. [n].

Ver. 28.] The best and strongest guards for the preservation of a prince's person, and for the security of his government, are bounty and clemency, joined with justice and faithfulness to his word: and if either of the two be of greater force than the other, for their support and maintenance, it is a high degree of bounty and benignity; which settles him fast in all men's affections, and entails the kingdom upon his posterity. See Arg. [o].

Ver. 29.] That which makes young men honourable is their strength, and vigour, and courage; whereby they are capable to serve for the defence of their country: but that which makes old men venerable, is
CHAPTER XXI.

The glory of young men is their strength; and the beauty of old men is the grey head.

CHAPTER XXI.

The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will.

Every way of a man is right in his own eyes: but the Lord pondereth the hearts.

ARGUMENT.—[c] This chapter begins with a sentence, which Themistius, a pagan philosopher and orator, seems to have notice of, and mentions as very memorable in the Assyrian (as he is supposed to call the Hebrew) writings: and commends to the thoughts of the emperor Valens, in a speech he made to him, Orat. ix. But if he had respect to this proverb of Solomon's, he will not fully comprehend the sense of it; for he takes notice only of a prince's mind being in the custody and under the guard of God. For thus he translates it, ουτος του βασιλεως ἐν τῇ θεώ παρουσίᾳ διδομένως, "the mind of the king is kept in safe custody in the hand of God." From whence he draws this inference, that a king ought to be very sensible what danger he is in, if he go about any thing contrary to the mind of God: because he then is in peril to fall out of the hand which preserves and keeps him.

Nay, thou oughtest, O king (saith he) not only to design nothing thyself but what is holy; but they that are about thee ought to speak to thee nothing that is not so: for every word that comes to thy ears is written in his uncorrupted hand. But though the heart be so infallible, yet it may not be the written in the hearts of all princes. That it is very unbecoming to have any evil thing, any thing impure, or in the least blemished with cruelty or inhumanity, in that heart, which those most holy and most gracious and benign hands of God carry in their keeping; yet there is a great deal more of these Assyrian letters or pictures, which he speaks of, express. For Solomon would have them, and us, sensible that they cannot manage things by their power, as they think good; but depend upon a higher cause, who orders all their motions, good and bad, to such ends as he proposes to himself, quite contrary to their intentions and inclinations. Which is an instance sufficient to correct the pride of the most absolute monarch, and the impatience of the most oppressed subject.

Next to which follows (ver. 2), a caution against thinking too well of ourselves: which had been delivered before (xvi. 2); but for the weightiness, I suppose, of the matter, and the prominence of men to flatter themselves, and not to judge sincerely of their own actions, is here again repeated. And then there is a caution added (ver. 3), against hypocrisy; which thinks to please God with ceremonies without moral honesty.

In the fourth verse the meaning is something unknown to me, from the different opinions of the word ser or sir; which the Greek, the Latin, and other plenteousness; but of every one that is hasty, only to want.

6 The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death.

7 The robbery of the wicked shall destroy them; because they refuse to do judgment.

8 The way of man is froward and strange: but as for the pure, his work is right.

9 It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house.

10 The soul of the wicked desireth evil: his neighbour findeth no favour in his eyes.

[7] Which, though it seems very plain, yet there are great varieties in the interpretation of it; because of the following part of the verse. In which many put in the word Jehovah, or God, to supply the sense (as we do), but without any necessity; there being a clear and obvious sense (which I have expressed in the paraphrase), without any such supplement; if we do but take the just man for a just magistrate, and not for a private person.

[8] There is little difficulty after this, till we come to the twenty-fourth verse; where he either gives this character of a sower, that he is proud and arrogant, and does all things in the wrath of his pride (as the words are in the Hebrew), or describes the proud and arrogant man to be a sower also, and full of haughty wrath. It is not of much concern which way we take it; for the sense will, in a manner, be the same. I have expressed the Hebrew, or at least as I could, in my paraphrase, taking the construction thus:—A proud and haughty person, who may well be called a sower, proceeds furiously and insufferably in all that he doth.

[9] In the last verse Solomon mentions the horse instead of all warlike preparations; because it was the chief; and all nations placed much of their confidence in it. It was the harness of their horses. But that the Israelites might not do so too, there was a special provision made in their law against it (Deut. xiv. 16). Notwithstanding which they were so prone to this vain confidence, that Joshua, in his wars against the Canaanites, houghed all the horses he took after a great victory; that is, cut their hames, and thereby made them unserviceable; which he did by an express command from God (Josh. xii. 6, 9), and the reason of it was (as Kimchi well observes) to prevent a false conceit which might have arisen in the people's mind; that they owed their good success to them, but they made use of those horses in future battles. Which Solomon also here endeavours to prevent: for, though he had a great number of horses to increase that splendour which was peculiar to him above all kings, yet he would have them know he did not trust in them; nor would have the people imagine they were a whit the more secure, because they were so well appointed for war, if they did not carry in their hearts the laws of God; and from him look for deliverance.

Ver. 1.] It is not in the power of kings, (much less of other men) either to do, or to design, what they please; but their very wills are subject to the great Lord of all; who diverteth them as easily from what they intend, or inclines them to that which they resolve against; as the gardener drives the streams of water through the trenches he has made, to what part of the ground he thinks good. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 2.] There is nothing that a man doth or designs (especially if he be great and potent), but, such is the fond affection he hath for himself, he fancies to be exactly good: when in the account of the Lord, who maketh labour, to heap up wealth, though it be by lying, or flattery, or calumny, or perjury: but as such treasures are no more durable than heaps of chaff, or clouds of smoke, which are soon dissipated by the wind; so they expose the owners of them to many dangers, and at last bring them, by their own diligence, to a woful end.

Ver. 3.] There are men that make it their business seriously to compound into the secrets of men's souls, and know the just value of everything, they are very defective, if not grossly wicked. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 4.] The pride, the insolence, the ambition, and vast desires: nay, all the designs and contrivances of wicked men, with all the prosperous successes they have in them, lead them into abundance of sins; and in the issue into no less miseries. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 5.] He that to prudent counsels and contrivances adds an honest diligence, is likely to grow rich: but he that acts inconsiderately in his business, or greedily catches at every advantage, whether by right or wrong: or undertakes more than he can manage, out of an eager desire to grow rich presently, is most like to be a beggar.

Ver. 6.] There are men that make it their business seriously to compound into the secrets of men's souls, and know the just value of everything, they are very defective, if not grossly wicked. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 7.] For a man whose life is nothing but want and craft, imposition and deceit, is so alienated from God, that he is very odious to him, and to all good men: but he that is sincere and free from all fraud and guile approves himself in all his actions, and is most acceptable and dear to both. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 8.] It is much more desirable to live p parking and solitariness in the open air, exposed to all the injuries of the weather: nay, to be thrust into a little corner on the top of the house; than to have a spacious habitation and numerous family, governed by a contentious wife: whose perpetual scolding and brawling within doors, upon the least occasion, is more than the thunder, and the lightning, and the blustering winds, which may molest him without.

Ver. 9.] An impious man is so set upon mischief, that he is not satisfied till he hath effect ed his desire:
CHAPTER XXI.

11 When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise: and when the wise is instructed, he receiveth knowledge.

12 The righteous man wisely considereth the house of the wicked: but God overthroweth the wicked for their wickedness.

13 Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard.

14 A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath.

15 It is joy to the just to do judgment: but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity.

16 The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead.

17 He that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man; he that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich.

18 The wicked shall be a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright.

19 It is better to dwell in the wilderness, than with a contentious and an angry woman.

20 There is treasure to be desired, and oil in the dwelling of the wise: but a foolish man spendeth it up.

21 He that followeth after righteousness and mercy, findeth life, righteousness, and honour.

22 A wise man sealeth the city of the mighty, and casteth down the strength of the confidence thereof.

23 Whoso keepeth his mouth and his tongue, keepeth his soul from troubles.

24 Proud and haughty scorner is his name, who dealeth in proud wrath.

25 The desire of the slothful killeth him; for his hands refuse to labour.

26 He coveteth greedily all the day long: but the righteous giveth and spareth not.

11 nor will he spare either friend or foe, to serve his ambition, his covetousness, or whatsoever evil affection it is that reigns in him.

Ver. 11.] Lay a heavy fine or other punishment upon a defier of religion; and though it do him no good, yet such simple persons as were only incautiously deluded by him, will make some wise reflections on it, and be the better for it: as for him that is wise already, it is sufficient only to give him good admonitions; of which he himself will receive the profit, and amend what is amiss in him. See Arg. [75.]

Ver. 12.] A just judge makes a pradent, but strict scrutiny into all the actions of a wicked man's family; that he may so punish them for their rapine, violence, and extortion, as to deprive them of all power to do any farther mischief. See Arg. [79.]

Ver. 13.] He who is so far from relieving the poor, though they lie under most grievous calamities, that he plainly declares their petitions are very troublesome to him, shall fall into the like straits and pressures himself: and, which is worse, he denied when they force him to cry for help.

Ver. 14.] Men do not love to be thought so weak as to do any thing for money; but such is its power, if it be correctly used; that they will resign their strongest resentments to it: their anger, for instance, will yield to a gift; nay, a rich present, prudently placed, will extinguish that wrath which was thought impleasable.

Ver. 15.] The execution of justice is a joy to him that hath observed the laws; but a terror to those that have violated them by their wicked deeds: who look upon themselves as in danger to be undone thereby.

Ver. 16.] He that will not live by those wise laws which God hath prescribed him, but follows the conduct of his own foolish lusts and passions, shall after all his extravagances he sent down to hell; and there confined to the company of the old giants, who, giving themselves over to debauched courses, were swept away with a deluge (see ii. 18; ix. 18).

Ver. 17.] Nay, before he goes thither he may suffer very much; for it is too frequently seen that voluptuous men destroy their own pleasures, by wasting their estates, and bringing themselves to extreme beggary: at the best, he can never thrive, who loves to feast and to live delicately.

Ver. 18.] Nay, such is the distinction which divine providence makes between the good and bad, that righteous men are not only strangely delivered from those dangers which others fall into, but preserved from mischief, by its seizing on the wicked: and men sincerely virtuous, escape in a common calamity: when they that prevail with God and with religion, by that very means (which they thought was best for their safety) are overwhelmed in it.

Ver. 19.] It is more eligible (as was said before, ver. 9), to dwell quietly in the most ruel peace upon earth, than to live in a palace with a contentious wife: whom nothing can please; but is uneasy and angry at every thing; and always gives provoking language.

Ver. 20.] Wisdom furnishes a man not only with the necessaries, but with all the conveniences and pleasures of life, that he can reasonably desire; which it teaches him also to enjoy with great satisfaction, though but in a small habitation: but such is the folly of a wicked man, that he lavishely spends all those treasures, which he knows not how to get, nor how to live without.

Ver. 21.] He that makes it his business to be good; not contenting himself merely with doing no harm, but greedily laying hold on all occasions to exercise justice and mercy, shall lead a most happy life: for, having seen and known the advantage and pleasure he hath in doing good, he shall preserve himself from being injured, and oblige all to be kind to him, and be highly esteemed, honoured, and praised everywhere.

Ver. 22.] The virtue of the mind is of greater force, and more prevalent, than strength of body: for a whole city of mighty men are not able to resist a wise and pious commander that besieges them; but they are either taken by his cunning stratagems, or they yield themselves to his eminent goodness: unto which they trust more than to their fortifications.

Ver. 23.] He that is wary and cautious in his talk, thinking seriously before he opens his mouth, and, taking care to offend neither God nor man by what he speaks, preserves his mind from a great deal of trouble, and himself from dangerous distresses.

Ver. 24.] He that is puffed up with a great conceit of himself, whose ambition makes him insatiable in his desires, as he regards neither God nor man, so he cannot endure the least opposition, nor do any thing with moderation; but, being easily enraged with insolent fierceness and cruelty, proceeds against those that cross his designs. See Arg. [77.]

Ver. 25.] A sluggard hath desires as well as other 27 The sacrifice of the wicked is abomination: how much more, when he bringeth it with a wicked mind?

28 A false witness shall perish: but the man that heareth speaketh constantly.

29 A wicked man hardeneth his face: but as men: which must needs be a perpetual torment to him, because he will not be at the pains to give them satisfaction: nay, they bring him sometimes to a miserable end; because his sloth moves him to make provision for them by robbery, or other unlawful ways, rather than by following some honest but inibitious calling.

Ver. 28.] It is folly to design any thing that is not approved by the Lord: for let it be managed with all the skill that natural sagacity, long study, and experience can furnish men withal; yet the most prudent foresight also of all contingencies; and with mature and deliberate advice about the most effectual means, and with due application of them to the end; they all signify nothing when they oppose the counsels and decrees of heaven.

Ver. 31.] Nor is power and force, though never so great, more significant than counsel and advice: for after an army of horses, and chariots, and valiant soldiers, are set in battle array, they can give no security of victory, without the divine favour and help; from whom alone therefore both safety and prosperous success are to be expected. See Arg. [A].

CHAPTER XXII.

1 A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favour rather than silver and gold.

CHAP. XXII.

Argument.—[a] After an admonition not to set too great a price upon riches (ver. 1), there follows another (ver. 2) unto rich men; not to set too great a value upon themselves; but with an instruction also to the poor, not to be discontented with their condition; the rich having as much need of them as they have of the rich: Greg. Nazianzen, indeed (Orat. xvi. 263), is of opinion that Solomon doth not say, that God hath made one man poor and another rich, ovt yap δεδαιν επεκτηνες τασσεσας διακρητας; "for it is not apparent that such a distinction is from God;" but his meaning is only this, that πλασθαι εκεινους Ἰωνας αμφιηας, και της ἡπεκ τους, "they are both alike the workmanship of God, though in external regards they be unequal." Which ought to shame rich men into sympathy and brotherly-kindness towards them: that when they are apt to be lifted up because of those things wherein they are unequal, they may be taken down again and become more moderate, when they consider how in the greatest things they are both alike.

But I have had a respect to the other thing also in my paraphrase: because, if God did not intend in the beginning so great a disparity as we now see (which this is not a place to dispute), yet some disparity it may be easily proved he did design; the mean condition, that is (though not beggary) of 2 The rich and poor meet together: the Lord is the maker of them all.

3 A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and some, in comparison with others. Which serves many wise ends of his providence: may beggary, may be very useful, to give the greater occasion of liberality on the one hand, and of patience, humility, and honest diligence, on the other. And to be commended for these virtues is much better than to be rich, as he observes in the first verse. Where Melancthon hath a large discourse to show that it is lawful, may, necessary, to endeavour after a good fame: according to that saying, "I have need of a good conscience with respect to God, and of a good name for the sake of my neighbours." And he alleges some ancient sentences to the same purpose with this of Solomon; as that given here, pater altruorum patris patriam est, and of Plautus, Honestam famam si servasse, sat ero dives. [b] There are more observations about riches, in ver. 7—9, which seem to me to have a dependence one upon the other; and so I have considered them in the paraphrase. And in the next verse but one (ver. 11), I have followed the judgment of Lord De Dieu, who thinks Solomon observes two fruits of parenness of heart; one, that the word of such a man may be relied on; and the other, that the king (who loves not to be deceived) will be his friend upon that account. This seems nearest to the Hebrew; unless we will take it thus: Two things recommend a man to the affection of a prince; his integritas and his eloquentia: which make him very for the upright, he directeth his way.

30 There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel against the Lord.

31 The horse is prepared against the day of battle: but safety is of the Lord.
hided himself: but the simple pass on, and are punished.

4 By humility and the fear of the Lord are riches, honour, and life.

5 Thorns and snares are in the way of the froward: he that doth keep his soul shall be far from them.

capable to do his prince service. And then the paraphrase must run thus:—He that loves sincerity above all things, and is able to deliver his mind in acceptable language, is fit to be privy-counsellor to a king.

[c] And to this, I conceive, he hath some respect in the next verse; where by death, knowledge, in the first part of it, we are to understand (the other part of the verse shows), Men truly knowing, and who speak according to their knowledge.

[d] In the thirteenth verse, there is an admirable description of the disposition of slouthful persons, who raise difficulties in their own fancies, where there are none; or, pretending them greater than they are, will not so much as attempt anything, because it is possible they may meet with insuperable hindrances. Which some have, not unfitly, applied to cowardly magistrates, who dare not punish great and powerful offenders; but excuse themselves, saying, He is a mighty man, there is no dealing with him, &c. Whereas a worthy magistrate (as an excellent prelate of our own, bishop Sanderson speaks) would choose to meet with such a lion; that he might make God's ordinance to be revered, and clear the way for others, by tearing such a beast in pieces; "and would no more fear to make war on, or a right wretched murderer (if such a one should come in his circuit), an example of justice, than to twitch up a poor sheep-stealer."

But the lord Bacon applies it, no less wittily, to the laziness of mankind, in the Advancement of Learning (lib. i. ch. ult.), the knowledge of some things being so abstruse that it is impossible to be compassed by human industry. Whereas "all those things are to be held possible and performable, which may be accomplished by some persons, though not by one; and which may be done by the united labours of many, though not by any one party; and which may be effected in a successful manner, though not in the same age; and the brief, which may be finished by the public care and charge, though not by the abilities and industry of particular persons." But there is no excuse for those who will not set themselves to any inquiries, because some things cannot be known. Which is perfectly the temper of the sluggard Solomon here mentioned; who, because a lion sometimes comes into the street, would not stir out of his doors. It was not ordinary, you must know, for lions to come into towns; no, nor to rove in the day-time (the night being their season, Ps. civ. 20): but sometimes by the divine vengeance they were stirred up to leave the deserts, and go to inhabited places (Jer. v. 6: 2 Kings xvii. 25, 26); and likewise, if we may believe the great philosopher (in his History of Animals), when they grow old, πολλος τας πόλεις ἐγκαταστάσεις, &c. they haunt cities more than other places; because then they are not so able to prey upon beasts, and therefore lie in wait for men. The same is affirmed by Pliny, as Bochartus observes, lib. iii. cap. 2, par. i.

[e] In the sixteenth verse I have followed our translation, and expressed the sense to as much advantage as I could. But I think the vulgar Latin, which Luther and some others follow, comes nearer to the Hebrew, which runs thus: "He that squeezes the poor to increase his own estate, gives to the rich (not to secure what he hath gotten), but only to impoverish it:" that is, He shall be squeezed by some mightier person than himself: and so the paraphrase, in more words, should be this:

Such is the just providence of almighty God, that he who, to enlarge his own estate or power, oppresseth the poor by violence or deceit, shall meet with the like extortion from others more powerful than himself: and thereby be reduced to as poor a condition as those whom he oppressed.

Ver. 1.] Riches are not so great a good as men imagine; for a wise man will prefer the fame of using them well (or any other virtue) much before them: and choose much rather to be esteemed and beloved of good men, than to be possessed of abundance of silver and gold. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 2.] The world doth not consist all of rich, nor all of poor; but they are mixed together, and have need of one another: and will agree well enough, and not clash one against another, if they both consider that there is one Lord, who is the creator of both; and hath by his providence, ordered this inequality for their mutual good. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 3.] He whose long experience and observation of things hath made him cautious and circumspect, foresees a calamity before it comes; and withdraws himself from the danger, into a place of safety: but an incautious and credulous person is easily abused by crafty men, to overlook the mischief, which even they intend against him; and so he goes on securely in his accustomed track, till it overtakes him.

Ver. 4.] A modest sense of a man's self, and humble submission to the meanest condition, arising from a religious regard to the divine majesty, is the way to be promoted both to wealth and to honour; and to enjoy them both also a long time in joy and pleasure.

Ver. 5.] The life of a man that winds and turns any way to bring about his ends, is very scandalous to others; and will enrage him at last in most grievous troubles: he, therefore, that hath a care of his soul, will have no society with such persons; and thereby avoid the danger of being undone by them.

Ver. 6.] Instruct a child as soon as ever he is capable, and season his mind with the principles of virtue, before he receives other impressions: and it is most likely they will grow up with him; so that when he is older he will not forsake them, but retain them as long as he lives.

Ver. 7.] Riches draw dominion along with them over the meaner sort; nay, though a man be not absolutely poor, yet, if he be forced to borrow, he loses his liberty, and depends upon the will and pleasure of his lender.

Ver. 8.] But let not such abuse their power, for no man can reap better than he sows; but if he do injury to others, it shall produce his own trouble: and the authority which he employs vexatiously and spite-9 He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed; for he giveth of his bread to the poor.

10 Cast out the scorners, and contention shall go out; yea, strife and reproach shall cease.

11 He that loveth pureness of heart, for the grace of his lips the king shall be his friend.

12 The eyes of the Lord preserve knowledge, and he overthroweth the words of the transgressor.

fully shall fail him, and not be able to bear him out in his inhumanity.

Ver. 9.] On the other side, he that beholding the miserable condition of others, takes compassion upon them, and friendly relieves them, shall be blessed by God, and commended by men: because he doth not put them off to be supplied by others, but imparts of his own goods to him that cannot requite him again.

Ver. 10.] Throw the scoffer, who derides all things, out of a society, and contention, which he is wont to raise, will go out together with him: there will be no quarrels, no suits, no reproachful words, whereby contending persons are apt to bespatter one another, when such insolent and turbulent men are excluded.

Ver. 11.] He whose heart is so free from guile, that he places his pleasure in the integrity of his conscience, will never gloss, nor flatter, nor study to put false colours upon things, but speak ingenuously according to the sincere sense of his soul; wherein both which accounts a wise prince will value him, and advise with him as a friend. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 13.] There is a special providence of God which watches over honest men (who speak as they think); and which prospereth the advice they give, and the affairs they manage; but he subverts such as are treacherous and pernicious; and blasted all their counsels and designs. See Arg. [c].

13 The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets.

14 The mouth of strange women is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein.

15 Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child; but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him.

16 He that oppresseth the poor to increase his riches, and he that giveth to the rich, shall surely come to want.

Ver. 13.] A slothful man never wants pretences to excuse himself from labours; for he can feign to himself imaginary difficulties, and make a dreadful representation of them: affrighting himself with dangers where there are none; or which happen very rarely. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 14.] When thou art enticed by the beauty and blandishments of those lusted women, from whom thou oughtest to estrange thyself as far as they are estranged from God (see ii. 16), remember that they allure thee into such a gulf of utter destruction, that to fall into their familiarity, is a work of the highest displeasure of Almighty God against thee, for some other crimes.

Ver. 15.] False opinions and bad inclinations stick so close sometimes to the mind and will of a child, and are so twisted with them, that no admonitions, no reproofs, nor the wisest discourses, but only prudent and sensible chastisement, and that not without some severity, will remove such obstinate folly.

Ver. 16.] There are some men have such a mixture of ill qualities, that at the same time they will take from the poor to enrich themselves, though it be by violence or fraud; and give to the rich and powerful to wink at their oppressions; but all in vain; for such practices shall surely bring them to beggary. See Arg. [e].
19 That thy trust may be in the Lord, I have made known to thee this day, even to thee.

20 Have not I written to thee excellent things in counsels and knowledge, 21 That I might make thee know the certainty of the words of truth; that thou mightest answer the words of truth to them that send unto thee?
22 Rob not the poor, because he is poor: neither oppress the allicted in the gate:
23 For the Lord will plead their cause, and spoil the soul of those that spoiled them.
24 Make no friendship with an angry man; and with a furious man thou shalt not go:

please. The motions also of the minds of kings are swift, and not very patient of delays. For they imagine that they are doing a thing; this only being wanting, that it be done out of hand. Upon which account, above all other qualities, celerity is to them most acceptable,"

Ver. 17.] And now let me exhort thee again (iv. 20, v. 1), whosoever thou art that readest these things, to attend diligently; and consider seriously all the counsels and precepts which good men have delivered: and in particular, let me prevail for an affectionate application of thy mind, to the knowledge which I impart unto thee.

Ver. 18.] For it will give thee most high satisfaction if thou dost so heartily entertain them, and thoroughly digest them, and faithfully preserve them in mind; that thou art able wthold to produce any of them, as there is occasion, and aptly communicate them for other men's instruction.

Ver. 19.] For what greater satisfaction can there be, than to have a good hope in God, and to be well assured of his gracious provision over thee! which is the very end for which I now declare these things to thee; that if thou hast been negligent before, yet now at length, thou, even thou, mayest know the way to happiness, and show it unto others.

Ver. 20.] Think of it seriously, and deny, if thou canst, that I have taken more ways than one for thy information, and have set down most excellent rules, and those well considered with great exactness and care, for thy conduct both in public and in a private state of life. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 21.] That thou mightest not only have a certain, firm, and solid knowledge, of all these truths that are necessary for thee, but be able also to give sound advice to those that send to consult thee: and be fit to manage the most difficult affairs, to the satisfaction of them that employ thee in an embassy.

Ver. 22.] And besides these instructions already given, remember these that follow. Never abuse thy power to the spoiling of him that is in a mean condition, because he is unable to resist thee: but especially do not undo him there, where he hopes for relief, by denying him justice, much less by false accusations, which he comes into the public courts of judgment (2 Sam. xv. 2). See Arg. [g].

25) least thou learn his ways, and get a snare to thy soul.
26) Be not thou one of them that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts.
27) If thou hast nothing to pay, why should he take away thy bed from under thee?
28) Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set.
29) Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men.

Ver. 23.] For all causes shall be heard over again, by a higher judge; even the Lord himself, who will do them right: and force their spoilers to pay dearly for the wrong they have done them; for which nothing less than their life shall make satisfaction.

Ver. 24.] And as there is nothing more necessary than a friend, so a principal point of wisdom consists in the choice of him; concerning which, observe this rule among others: not to enter into any familiarity with a man prone to anger; and the more furious he is, so much the more cautious of being drawn along with him into any company. See Arg. [k].

Ver. 25.] For it will be a very hard matter to preserve thyself in good temper, when he is out of humour; but thy very kindness to him will make thee feel the same commotion: nay, bring thy very life into great danger, by being engaged in all his quarrels.

Ver. 26.] And do not keep company with those who are forward to pass their word, and give security, for the payment of other men's debts; lest they draw thee into such dangerous engagements (vi. 1; xi. 15), especially when thou hast no estate to answer the debt for which thou art bound. See Arg. [i].

Ver. 27.] For it will highly improve the creditor when he falls upon thee, to find thou art not so able a man as thou madest a show of to him, and so provoke him to pull away the very bed from under thee, when thou art in it; and leave thee shamefully and wretchedly on the ground: for why should any man have so little care of his own good, as thus to expose himself to such miserable straits for the sake of another?

Ver. 28.] Be content with thy own estate, and do not seek to enlarge it by invading other men's possessions: especially those to which they have an unquestionable right, having enjoyed them by long prescription, and by the consent of thy forefathers, whose constitutions ought to be had in great veneration. See Arg. [k].

Ver. 29.] Mark a man that is not rash, but yet quick and dexterous in the dispatch of any business he is charged withal: and thou mayest foretell that he shall not long continue obscure, in some private and mean family; but be taken notice of, and preferred to the service of his prince, in some public ministry.

CHAPTER XXIII.

1 When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee:

CHAP. XXIII.

ARGUMENT.—[a] As the foregoing chapter concludes with an observation concerning the quality of a person who is most likely to come to preferment, so this begins with a caution to him, when he is promoted to it. For the first verse is (as Melanchthon calls it) Aulica admonitio, "an admonition to a courtier," remembering him, that there is danger, even in the favour, especially in the familiarity, of princes and great men. Whose kindness must be used with so much modesty and circumspection especially if they be so extraordinarily kind, as to admit an inferior to eat with them: when if a man use not great moderation, he loses the guard he ought to have upon himself. For his head growing hot, his tongue may run (as we say) before his wit; his behaviour may be indecent, of too negligent, &c. and therefore Solomon advises a person to be very considerate at that time above all others; and with earnest attention to mind both who and what is before him (for the Hebrew words may refer to both, as I have explained in the paraphrase); there being great danger of his ruin, if he give any offence at such a time; when the passions of the prince or ruler are apt to be as disordered as his own: and therefore had need be watched, that he may know how to appease them presently; and so govern himself as to receive no prejudice thereby.

CHAPTER XXIII.

3 Be not desirous of his dainties: for they are deceitful meat.

4 Labour not to be rich; cease from thine own wisdom.

[6] But especially he must be sure to have a command over his tongue (which Melanchthon takes to be the meaning of putting a knife to his throat, ver. 2), that it take not too much liberty, and that he speak nothing rashly; which may undo him, as it did Clytus; whom Alexander slew at a feast, for contradicting him too freely. He cites many admonitions out of the poets concerning this danger; concluding with that counsel which 6Sop gave Solon, whereof he was a disciple to the wise king, ο ἐκ τοῦ σατραπών. ο ἐκ τοῦ σατραπών, “either as little, or as sweet, as is possible.”

But this is too narrow a sense of that phrase, put a knife to thy throat; though it be a part of it. For it expresses the exceeding great caution a man should use at a feast, lest he exceed his bounds in eating and drinking: wherein he should be as careful as he is of cutting his throat; which many have in effect done by intemperance; whereby some have utterly destroyed their healths at last; and others fallen into such a liberty of speech, as hath on a sudden cost them their lives. Be as afraid, therefore, saith the wise man, of running into excesses in feasting, as great danger at a great table, if thou hast a great stomach, (as if thy knife wherewith thou cuttest thy meat, would certainly cut thy throat, if thou eatest too much. In short, he advises a man to afflict himself from intemperance, where is a great temptation to it.

There are, that take the first article re, in the beginning of the verse, to signify as much as otherwise; and the meaning to be, If thou dost not curb thy appetite, but let loose its reins to eat and drink as much as it desireth, it will expose thee to as certain danger, as if a knife were at thy throat; which, though it be not so easy a construction, I have not altogether neglected.

[c] After this follows an admonition against covetousness, ver. 4, where he neither forbids all labour, nor a provident care (which in other places he commends), but only represents how vain it is to be over solicitous; and to leave no thoughts nor strength for any thing else: for so the first word is, do not uneasy thyself to be rich. And in the next part of the sentence, he only bids us desist from our own understanding; meaning thereby, either we should not wholly trust to that, though in the use of honest means; or that we should not follow our own inventions, contrary to the divine direction. Some would have the meaning of the whole to be this; Do not prefer the getting of riches before the getting of wisdom: taking the verse as if it ran thus; “labour not for riches so as to cease from the prosecution of wisdom;” let not thy worldly cares hinder better things, and then there would be no danger: which is an excellent sense, if the words would bear it.

[d] The reason which Solomon adds (ver. 5), hath little or no difficulty in it; which is from the uncertainty, either of getting or of keeping riches. Whose inconstancy he sets forth by the flight of an eagle: which of all other birds is observed to fly swiftest, and highest into heaven (as Solomon here speaks), or into the clouds (as other authors); that is, quite out of sight. Whence it is that God saying he carried the Israelites out of Egypt by “eagle’s wings,” Exod. xix. 1. R. Solomon (upon Exod. xii. 37) took a conceit that they went a hundred and twenty miles in one hour; for so far it was from Rameses to Succoth. Which though it be but an idle fancy, yet there was this foundation for it; that the scripture expresses the swiftest motion by that of the eagles. So Saul and Jonathan, who were strong and excellent racers, pursuing the enemies with great speed, are said to have been “swifter than eagles” (2 Sam. i. 23). And such were they who pursued Zedekiah and the people of Judah, when they fled out of Jerusalem in hope to make an escape (Am. iv. 19. Hab. i. 8, compared with K. Proverbs xiii. 4). Thus other nations represent it, as Bochart observes out of Cicero, who tells us out of Chrysippus, that when a racer dreamed he was turned into an eagle, an interpreter told him, “Vicisti, ista enim ave volat nulla velocis.”

[e] Next to covetousness he condemns envy, as Melanchthon and others understand verse 6, &c. or rather such covetousness, as makes men sordid: whence arises, indeed, that part of envy, which disposes a man to grudge every thing to his neighbour, though he would be thought liberal; which I pass by only with this note, of that good man; That a singular diligence ought to be used, in observing and finding out the dispositions and estimations of others; that we may know whom to avoid, and whom to consort withal. And (according as he understands the beginning of the next verse, ver. 7) there is none worse than the man now mentioned, who hath a spectre or satyr in his soul; so he renders it, mistaking schaar for saar: which are widely different. And this word schaar being used only here in this place, hath raised a great deal of difficulty, whence to derive it: which I shall not trouble the reader withal: the sense being well enough expressed in our translation, and in short is this, he is not what he seems: his thought and manner much from his words; and therefore do not believe what he saith, but mark the discovery he makes of his inward thoughts, which are so sordid, that he is detestable, as some render the phrase, or stickingly base.

[f] Of envy at the prosperous estate of wicked men, which makes others wish themselves in their condition, though it be by imitating their wickedness, he speaks afterward, verse 17. From whence, to the twenty-fifth chapter, most of the precepts are admonitions proper for parents to give their children; that they may know what to eschew; particularly drunkenness and whoredom (of which he speaks in this chapter), and such compny as may entice them to so lewdly wicked. And, in order hereunto, to implant in their minds a due esteem.
of wisdom, as infinitely to be preferred before all earthly treasures. This he inserts in the middle, between the cautions against drunkenness and whoredom [g], ver. 23, upon which the lord Bacon hath passed this remark, that the wise man judged it reasonable, that "riches should be employed to get learning, and not learning be applied to gather up riches."

[4] St. Chrysostom's observation concerning a harlot (Hom. xiv. ad. pop. Antioch.) most excellently explains verses 27, 28, that "οφρήν φιλῶν οὐκ ἐπίσταται, άλλα ἐσπαθεῖς μόνον, "a where understands nothing of love or friendship, but only the art of inveighing." Her heart is never sensible of true affections; it is a trap, a snare, and entrap men into their undoing. And if the danger do not appear, she is the more to be avoided, κατ' ἐπιστασίαν τον Δαίμον, &c. "because she covers the destruction and hides the death;" and takes care it shall not presently come into the sight of him, whom she ensures into it.

In the conclusion of this chapter he resumes his discourse about drunkenness; and represents at large the dismal effects of it, in so lively a manner, as may well deter any man that reads it seriously from being too busy with wine: which he saith, in conclusion, "bites like a serpent, and stings like a basilisk." (so Bochartus hath proved we ought to traduce the word φοίνικας, which we render "sawder";) whence it was that Talmus, the Encratites, and Manichees, called wine "the gall of the dragon, and the venom of the old serpent;" and would not taste a drop of it, no, not in the holy communion. Not considering, that this flies open and obvious to every body's eyes, that there is no hurt in the thing itself, or in a singular divine benefit, but in our excess. Whereby innumerable diseases are bred in the body, the reason for the present suffocated, and the most absurd affections stirred up: which change men for the time into beasts. Some into θησος, as Bochartus glosses (lib. iii. cap. 10, par. ii.); witness Alexander, who killed his dearest friend his cups; and Herod, who, after a feast, condemned the great servant of God, John Baptist (whom he himself highly revereded), to be beheaded; others into dogs; as Nebal, who most rudely and chirulisbly barked at David, to whom he had great obligations, when he was in drink: others into hogs, wallowing in filthy pleasures; as Lot who defiled himself with incest, when he was not himself; nay, it throw men down worse than beasts, who drink no more than needs, and never excite their thirst by art, but only follow the directions of nature. All which, if any man consider, he will easily allow of what Solomon says, that it "bites like a serpent," &c. that is, doth more mischief than can be repaired. For the wound which the basilisk gives is said, by Avicenna, to be incurable; and the writers of his nation say, it doth hurt even by its looks and hissing, as that author before named relates, cap. 9. And so Solomon immediately represents the effects of drunkenness to be such, that they make a man senseless; and perfectly stupified, and consequently incorrigible, though he suffer never so sensibly by it (ver. 34, 35). As if this poison made a mortification in the whole man; for which there is no remedy.

Ver. 1.] When a prince, or a very great person, doth thee the honour to admit thee to his table, be not transported with such vain joy, as to remit the seriousness of thy mind: but remember thou art in danger, if thou hast not thy wits about thee to direct thy behaviour; lest thou touch any thing, which, perhaps, was reserved only for the prince's own eating, or demean thyself indecently towards him or towards any of the guests or waiters at the table. See Arg. [4].

Ver. 2.] Especially lest thou speak too freely, which may hazard thy undoing; for the prevention of which keep thy mind as sharp as thine appetite; and afflict thyself from intemperance in language, as well as in eating: of which there is the greater danger, if thou hast a greedy desire of meat and drink. See Arg. [6].

Ver. 3.] Most especially when exquisite delicacies are set before thee, which are so tempting, that it is a piece of wisdom not to be too forward to accept of such invitations; or being there to content thyself with the plainest dish: for it was not kindness, but design, perhaps, which called thee thither; or thou mayest be easily enticed by such dainties to over-eat thyself.

Ver. 4.] Do not trouble thyself with restless and tiresome labours to get a great estate; he be not too thoughtful, nor let thy cares be endless about such matters; much less use any ill contrivances which they may suggest to thee; no, nor depend so much upon thy own prudent management for the success of thy honest undertakings, as upon God's blessings. See Arg. [4].

Ver. 5.] Consider, for the cure of this, how ridiculous is it, that thou shouldst let thy mind be so intent upon riches, and pursue them with such haste and earnestness which, perhaps, thou canst never catch; or, if thou dost, may be gone as fast as they came; and by all thy care and pains never be recovered. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 6.] Receive no obligations from a sordid man: but though he invite thee to a feast (which he may perhaps make sometimes for ostentation's sake), let not the good cheer tempt thee to accept his invitation. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 7.] For, even then, when he would be thought most free and generous, he is not able to dissemble the baseness of his mind: which expresses itself in his very looks; whereby he shows that when he prays thee to feed heartily, he had rather thou wouldest let it alone, and thinks thou eatest and drunken a great deal too much.

Ver. 8.] Which will make thee so nauseate, as to be ready to bring up again every bit thou hast eaten: and to repent of thy insatiate indulgences; thou hast bestowed on his entertainment; or the thanks thou hast returned to him for it; or the wholesome discourse thou hast interspersed at the table; for it is all perfectly lost upon him.

Ver. 9.] And, indeed, it is good advice, not to speak of any serious thing to such stupid fools; for he thy discourse never so ingenious, prudent, or instructive, they will not only reap no profit by it, but despise, and, perhaps, laugh at it.

Ver. 10.] What was said before (xxii. 28), of not removing the ancient boundaries, understand with a peculiar respect to fatherless children: whose possessi ons be not tempted to invade, because they are in their infancy, and do not understand the wrong that is done them: or are utterly unable to defend or to right themselves.

Ver. 11.] For, if their guardians and friends be careless of their concerns, or afraid to oppose thy proceedings, they have a protector, who neither wants power with courage to recover their right: and will undoubtedly assert it, and condemn thee to make them ample satisfaction (xxii. 23).

Ver. 12.] And do not think these to be slight admonitions, which need not much to be regarded, but apply thine mind with sincere affections to such instructions, and listen diligently to those persons whose discourses tend to make thee understand thy duty.

Ver. 13.] Unto which children sometimes will not attend, and therefore remember what hath been often said (xiii. 24; xix. 18; xxii. 15), do not forbear to give correction to a child that is so ill-disposed: let not foolish pity make thee spare him; for it will do him no hurt if he be soundly beaten; but rather be a means to save him from sorer punishment, even from death itself.

Ver. 14.] Do not turn over this business to another, but do it thyself; which may save the public officers the labour; may, by making his body smart for his faults, both body and soul may be delivered from utter destruction.

Ver. 15.] But mix the kindest exhortations and entreaties with this discipline, saying: My dear child, if thou hast any love for me, who was the instrument of bringing thee into the world, be serious, and heartily in love with wisdom and goodness, which will give me, me, I say (not to mention now thy own happiness), a joy incomparably greater than all other.

Ver. 16.] A joy that may be better felt than expressed: diffusing itself all over me; and making my mind triumph, when I hear no ill words come out of thy mouth; but only discourses of the right way to be happy.

Ver. 17.] In which, that thou mayest always tread, be not offended at the prosperity of the wicked: much less vex and fret thyself into an imitation of them: but maintain perpetually an awful sense of God in thy mind; which is the best preservative against envy, and all other sins, if thou perseverest constantly in it. See Arg. [*].

Ver. 18.] Which there is great reason thou shouldst; for however thou art afflicted for the present, the time will come when thou shalt not only be delivered, but rewarded for thy patience: expect it confidently, if the fear of the Lord make thee persist in faithful obedience to him: for it shall not be in the power of man to disappoint thee of thy hope; but thou shalt certainly flourish, when those wicked men shall hang down their heads and perish.

Ver. 19.] And more particularly, my dear child, be advised by me to study this piece of wisdom; and to follow closely and heartily this direction which I commend to thee.

Ver. 20.] I know how greedy youth is of pleasure; and in what danger to be corrupted by it: therefore avoid the society of drunkards and gluttons; and take heed of all excess in eating and drinking.

Ver. 21.] For besides that it is an enemy to wisdom, it brings men to poverty; which is the common effect of revelling, feasting, and riotous living: for that is wont to be attended also with laziness, carelessness, and neglect of all business; which necessarily reduce men to extreme beggary.

Ver. 22.] Be obedient to this counsel, which is given thee by thy father, who loves thee, and hath had longer experience of the world than thou, and by bringing thee into it hath power to command thee: and do not slight (as the manner is) what thy mother saith, because she is a woman, much less because she is grown old; which ought to make her advice the more regarded by thee.

Ver. 23.] Spare no cost nor pains to acquire the knowledge of what is true and false, good and bad; and do not think there is any thing of equal price unto it: and therefore neglect not the study of it, though it were to get never so much money, or the highest honours; but prefer wisdom and virtue, and the means that instruct thee how to attain them, and to make thee able to do good to others, infinitely before them all. See Arg. [*].

Ver. 24.] For there is no greater joy a parent can have, than to see his son take virtuous courses: which as it is the only wisdom, so gives both parents and children the highest pleasure and satisfaction.

Ver. 25.] Let not thy father and mother, then, want this singular pleasure; but by thy well-doing fill the heart of her that bare thee with joy and triumph: who, for all the pains and care she hath had in thy birth and about thy education, desires no other re- quital but only this.

Ver. 26.] And more especially, my dear child, let me prevail with thee also to apply thy mind affectionately to this following instruction: and let thy thoughts be very intent and fixed upon it: that thou mayest preserve thyself in the practice of those virtues to which I have directed thee.

Ver. 27.] Strangest thou from harlots, as much as they are estranged from God; for (as I have told thee before, xxii. 14), thou art utterly undone, if thou fallest in league with a whore; who will never be satisfied with all the money thou canst give her: and yet, such are her arts, notwithstanding all the straits and hardships thou shalt suffer by her, it will be a hard matter, when thou art once engaged, to get quit of her.

Ver. 28.] She is not what she appears: but whatsoever love she may pretend to thee, is no better than a highway-robber; who will watch all opportunities to make a prey of thee: and is of no other use in the world, which already is too bad, but to make it worse by increasing the number of lewd, disloyal, and faithless men. See Arg. [k].

Ver. 29.] And if thou intendest to avoid such women, then (as I said before, ver. 20), avoid intemperance; the lamentable effects of which are so many, that it is a hard matter to enumerate them: for if thou considerest who they are that run themselves into all manner of mischiefs, that are never out of danger, but are engaged, for instance, in quarrels, disturbing the neighbourhood by their noise and tumult, and fighting; and are wounded, not for the safety of their country, but for frivolous causes; look deformedly, and spoil their very countenances:

Ver. 30.] Thou wilt find they are such as are so in love with wine, that they neither willingly stir from it, nor content themselves with the ordinary sort; but 32 At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.

33 Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things.
34 Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast.
35 They have stricken me, shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not; when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again.

make a diligent search for the richest and most generous liquors.

Ver. 31.] Therefore do not believe thy senses merely, but consider the power and effects of wine; and when thou seest how bright it looks, and how it sparkles in the glass; when it tastes most gratefully, and goes down smoothly: let it not entice thee to excess.

Ver. 32.] But remember, that the pleasure will be attended at last with intolerable pains; when it works like so much poison in the veins; and casts thee into disease, as hard to cure, as the biting of a serpent or the stinging of a basilisk. See Arg. [i].

Ver. 33.] Thy thoughts will not only grow confused, and all things appear to thee otherwise than they are; but lustful, nay, adulterous desires will be stirred up, which thou canst not rule; and thy mouth, being without a bridle, will break forth into uncouth, filthy, scurrilous, or, perhaps, blasphemous language; without respect to God or man.

Ver. 34.] And, which is worst of all, thou wilt grow so perfectly senseless, that thy most important business will not only lie neglected; but thou wilt sottishly run thyself into the extreme hazards, without any apprehension of danger: being no more able to direct thy course, than a pilot who snorts when a ship is tossed in the midst of the sea; or to take notice of the peril thou art in, than he that falls asleep on the top of the mast, where he was set to keep the watch.

Ver. 35.] And to complete thy misery, shouldst thou be not only mocked and abused, but beaten also, thou thyself wilt confess, afterward, that it made no impression on thee: nay, shouldst thou be most lamentably battered and bruised, thou wilt neither know who did it, nor at all regard it; but, as if no harm had befallen thee, no sooner open thy eyes, but stupidly seek an occasion to be drunk, and beaten again.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Be not thou envious against evil men, neither desire to be with them.

CHAP. XXIV.

ARGUMENT.—[a] The proneness of good men, especially while they are weak, and only in the beginnings of goodness, to be dejected at the prosperity of the angiolly, and so to be tempted to imitate them, is the reason that the admonition we meet withal in the first verse is so often repeated. Which we find before (iii. 31; xxiii. 17), and comes again, ver. 18, of this chapter.

translate otherwise, and so do most interpreters: and therefore I have expressed the sense of our translation first; and only annexed the other to it. There is a third, which I have taken no notice of in my paraphrase, because it doth not seem to me to be genuine: which is this, If adversity defeat thee, and break thy spirit; thou wilt be so much the more unable to get out of it. But it is an excellent observation, and therefore I thought good here to mention it: though the simplest sense seems to be that which we follow, and in brief is this: Thou art not a man of courage if thou canst not bear adversity with an equal mind.

[2] And there is a courage to be exercised in our charitable succouring of others, as well as in our own distresses; which he commends in the following words, ver. 11, 12, where he presses with a great deal of warmth (as will appear to those that understand the Hebrew language, and read the last words with an interrogation), the necessity of giving our assistance to the resembling of innocent persons (when their lives are in danger), either by compassing them, or petitioning others in their behalf, or purchasing their release with money, or using our authority, or power (if we have any and can do it lawfully), for their deliverance. For this chiefly belongs to magistrates, and those that are in public offices; who ought not to be overawed by great men, from undertaking the protection and relief of those that are unjustly oppressed. This, I think, Melancthon has expressed, as well or better, than any I have met withal, in this manner: God commands both magistrates and private men not to murder the innocent, and likewise not to assist unjust cruelty. But quite contrary, the magistrate ought to be the guardian of innocent men's lives; and private persons in their places ought to oppose, without sedition, unjust severity, as much as they are able. There are many examples of this in the scripture. Jonathan opposed his father and helped to preserve David; not only by the good testimony he gave of him, but by other good offices. Obadiah feared for the prophet whom Jehu设计 to have killed. The ranche pulled up Jeremiah out of the danger; and the Egyptian midwives saved the Israelites' children, as Rahab afterward did the spies. In the time of Dissolution, a noble person in the city of Neomedia in Bithynia, publicly tore down the edict of the emperor for putting Christians to death, that he might show he detested that unjust cruelty. Examples to the contrary, are such as that of Dorg, who, in compliance with Saul's fury, slew the innocent priests; and many now either openly or by their silence confirm the unjust severity, which is exercised against our churches: who do think of their account of Solomon, If thou forbeart to deliver them, &c.

[e] Who shows what pleasure such instructions should be received, and how profitable, nay, necessary, they are, by the example of honey (ver. 13, 14), which was not only reckoned the sweetest thing in those countries (as appears by many places in scripture), but one of those which were most necessary for human life; and appears by the words of the son of Sirach (xxxix. 41). For it was useful for food, for drink, for medicine, for preserving of dead bodies; and was so natural to them, that it seems to have been the food of infants (Isa. vii. 15). Wherefore it was not therefore to give a little milk and honey to those who were baptized; as persons newly regenerate and born again:

because honey, as well as milk, was the nutriment of little children in those days and countries. How refreshing it was, appears by the story of Jonathan (1 Sam. xiv. 17), and in what common use, by the example of our Saviour after his resurrection (Luke xxiv. 43, 45). Which may all be applied to wis- dom: from whence the mind derives the greatest satisfaction; and therefore ought to be, as it were, our daily diet (without which we cannot subsist), from the beginning of our days unto the end of them.

[f] For many gracious promises are made to it which must not be so understood, he shows, as if no evil thing should befall good men: but as wisdom teaches them to be content with a little (which seems to be denoted by the word we translate habitation, ver. 15), so when they meet with any affliction, it instructs them not to despair of better days. So these words are to be understood, ver. 16, which are commonly not only in sermons, but in books also, applied to falling into sin: and that men may the more securely indulge themselves in their sins, and yet think themselves good men, they have very generally preferred some of our best scholars. For they are commonly cited thus, A just man falleth seven times a day, which last words a day, or in a day, are not in any translation of the bible (much less in the original), but only in some corrupt editions of the Vulgar Latin: which, against the plain scope of the context, and meaning of the words, seem to the understand and that the first seven days into sin. The whole word fall never signifies so; but always trouble and calamity: as abundance of learned men have long ago observed; particularly Tarnovius, and, since him, Amama and Grotius. Nor needs there any other proof of it, than those places (which are many) wherein falling and rising again being opposed, both of them have respect to calamities: and the former signifies, being plunged into them, and the other getting out of them. And so, in the Latin tongue, adversities are called casus, fails, as every body knows.

And therefore we must make use of other places, for the confirming the fancy of perfection in this life; and for the comfort of those who are cast down by their lapses and enemies, and sunk into such troubles as the holy scriptures so carelessly, as to turn our medic- ine into poison: which is the fault of those who, from such mistakes, give way to their evil affec- tions, and let them carry them into sin.

[g] Against this there follows a severe caution, in the wise man, who would not have us so much as indulge ourselves in that pleasure we are apt to take, in seeing enemies and fall into such troubles as they have given us (ver. 17). And to this he annexes another, which cannot be too often repeated (ver. 19), against fretting at the prosperity of those who do ill: which he often prohibits; but doth it now in the words of his father David (Ps. xxxvii. 1), whose authority was justly held very great in that chapter; and was therefore more observed, from his own experience, of the shortness of their felicity, and the sudden changes with which they were often surprised and aston- ished.

[6] An instance he gives of this in the next precept (ver. 21, 22), which, saith Melancthon (so carefully were the reformers to prevent all sedition and rebellion), is to be reckoned among the principal sen- tences that are to be observed in this book; con-manding obedience, and directing the order of it.

"For, first, he commands us to obey God, and then the king: whose office it is to see the laws of God observed by his subjects: and to make such laws as are not repugnant to God's laws; and to punish the contumacious; and to pronounce all sentences according to the laws, &c. And in di- bious cases their decrees ought to prevail; not only because that is a probable reason on their side, but because of the authority given from above unto magistrates: whom God would have us in civil affairs, though dubious before, to obey. And because God gives us sometimes more mild and gentle, sometimes less kind, he would have us also to bear anima dura: if they be tolerable, and obedience be not a sin. For he threatens here a severe vengeance to those that are seditious: so he translates the word scholoni: which the Chaldee translates fools (changelings in our language): for they are no better who invent and change this order (as some understand the word), either by advancing the will of the prince above all law, without any reasons of policy; or by rebellion against the king, who ordains nothing against God's law."

[f] But there is no necessity of glossing upon that word (which we render given to change), for though it be diversely translated, the sense is still the same. And Ahd. observes, that of the latter part of the twenty-second verse, I have expressed in the paraphrase; and made them agree well enough. Lud. de Dieu is alone by himself (as far as I can find), who would have that word we render both of them to signify their years: and the meaning to be, who knows how soon their life may be at a miserable end?

Among the following sentences, which are rules also of wisdom, there is no difficulty; but a little in ver. 26, 28, where I have endeavoured to comprehend several expositions, and connect them together in my paraphrase: but think not it to enlarge this preface any farther, by giving a particular account of them.

Ver. 1.] Let it not vex thee into impatience and indignation to see men thrive, who are bent upon nothing but wickedness; much less move thee to think them happy, and to wish thyself among them: but avoid their company, and much more their course of life. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 2.] For who would grow rich and great by the misery of others? and such men's thoughts are always contriving how to ruin those who stand in the way of their wicked designs; and their tongues are employed in lies, calumnies, false accusations, and all manner of forgeries; not only to give trouble and vexation unto their neighbours, but to undo them.

Ver. 3.] An estate may be gotten, and a family raised, by such wise and pious means as are recommended in this book; and there need no other arts but virtue and prudent management to settle and continue it.

Ver. 4.] For as true learning and knowledge is the best furnishing of the mind; so it is the best able to furnish every room in the house: not only with all things necessary, but with what may serve for ornament and beautification of life.

Ver. 5.] Wisdom also is able to supply the defect of bodily strength, for a man's defence against unjust invaders of his possessions: or if he have outward strength and power, his skill and dexterity will add such force unto it, as will make it more effectual.

Ver. 6.] For experience tells us, that victory doth not depend so much upon mighty armies, as upon exact conduct, good discipline, subtle contrivance; and the safety of a nation doth not lie merely in the multitude of the people; but in the number of wise men, to direct and govern all affairs (xi. 14). See Arg. [b].

Ver. 7.] Who are the more valuable, because it is no casuistry to say, if a man's heart be good, or if all persons in all the parts of wisdom; which are above the reach of vain, rash, and heady men, who are not admitted either to judge, or to advise in the common council of the city, where wise men are not afraid nor ashamed to speak, and that with great authority.

Ver. 8.] He that deviseth new ways and arts of cheating, or designs for men's harms and injuries, is one of the worst of men; and shall be branded with the odious name of an inventor of evil things (Rom. i. 30).

Ver. 9.] To contrive any thing that is hurtful unto others, though out of rashness and folly, is a sin: but he that makes a jest of it when it is done, and laughs at those who tell him it is a sin, is such a pestilent wretch, that he is, or ought to be, extremely abhorred of all mankind.

Ver. 10.] To despise and desist from any good design, much more to despair of deliverance, when thou fallest into any distress, is an argument of great weakness and feebleness of mind: and yet, if thou art remiss in the study of wisdom in a prosperous condition, thy spirit will be apt to sink: and he dejecteth, in a word, See Arg. [e].

Ver. 11.] Use thy best endeavours to deliver innocent persons, who, by false accusations, or other ways, are dragged to execution; or are in present danger of losing their life: and do not think thou canst with a safe conscience withdraw thyself from succouring them in that distress.

Ver. 12.] I know the common excuse which men are apt to make in this case; protesting that they did not understand their innocence, or how to save them: but dost thou think such things will pass with God, though they do with men? Canst thou deceive him with false pretences? Him, that searcheth into the secrets of all men's hearts? Him, that observeth every, the very least, motion of thy soul? by whose wise providence, which serves all men in their kind,

Ver. 13.] Do not slight, much less nauseate, such precepts as these, my dear child: but as honey is most acceptable to thy palate, both for its wholesomeness and for its pleasure; especially that pure part of it, which drops of itself immediately from the honeycomb: See Arg. [e].

Ver. 14.] So let that knowledge be to thy mind, which tends to make thee wise and virtuous: for as nothing is more necessary for thee, nothing more delightful: so, if it be seriously studied and thoroughly digested, it will abundantly reward thy pains, with prosperous success in all thy undertakings; and never put thee in hope of any thing which shall not answer thy expectation.

Ver. 15.] It is possible, indeed, that a good man's condition may be very mean, nay, afflicted sometime in this world: but let not that tempt the wicked subly to contrive to ruin, much less by open violence to disturb his innocent repose: nay, cast him out of him: Hab. ii. 10. But if he keep them, or if he do as he is contented: See Arg. [f].

Ver. 16.] For though a good man should meet with so many troubles, that thou imagines he cannot fail to perish in them; he shall overcome them all, and flourish again: when the wicked shall sink under the calamity that befalls them, and never be able to recover out of it. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 17.] It is a great piece of wisdom and virtue also, to pity others in their trouble, and not to show any sign of joy and mirth; when thou seest any man, though he be thy enemy, in a calamitous condition: no, not so much as (upon thy own account) to take any inward pleasure in his downfall.

Ver. 18.] For though nobody sees it, God doth; and such inhuman affections are so dishonouring to him, that they may provoke him to translate the calamity from thy enemy unto thee: and thereby despoil thy selfish joy with a double sorrow; first to see him delivered from his trouble, and then to find thyself involved in it.

Ver. 19.] Let not thy anger kindle (or if it do, quench it presently, that it may not tempt thee to impatience) when thou seest men thrive and prosper: and do not imagine them to be happy men, and thereby be provoked to follow them in their impious courses. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 20.] For though a wicked man may live bravely for a time, yet it shall end quite otherwise than he expected; and his splendor (such as it is), if not in his own days, yet in his pesterity, be utterly extinguished.

Ver. 21.] Take care therefore, my dear child, that thy religion (which teaches thee in the first place to worship, reverence, and obey the great Lord and Governor of all the world) make thee humbly obedient to the king; as God's vicegerent here on earth: and have nothing to do with those, whose discontent with the present state of things, or their love of novelty, makes them effect a change of government; and depart from their duty both to God and man. See Arg. [h].

Ver. 22.] For an unexpected and dreadful calamity shall unavoidably and violently set on them: but when and how either God or the king will punish them none can tell: or what terrible vengeance they will take, both upon those that move rebellion, and those that associate with them. See Arg. [i].

Ver. 23.] These things also that follow belong to the wise and virtuous conduct of thy life. It is a very evil thing, if thou art a judge, to consider the quality of the person (either his greatness, or his relation, or the friendship thou hast with him, &c.), and not the merits of the cause, that is brought before thee.

Ver. 24.] And whoever he be that contrary to the plain evidence which is given in against the wicked shall pronounce him innocent, and make a bad cause to be good, the whole country shall curse him, and wish the divine vengeance shall overtake him: nay, other nations, who hear of his unjust proceedings, shall have him in great detestation.

Ver. 25.] But they that give a check to vice and wickedness, by punishing evil-doers according to their deserts, shall not only have inward satisfaction in their own mind; but increase of joy, by hearing others speak well of them: nay, God himself, the fountain of all good, shall plentifully bestow his blessings upon them.

Ver. 26.] It is not only justice but kindness, to pass a righteous sentence, without fear or favour: and upon all occasions to speak appositely and consonant to truth: and as such persons give others a singular pleasure, so they shall be loved most dearly, and honoured by all.

Ver. 27.] Do every thing in order: and first mind those things which are most necessary; contenting thyself with a little but in the field till thou hast gotten an estate, by a careful improvement of thy pasture and of thy tillage: and then it will be timely enough to build thee a house, and to bring a wife into it.

Ver. 28.] Do not testify any thing against thy neigh-

29 Say not, I will do so to him as he hath done to me: I will render to the man according to his work.

30 I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding.

31 And, lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, boar rashly, much less when thou hast no ground at all for the accusation; nor seduce any body into a false opinion of him, by crafty insinuation; much less suborn them secretly by promises of rewards, to say that which is not true of him; when outwardly thou earnest thyself to him, and pretendest to be his friend.

Ver. 32.] Suppose he hath been injurious in that kind to thee heretofore, and thou hast now an opportunity to be revenged; let not that tempt thee to resolve with thyself to do to him as he hath done to thee: taking upon thee that which God hath declared belongs to himself alone (Deut. xxxii. 35), to recompense upon him according to his deservings.

Ver. 33.] And, to that which I have just now said (ver. 27) concerning diligence, I will add this observation; which I myself made, as I took a view of the state of my subjects, among whom I found one so lazy and void of consideration; that, though he had good land in a field, and a fruitful vineyard,

Ver. 34.] Yet, such was his wonted sloth, instead of corn I was surprised with the sight of thorns and thistles, which had overrun his whole field; nor was there any thing but nettles to be seen in his vineyard:

and the stone wall thereof was broken down.

32 Then I saw, and considered it well: I looked upon it, and received instruction.

or if there had been any fruit in either, it would have been lost for want of a fence; which was fallen down, and laid all open to the beasts of prey.

Ver. 33.] Which cruel spectacle so deeply affected my heart, and brought so many thoughts into my mind, that I learnt, by beholding those miserable effects of idleness, to curse that vice in myself and to correct it in others.

Ver. 34.] And I cannot do it better, than in those words before used (vi. 10, 11). If thou wilt not rouse thyself, O sluggard, but, rolling thyself on thy bed, ridiculously desire thy pains may be spared, and that thou mayest still be suffered without any disturbance to enjoy a little more sleep, and to lay aside all care of thy business, when thou hast loitered too long already:

Ver. 35.] Then poverty shall come swiftly (though in silent and unobserved places) upon thee; and, before thou art aware, leave thee as naked as if thou wentst stripped by a highwayman: nay, the most extreme want and beggary shall unavoidably seize on thee, like an armed man, against whom thou canst not make no resistance.

PART III.

CHAPTER XXV.

I These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out.

CHAP. XXV.

ARGUMENT.—[a] Here begins the third part of the book of Proverbs; which is a collection made by some belonging to Hezekiah: and acknowledged here (in the entrance of the book), as well as the former, to be Solomon's. Who spoke a great many proverbs (we read I Kings iv. 32), which, no doubt, were preserved by his successors in a book, if he did not set them down himself. Out of which volume, some good men had selected such as they thought most useful for the people: and besides those in the foregoing chapters, which had been compiled, either in his own days, or soon after; these also which follow were thought good to be added in the days of Hezekiah: who, restoring the service of God in the temple to its purity and splendour (2 Chron. xxix. 3, &c. xxxi. 2, 3, &c.), took care, in all likelihood, for the better instruction of the people in piety, to revive the schools of the prophets also; and to press them (as he had done the priests) to do their duty faithfully; in teaching the laws of God, and informing the people in all things that might be profitable for them.

Out of which schools some were chosen, it is probable, to attend the king himself; who are called his men or servants: who, out of their great zeal to promote useful learning, called out more proverbs from among that great heap of three thousand (which would have been too great a bulk to have been all published; and, perhaps, all of them not concerning manners or good government), and such especially as they saw would do good to the prince as well as to the people; of which nature are those that are put into this collection; many of which belong to the right administration of the public affairs. I am not able to produce express authority for all this; but I think it might be fairly conjectured from those words, 2 Chron. xxxi. ult. where we read of the pains Hezekiah took about the law, and about the commandments, as well as about the service of the house of God.

2 It is the glory of God to conceal a thing; but the honour of kings is to search out a matter.

But who the persons were that he employed in transcribing those proverbs out of the ancient records is more obscure. Some of the Hebrews say, Shebna the scribe, and his officers or clerks that were under the principal secretary; others add Bliakin and Josh (who are joined together in 2 Kings xviii. 36, 37); others fancy them to have been Isaiah (a person of great quality, near of kin to the king, and very familiar with him), together with Hosea and Micah; who all lived in the days of Hezekiah; and might possibly undertake this excellent work. In which they assert some things, which are to be found in the foregoing parts of this book, in words but little different, as verse 24, of this chapter, and ch. xxvi. 13, 15, 29, and other places, of which I cannot stay here to give an account.
3 The heaven for height, and the earth for depth, and the heart of kings is unspeakable.

[5] They begin the book with a sentence, which the lord Bacon applies to all the learning and wisdom of Solomon. "In which," saith he, "Solomon challenges nothing to himself, but only the honour and the reward of the author. He leaves it to the reader to consider, which is the glory of God to conceal, and the glory of a king to find out." As if the divine majesty had taken delight to hide his works, to the end to have them found out; and as if kings could not attain greater honour (or pleasure or recreation either) than to employ themselves in that business: considering the great command he gave them, and means, whereby the investigation of all things may be effected.

Thus he, lib. vi. of the Advance of Learning, ch. 6. Which is a very ingenious gloss, if we refer both parts of the sentence to the one and the same matter: tacitly admonishing Hezehiah, and in him all succeeding kings, not to spend their time in any thing so commendable at that age, as to be en- couraging to understand not only the secrets of government, but of the laws of God, and of all his works: that they may not be imposed upon by false colours and deceitful glosses; which cunning wits are apt to put upon causes that are brought before them; nay, upon the book of God itself.

But kings on earth must not herein imitate him; for it is their honour to search diligently and inquire into the state of their kingdom, and to correct presently what they find amiss, lest be it out of their power when it is strengthened by long custom and numerous officers. But especially in difficult and intricate business, covered with darkness and obscurity, perplexed with many windings and turnings, and with crafty and subtle conveyances; there to spy light, and by wisdom and diligence to rip up a foul matter, and, searching the cause to the bottom, to make a discovery of all, is a thing most worthy of a king, and tends highly to his honour. In short, as it makes for the glory of God, that he need not inquire into any thing, but, when he knows all things, yet conceals that knowledge: so, on the contrary side, it makes for the glory of kings, that, when they are forced to confess, that they are ignorant, as well as other men, of many things: they are thereby so humbled, that they discover and detect those things which others have entangled, and would have buried in darkness.

To some such purpose all interpreters expound these words, save one, who refers both parts of the sentence to kings (understanding by elohim, gods, judges and princes) in this sense: "Wise kings preserve the reverence which is due to their persons and place by concealing carefully their own intentions and counsels; and by finding out the designs of other men." Thus Maldonate; which I mention because it is a great truth, though not the sense of the words, but rather the meaning of the following verse (ver. 2).

[c] Which concerns kings also, as some of those that come after likewise do (whence the title of this chapter is derived from the end of the part of the book of Proverbs which was particularly collected for the use of Hezehiah) and hath received this gloss from the same great man I named before, the lord Bacon: who gives this as one of the chief reasons why the hearts of kings are inscrutable, because "they being at the very top of human desires, have not, for the most part, any particular ends proposed to themselves (none at least to which they vehemently and constantly aspire), by the site and distance of which ends we may be directed to take the measure and scale of the rest of their actions: whereas there is no private person, who is not altogether like a traveller, that goes intently aiming at something, and of his journey knows not whether he may stay and rest; from whence one may probably conjecture, what he will do, or not do. For if any thing conduce to the end at which he aims, it is likely he will do it; but if it cross his design, he will not." Therefore he passes this judicious observation upon the whole: that princes are best interpreted by their actions, and private persons by their ends? (Adv. of Learning, book viii. ch. 2).

But from hence also he observes (in his first book), that it is best not to be too inquisitive to penetrate into the hearts of kings: since we are so ignorant of the things we see with our eyes every day: which the custom of the Levant aims at, that makes it a heinous offence to know, and fix their eyes upon princes: which is barbarous in the outward ceremony, but good in the moral: for it becomes not subjects to pry too far into their princes' counsels. But it may as well check the ambition as the curiosity of private persons: because they can hardly have sure of that honour which they imagine that princes have for them alone, there being such depths in their inclinations and affec-

But in the next verses princes are admonished that there is no policy like true virtue to support their thrones: and that in order to it they should not keep so much as one ill man about them; who oftentimes corrupts the whole court, and disturbs the whole kingdom.

[d] And in the next verse he admonishes subjects not to be mainly ambitious; nor bold and forward to thrust themselves into offices, or into a rank that doth not belong to them: but to he modest, especially in the prince's presence; and (according to our Saviour's rule) to be invited to honour, rather than greedily seek it. And withal he secretly commends to kings the care of keeping up their state and dignity: not suffering every body to intrude into their presence, but giving a check to proud, bold, and saucy persons.

Then follow private instructions, not to be too forward to go to law; and when we do, to manage suits fairly, without aspersing those with whom we contend, and without breaking the laws of friendship; which require us, not to discover the secrets wherewith another hath intrusted us (ver. 9, 10).
5 Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness.

[c] In the eleventh verse I have followed Maimonides's interpretation of the word maskiljot; in his preface to his More Navehoin. And it being doubtfull, whether by apples of gold, he means apples that look like gold, or apples made of gold; I have expressed both.

[A] With this verse, De Dieu connects the next (ver. 57), and gives the easiest account that I find any where of the Hebrew text: only translating that particle but, which we translate so; as it is often taken in the scripture. And his sense is this: "Though the just may be trampled under foot for a while, do in our present, their glory shall not perish; but remain so fresh and sweet, that it shall be a glorious thing to inquire into their glorious actions." So he would have the verse translated thus: "To eat much honey, indeed, is not good; but to search out their glory (viz. of just men), is glory. And if we take the verse by itself, then the sense may be this, as the Belgic interpreters translate it (of whom he, if I mistake not, was one): "To eat much honey is not good: but to search into excellent things is a great commendation: and we cannot therein easily offend by excess:" which is quite contrary to the vulgar Latin whose sense and meaning (though not the words) may be defended, even without repeating the word word, but in our present, their glory shall not perish; a foolish woman, 2. 1. and make the very heart ill affected by grief or sorrow: which he takes literally for an evil or wicked heart. And makes this the meaning (which some others have followed), that pertinacious sinners are made more furious by admonitions.

In all ancient translations there follows, after this verse, this sentence: "As a moth the grain of a worm in wood; so is heaviness in the heart of man." But St. Jerome, in the latter end of his commentaries upon Isaiah, tells us that it was sub obelo in Origens works; where he noted all superfluous additions with that mark.

[B] I must not omit neither, that the twenty-third verse will admit of a quite contrary sense to that in our translation; and is by some rendered thus: "As the north wind begeth rain (for so it doth in some climates), so a backbiting tongue raiseth up anger and indignation" (which appear in the countenance both of him that believes the calumny and of him that is calumniated; when he knows how he is about).

[F] There is no great difficulty in verse twenty-six. But interpreters are divided about this; whether he spake of a just man falling into sin, or into some calamity. Melaenthon understands the latter, and makes this the sense; that even wise men's minds are extremely troubled, when they see the wicked prevail against the virtuous: of which he gives a great many examples. But I have taken in both; and have referred it also to all manner of sufferings, and not restrained it to public injustice, as the lord Bacon doth; who hath this excellent observation upon the place (book viii. ch. 2, parab. 22). "This parable teaches us, that states and republics must, above all things, beware of an unjust and infamous sentence, in the cause of great importance especially where the innocent is not absolved, but he that is not guilty to be condemned. For injuries ravaging among private persons do, indeed, trouble and pollute the streams of justice, yet only as in the smaller rivulets; but such unjust judgments, as I would term, from which examples are derived, infect and distain the very fountain of justice. For when the courts of justice side with injustice, the state of things is turned, as into a public robbery; et homo homini fit lupus, "and one man preys upon another."

6 Put not forth thyself in the presence of the king, and stand not in the place of great men:

7 For better it is that it be said unto thee,
CHAPTER XXV.

Come up hither, than that thou shouldest be put lower in the presence of the prince whom thine eyes have seen.

8 Go not forth hastily to strive, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof, when thy neighbour hath put thee to shame.

9 Do not envy thy neighbour himself; discover not a secret to another; 10 Lest he heareth it put thee to shame, and thine infamy turn not away.

11 A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver.

12 As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprover upon an obedient ear.

13 As the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them that send him; for he refresheth the soul of his masters.

14 Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift is like clouds and wind without rain.

15 By long forbearing is a prince persuaded, and a soft tongue breaketh the bone.

16 Hast thou found honey? eat so much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it.

17 Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour’s house; lest he be weary of thee, and so hate thee.

18 A man that beareth false witness against his neighbour is a mad man, and a sword, and a sharp arrow.

19 Confidence in an unfaithful man in time of trouble is like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint.

Ver. 1.] As when the finer hath separated the dress from the silver, it will become so pliable, that he may easily mould and form the image of his will.

Ver. 5.] So let the king not only remove the wicked (who are the scum of the nation) from his counsels and company, but punish them severely: and his people will be easily moulded to righteousness, piety, and all manner of virtue: which will settle his kingdom in peace, and make his government durable.

Ver. 6.] And among other virtues, learn humility and modesty, if thou art a subject; though never so rich; and do not make thyself taken notice of by too splendid an appearance at court; much less by intruding thyself into the place, where none but the great officers or nobles ought to come. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 7.] For it will be much more for thy honour and thy satisfaction too, if, standing at a distance, thou art invited to come up higher (whither of thyself thou durst not presume to go), than to have a check given thee for thy forwardness, and to be disgracefully thrust out of the presence of the prince; unto whom thou hast adventured to approach too near.

Ver. 8.] Take some time to consider well, both the goodness of thy cause, and its weightiness, and how to manage it, before thou bring an action at law against thy neighbour; lest, in conclusion, thou wish it had not been begun: when he puts thee to open shame, by showing thou hast impeached him wrongfully, or for a trifle.

Ver. 9.] Nay, let me advise thee, though thy cause be just and good (yet the event being doubtful), to debate things privately, and, if it be possible, to make up the difference between yourselves; especially if it be about a secret business, which ought not easily to be divulged: or, if it cannot be composed, yet let not hatred or anger provoke thee to discover other secrets, merely to disgrace thy adversary, when they appear not to the cause.

Ver. 10.] Lest not only every one that heareth reproach thee for thy perfidiousness, but if he be enraged to retort such infamous things upon thee, as shall stick so close, that thou shalt never be able to wipe off the dirt, nor recover thy credit, as long as thou livest.

Ver. 11.] A word of counsel, reproof, or comfort, handsomely delivered, in due time and place, &c. is no less grateful and valuable, than golden balls, or beautiful apples, presented in a silver net-work basket. See Arg. [2].

Ver. 12.] A good man will not think himself reproached, but rather obliged, by a prudent reproach: which, meeting with an attentive, considering, and patient mind, makes a man receive it so kindly; that he esteems him who bestows it, as much as if he had hung a jewel of gold in his ear, or put the richest ornament about his neck.

Ver. 13.] A trusty messenger (or ambassador), that faithfully and dexterously executes his commission to the satisfaction of the persons that sent him, is as welcome when he returns, as the coldest drink or air is to the reapers in the time of harvest: for he revives the spirit of his masters, who were ready to faint, with fear of ill success in their business.

Ver. 14.] He that raiseth high expectations, by promising much, and then deceives them by performing little or nothing; leaves him that depended on these promises, as sad as the country people are, after the clouds have made a great show, and the wind a great sound, but followed by no showers of rain.

Ver. 15.] It is not prudent violently to oppose a prince in his resolutions; who will more easily yield to reason, if one give way to his heat, and patiently expect the fittest time to represent things to him: but this must be done also with a soft and tender language, which is apt to bow the stiffest minds, and work upon the hardest hearts.

Ver. 16.] All pleasures should be used like honey; which when it offers itself, eat as much as suffices thee for thy refreshment, not as much as thou desirest; for as moderately taking it strengthens the body, and prolongs life; so too much of it disturbs the stomach and torments the pleasure into pain and torment. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 17.] Which is wholesome advice, even in the enjoyment of a good neighbour, or friend (the sweetest thing in the world); do not upon every light occasion interrupt his weightier affairs: lest having too much of thy company, it grow not only troublesome but loathsome to him; and his love turn into hatred of thee.

Ver. 18.] There is nothing more pernicious than him that makes no conscience of bearing false witness against his neighbour; his tongue alone serves him instead of a maul to beat down a man’s fame, or break in pieces his estate; nay, instead of a sword to take away his life, and of a sharp arrow to destroy him, not only when he is near, but much more when he is afar off, not able to answer for himself.

Ver. 19.] As a broken tooth or leg out of joint, not only fails a man when he comes to use it, but likewise puts him into pain; so doth a faithless person serve them that depend upon him, when they have the greatest need of his help: and such also is the confidence that a faithless person himself places in riches, or craft, or great friends, &c. which some time

22 For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee.

23 The north wind driveth away rain; so doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue.

24 It is better to dwell in the corner of the house, than with a brawling woman, and in a wide house.

27 It is not good to eat much honey: so for men to search their own glory is not glory.

28 He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down, and without walls.

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 As snow in summer, and as rain in harvest; so honour is not seemly for a fool.

CHAP. XXVI.

ARGUMENT. [a] This chapter begins with a tacit admonition to kings (for whose use principally this last part of the book of Proverbs was collected, as I noted in the beginning of the foregoing chapter), to be very careful in disposing preemptions only to worthy persons. For bad men are made worse by them: and they do as much hurt to others by the abuse of their power to the discouraging of virtue, and promoting vice, as snow or hail doth to the fruits of the earth, when they are ripe and ready to be gathered. So that we may make this aphorism one of Solomon's words, that the blending of summer and winter would not cause a greater disorder in the natural world, than the disposals of honour to bad men (and consequently throwing contempt upon the good) doth in the world moral: where wicked men, when they are in power, if they can do no more, will at least pronounce anathemas against those that do not deserve it.

2 As the bird by wandering, as the swallow by flying: so the curse causeless shall not come.

[6] So the Hebrews understand the next verse; which I have extended farther, and translated also those two words zipper and deror a sparrow and a wild pigeon (see Ps. lxxiv. 3). For deror signifying here a particular bird, in all likelihood zipper doth so too: and then all agree it signifies a swallow, as the other (Bochart hath proved) doth (not a swallow, but) a ring-dove, or turtle, or some of that kind; which are famous for swiftness and strength of flight. And the meaning of this verse is, that curses which fly out of men's mouths causelessly, shall no more alight where they would not settle, than a space which weders uncertainly, or a dove that flies away swiftly, will settle according to their direction: or thus: such curses fly as swiftly as those birds (whose propriety it is to wander and fly up and down) over the head of him against whom they are directed, and never touch him.

Melanchoth by curses in this place understands 3 A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and a rod for the fool's back.

4 Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him.

CALVIN. . .

CHAPTER XXVI.

calumnies of which the world is too full: which shall not rest upon a good man long before they be confuted. But he himself is forced to confess that sometimes they do great mischief first: and instances in Joseph, Palamedes, Aristides, Theame-nes, and Socrates, who lost his life by this means. After which, he observes, the tragedy of Palamedes being seted (in which the poet bewailed the death of the best of the Greeks, who sung like a sweet nightingale, but hurt no man), the citizens expelled the accusers of Socrates out of Athens. But this doth not so well agree with the Hebrew word, which signifies such evil speaking as amounts to a curse: which the wise man saith shall not rest upon a man when it is causeless, but fly away like a bird that settles nowhere till it comes to its proper place: "As the curse returns many times, and settles upon him that made it, when it lights not on him that was cursed:" which sense, one reading of the Hebrew expresses plainly enough; and therefore I have not omitted it.

[6] After which observations, there follow another to show, that a few fool should rather be sent to house of correction than have any preferment (ver. 3). Nothing less will eare him, as it follows ver. 4, 5, where he admonishes us, how vain it is to hold any discourse with him, any farther than merely to show that he is a fool; and, if it be possible, to confute (not what he says, but) the vain opinion he hath had of himself. St. Cyprian hath given a good account of these two verses in the beginning of his letter to Demetrion: who having babbled a long time against Christianity, like a mad man, with loud clamours only and no sense, the good father thought fit to answer him with neglect, and overcame rage with patience; thinking it to no more purpose to go about to repress an irreligious man with religion, or restrain a mad man with meekness, than to offer light to the blind, or to speak to the deaf, or reason with a brute. But when Demetrion at last offered something that looked like an argument, St. Cyprian could not any longer keep silence; lest his modesty should be thought dead of all sense. And whilst he was speaking, he refute false crudiments he should seem to acknowledge the crime.

Melancthon wholly refers both verses to reproaches and calumnies: which he shows it is fit, either utterly to neglect, or to confute in a few words.

[7] Then the wise man proceeds to show, that such a fool is very unfit to be so much as sent on a message: which he will neither deliver right, nor return a good answer. The first seems to be expressed by cutting off the legs: as much as to say, a business committed to such a person will no more proceed, than a man can go without legs: the latter, by drinking an injury: as much as to say, instead of satisfaction in what he desires, he must be content to swallow abundance of affronts and ill-dealing.

[8] After this follow several other observations about fools: in some of which there are words of no small difficulty; which I cannot here particularly explain, as some may desire, because it would take up too much room. But I have expressed the sense of the progress well as I could in the paraphrase. As for example, the word dalju (ver. 7) signifying something of elevation or lifting up, I have explained dancing: than which nothing is more unsuitable to a lame man: as speeches full of reason in them-

[9] And the word morgena, in the eighth verse, which is variously translated by interpreters, I have expressed in two senses of it; but look upon it as superfluous to trouble the reader with what learned men (such as Scaliger and Selden, &c.) have written concerning the heaps of stones in the highway, into which superstitious people were wont to cast one as they passed by, in honour to Mercury, &c. for I do not think this custom was so old as Solomon's time. Nor is it necessary to understand such a heap of stones as covered the dead bodies of those who were stoned to death: but, in general, any heap of pebbles; or else a sling, as the Chaldee and the LXX. whom we follow, explain it.

[10] And, ver. 10, the first word, rab, great, may be applied either to God, or to a prince; and that either good or bad. All which I have taken notice of; and expressed the different senses wherein the word chalaliti is used. But there is one significance more of the word rab, which the Lutherns generally follow: he said, this verse seems to be three dee-cause I have not toucht on it in the paraphrase, and it makes no improper sense of the place), who take it for a master in any sort of art or learning; and expound it thus: "A master in his art forms all things excellently well: but he that hires a fool (or a bungler, as we speak), gives his money to have his work spoiled." This is the meaning of the Melancthon; who takes it to be an admonition belonging to prudence in the choice of fit persons for every business; not believing those that crack and brag what they are able to do, &c. ex. gr. plurimi sunt impostores, quit volunt videri medici: plurimi inducti concionatores, qui sublinatur vulgo aut potentioribus. And he heaps up many excellent sayings to this purpose, that men "should meddle only with that which they understand:" concluding with this admo-nition to the people, which they should always re-member,—"ignorance makes men impudent." And thus Castallo took the word rab; but to this sense: "A wise man does his business himself; and not by fools, who mar it all."

[11] Among other examples of the wise man's observations (ver. 11), Melancthon mentions this; which is not commonly noted: The Sodomites, being dually delivered by the help of Abraham, who overthrew the army that had spoiled them, and recovered the spoil; forgetting their former punishment and marvellous deliverance, ran furiously into more foul sins, wherein they utterly perished by a most terrible vengeance.

[12] Then follow, after one observation concerning a concealed fellow, several observations about sloth; some of which have been noted before in the foregoing parts of this book, but are here put together by the men of Hezekiah in some order; and with some additions. For here the incredible laziness of some men, which increases upon them continually, if they will not shake it off. And yet so pre-sumptuous (he observes, ver. 16) they are withal, that they laugh at those who take a great deal of
PROVERBS.

5 Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit.

6 He that sendeth a message by the hand of a fool cutteth off the feet, and drunkenth damage.

7 The legs of the lame are not equal: so is a parable in the mouth of fools.

8 As he that bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he that giveth honour to a fool.

9 As a thorn goeth up into the hand of a pains to be wise; and fancy themselves much wiser, because. Without any pains, they can find fault sometimes in other men’s works. Nay, this very thing, perhaps, they think a piece of folly, to study hard, imagining it to be the greatest wisdom to enjoy their ease, and reap the benefit of other men’s labours. But, see to the beast, the Answer so heap must have for his labours. An example of which I might give particularly, in ver. 21, where the word jmaker may be rendered either “he pretends to be what he is not,” or “he is known to be what he is.”

And what Solomon says in the next verse concerning him that Jattereth another, some extend to all wicked men, none of which are to be trusted; but as one of our own writers advises, Though a wicked man hath done thee seven courtesies, and promises fair for the eighth, yet do not trust in him; for there are seven abominations in his heart. And though thou mayest think thou hast some hand upon him, do not depend upon it; for he can unfetter himself from them all, as Samson from the lion and cords wherewith the Philistines bound him, unless God mightily restrain him.

But I only observe one thing more; that the last verse is capable of this sense, which I have in part touched:—A liar is not capable to be a friend; for if he be reproached, truth makes him hate the person that detects his falsehood; if he be not reproached, his false promises will alienate from him the mind of his friend.

Ver. 1.] As snow or rain is so unseasonable that it does a great deal of hurt in summer time, when the fruits of the earth are ready to be gathered: so is dignity and authority very ill placed in the hands of a fool or wicked man, who knows not how to use it, but will do mischief both to himself and others with it. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 2.] Though men are too prone in their passion to wish evil to others, or by mistake to pronounce solemn curses against them; yet there is no reason to fear such rash imprecations, or unjust censures: for they shall do no harm (unless it be to him that makes them), but pass by the innocent like a sparrow, that wanders nobody knows whither: or a wild dove, than which few birds fly away more swiftly. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 3.] A horse that will not stir without a whip, and an ass that will not go without a gend, or will go only in his own way, without a bridge to turn about his stiff neck, are the emblems of a senseless sort; who must be treated like a beast, and by small punishments be excited unto his duty, to which he hath no list; and checked from running into that evil to which he is inclined.

Ver. 4.] For words will not reclaim a wicked fool; with whom, if thou hast occasion to contend, observe these two rules: Answer him not at all, because it is to no purpose; at least, not in his own way, with bawling, railing, and reproaches, which is to be as a fool as himself. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 5.] He that sends a wise man, or one that minds his business, and his pleasures, least about his business; shall not sure only to misapply it, but to suffer exceeding great damage by his ill-management. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 6.] A wise saying as ill becomes a fool, as dancing doth a cripple: for as his lameness never so much appears, as when he would seem nimble; so the other’s folly is never so ridiculous, as when he would seem wise. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 7.] As a stone put into a sling stays not long there, so is that honour thrown away which is bestowed upon a fool: who not knowing how to use his authority (unless he be to do mischief, even to him that conferred it on him), it is as ill placed in his hands, as a diamond when it is cast into a heap of common stones. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 8.] It is as dangerous for a fool to meddle with a proverb, as for a drunkard to handle a thorn; wherewith he hurts himself: but the sharpest saying no more touches a fool with any compunction, though spoken by his own mouth; than the drunkard feels the thorn, when it runs into his hand, and gives a grievous smart. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 9.] The great God, who made all things, governs them also most wisely and equally; dispensing, for instance, his punishments suitable to men’s sins, whether out of ignorance, or of wilful wickedness: whom a good prince imitates; but a bad proves an universal grievance, by employing either fools or profane persons. But if servior insolent by thy silence, fancying that he is unanswerable: thou say so much only as may serve to take down his presumption, and make it appear that he is a fool: for nothing is more dangerous, than to let him go away with a high opinion of his own abilities. See Arg. [h].

Ver. 10.] The great God, who made all things, governs them also most wisely and equally; dispensing, for instance, his punishments suitable to men’s sins, whether out of ignorance, or of wilful wickedness: whom a good prince imitates; but a bad proves an universal grievance, by employing either fools or profane persons. But if servior insolent by thy silence, fancying that he is unanswerable: thou say so much only as may serve to take down his presumption, and make it appear that he is a fool: for nothing is more dangerous, than to let him go away with a high opinion of his own abilities. See Arg. [i].

Ver. 11.] As a dog, when he hath vomited up the meat which made him sick, is no sooner well but he returns to it and eats it up again; forgetting how ill it agreed with him; so an imprudent person commits the same error over again for which he formerly smarted; and a lewd sinner shamelessly and greedily repeats the crimes of which he hath repented as grievous and hurtful to him. See Arg. [j].

Ver. 12.] Such a scottish person is hardly curable: and yet, if he be not altogether insensible of his folly, nor refuse admonition, there is more hope of his amendment, than of his who takes himself to be so wise and virtuous that he despises his better, and thinks he is above instruction.

Ver. 13.] He that hath no mind to labour never wants pretences for his idleness: for his fancy represents such terrible and insuperable difficulties to him, as seldom happen; and frights him with a vain con-

PROVERBS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 Boast not thyself of to-morrow: for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.

2 Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips.

[1] And one great reason why men are loath to tell others of their faults, or to blame any, is they are wont to take it heinously. If men were more willing to receive reproof, others would more faithfully give it: of which the wise man therefore admonishes us, ver. 6, where the word natirotch is so difficult that it admits various interpretations: some of which I have expressed in the paraphrase. And made ver. 7 a caution against the immoderate enjoyment of pleasures: which commend themselves to us by their rarer use. As the next (ver. 8), is a caution against unseemliness of mind, and discontent with our present condition; which not only spoils all our pleasures, but often carries men restlessly to their ruin: where Melancthon suggests this useful meditation, that as it is no condition of life, no function, without its cares, troubles, and dangers; which make men soon weary of it: according to the ancient saying, "Optat ephippia bos piger, optat arare caballus." But the wise man would have us understand, that nothing is more dangerous than this: and therefore to take care, lest, tired and broken with disgusts, we lightly desert that kind of life to which we are rightly called. All the ancient wisdom hath observed, that such idle forethoughts never thrive: about which they have many proverbs, with which I shall not fill these papers.

[2] After this, follow some advices about friendship, and other things; which have been noted before, in the foregoing parts of this book. And then he seems (ver. 14), to lay open the guile of flatterers, who hope to cullly favour with their benefactors, by extolling their bounty with extravagant praises. So I have expounded that verse, not merely of those that praise others, but praise them for their kind- ness to themselves: as the word darak properly imports. The intention of which is only to get still more from them, which is commonly the end of all those that praise others immoderately; for their rare qualities and perfections: hoping thereby to make them extraordinary kind to them, above all other men. Thus the lord Bacon hath observed about this matter: whose else these words are this (in the forenamed place, parab. 33), "Moderate and seasonable praises, uttered upon occasion, conduce both to men's fame and fortune: but immoderate praises, and unseasonably profuse, prove nothing: may, rather, according to the sense of this parable, they do much prejudice. For, first, they manifestly betray themselves, either to proceed from too much affection, or from studious affectation; whereby they may rather ingratiate themselves with him whom they praise by false commendations, than adorn his person by just and deserved praises. And, secondly, by thus betraying and praising commonly invite such as are present to something of their own to the commendation: contrariwise, profuse and immodest praises invite the hearts to detract and take away something that belongs to them: thirdly, (which is the principal point), too much magnifying a man stirs up envy towards him: seeing all immediate praises like a reproach to others, who merit no less."
3 A stone is heavy, and the sand weigheth: but a fool's wrath is heavier than them both.

But besides this, I cannot quite pass by the gloss which some have made upon these words: who by taschken baboker (which I have applied only to their too much assiduity in praising others, as if one should say, from morning to night) understand making their lives long, as if it is, as we speak, but early days with them: and they have made no progress in those virtues for which they are commended. And then the sense is, There is nothing more dangerous than to cry up men too soon for their parts or for their virtues, before they be sufficiently tried, and have made a due improvement: for this, instead of doing them service, it is hurtful and pernicious; for along with them, that is, entertain a vain opinion of their own worth, and grow idle, or negligent, &c. and so dwindle away to nothing.

[5] What he saith afterward of a railing wife (ver. 16), may be thus expressed in short: There are three things that cannot be concealed, because they better themselves: the wind, a strong endeavour, and a scolding wife: with which some join the next verse (ver. 17), as a remedy for the mischief of a brawling wife; and render it: "As iron is easily joined with iron, so is a man with his equal. And therefore the best way for a man to avoid his wife's railing is, by the counsel of wise men: taking him, that is, to choose one for his consort because she is rich, or because she is beautiful only; but because she is like him in humour, and inclination, and condition, &c. Thus the Tigrine version: and De Dien to the same purpose, who makes this proverb no more than that of like to like; which best agree together. But this is too narrow; and therefore I have followed our, and indeed all the ancient translations: who take this to be of the same significion with another old saying, One man is nobody: and therefore God hath formed us to have a communion with each other: the necessity of which is expressed in abundance of ancient aphorisms: which admonish us to confer with others, and to hearken to the counsel and judgment of the wise. And daily experience shows us how dangerous it is, ἄδικως λαοῦ ν, "to be a man's own counsellor," and what is said of artificers may be applied unto all: Every man is his own worst master. To which purpose Melanthon alleges that of Euripides, ὁμοιότατος προς πάντα, "conversation brought forth arts" when men, that is, not only observed one another's works, but conferred their thoughts together, and assisted one another's inventions. And he pertinently observes, that "the Christian doctrine, in the be-

4 Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who is able to stand before envy?

[6] The next verse but one (ver. 19), is understood so variously by interpreters, that it is a labour to number their expositions: some of which are directly contrary to the other. For according as they take the face to be represented in water: either because it is perplexed and confused, or morally, that it is hard to discern what sort of face it is; some make it either easy or impossible, to understand the hearts of other men. Melanthon took it in the latter sense; inculcating the old wholesome lesson, Μην ἐκπαινεῖν καὶ θέλειν "Quos credis fidos, effugie, tutus eris," &c. But now it is generally expounded the other way: and some expound it of the face itself: as we have said: for the meaning of the words is as much as to say, man; the face, the face of another man's face: I have in the paraphrase expressed two of those interpretations, which I looked upon as most simple. And think fit here to mention that of Castalio, who applies it to a man's self in this manner: "As a man may know what kind of face he hath, if he will look into the water, so he may know what kind of man he is, if he will examine his conscience." And this of Malisonate, who is alone (as far as I can find) in his exposition, which is this: "As a man's face may be seen in the water; so his heart, or his inward affections, may be seen in his countenance:" taking man, in the conclusion of the sentence, for the outward man, i.e. to his countenance: and making the Hebrew run thus: "As a man's face is answerable to that face which appears in the water; so his heart is answerable to his countenance." The Lord Bacon, as I have expressed it in the beginning of my paraphrase on this verse, takes the end of this parable to be, "to distinguish between the mind of wise men and of those that are not wise; comparing the former to waters, or glasses, which receive and represent the forms and images of things; whereas the other are like to earth, or rude and unpolished stone, wherein nothing is reflected. And the mind of a wise man (which is so capable that it observes and comprehends an infinite diversity of natures and customs) is the more aptly compared to a glass or mirror; because in a glass he can see his own image, together with images of other men: which his eyes cannot do alone without the help of glass." And so this parable, it seems to me, may not unfruitfully be expounded after this manner:--A man may see himself while he looks upon other men; as well as know other men by considering his own inclinations.

[7] This preface is already so long, that I must not mention the various interpretations of the twenty
PROVERBS.

5 Open rebuke is better than secret love.
6 Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful.
7 The full soul loatheth an honeycomb; but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet.
8 As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place.
9 Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart;
first verse, I have expressed that which is nearest to our translation; and seems to be the truest touchstone of this sort, whereby to try the goodness or badness of men’s minds. Some of which are so incorrigible, he shows in the next verse, that the sorest afflictions will not amend them.
[i] And then, in conclusion, he presses every one to diligence about his own business: and especially commends the pastoral care which men should have about their flocks and their herds: which are the best sort of possessions, he shows, in several regards. First, because most durable, for they are always increasing of themselves (ver. 24); secondly, because easily preserved without much labour, or fraudulent arts; God himself providing liberally for them (ver. 25); thirdly, because most profitable:
yielding all things necessary for food and raiment
(ver. 26, 27).
[k] Where he mentions, particularly in the last verse, the milk of the goats, and of no other creature;
because they had abundance of them; and their milk was in daily use, both for meat and for medicine.
And for medicine the ancients preferred it before all other, as most moderate and temperate. So Galen and Paulus Egineta; the last of which writes thus: ‘Woman’s milk is the most temperate of all other;
next to that goat’s; and next to that ass’s; then sheep; and lastly cow’s milk.’ From whence it was (Bacharuns conjectures, who hath heaped up a great deal on this subject, lib. ii. De See Animal.
cap. ult. par. 1.), Jupiter, a king in Crete about Abraham’s time (and looked upon afterward as the greatest god), is said to have been nourished by a goat: that is, by the best of nourishments.

Ver. 1.] Be not so confident of thy present power, riches, or any thing else, as to overlook exca-mptions, and brag what thou wilt do or enjoy hereafter; for thou canst not be secure of this very day (wherein thou makest such large promises to thyself of the future), which may produce something, for any thing thou knowest, that shall spoil all thy designs, and frustrate all thy expectations, which thou hast for tomorrow. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 2.] Be not so blinded with self-love, as to praise thyself; which is both indecent and imprudent, for others will only the more undervalue thee; but take care to do praise-worthy things, which will force commendations even from strangers and foreigners, who cannot be thought too partial to thee; for this will make thee truly honourable.

Ver. 3.] We feel there is heaviness in a stone, and that a bag of sand is a weighty load; but neither of them is so intolerable as the effects of a fool’s wrath, which cannot be shaken off so soon as they may be;
for he cannot easily be appeased by us, nor can he moderate himself; till his anger hath carried him to the most barbarous cruelty. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 4.] And yet envy is still worse than this; for though in a fiery a man hath no pity, but is transported by his violent passion beyond all bounds (like an inundation of waters), yet his wrath appearing openly, it may be avoided, and in time it is composed and alloyed: may, perhaps he repents of it: but envy (or a desire of revenge) is a lurking evil, which increases daily without remorse; and is more exasperated by time, till it finds some means or other to do the mischief it desires.

Ver. 5.] He that takes an ingenuous liberty to tell others plainly of their faults, and rebuke them freely, when need requires, to their face, is a better friend, and more valuable (though perhaps he pleases them less), than he that hath more of the passion of love in his heart, but makes it not known by such good effects. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 6.] Just reproofs, though never so smart and severe from one that loves us, ought to be thankfully accepted, because they proceed from his care of us, and desire to do us good; and the most tender expressions of kindness from an enemy ought to be suspected to be false and treacherous; especially when he heaps them upon us in great abundance, and with such earnestness and seeming passion, that we had need to pray him to forbear, and pray God to preserve us from being too credulous. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 7.] As hunger makes men relish the most distasteful food, when full stomachs leathe the most delightful: so poverty hath this advantage of plenty, that it disposes men to be thankful for the smallest blessings, though mixed with care and trouble; when the richer sort, if they be not very careful, are apt to be unsatisfied with, nay, to manceate, their most delicious enjoyments, upon which they have a long time suffered.

Ver. 8.] Men seldom change for the better; but as a bird that forsakes its nest exposes itself to danger, and cannot easily settle again: so he whose levity, or disconscient, makes him rashly leave his country, or trade, or office, wherein he was well placed, too often perhaps, to himself, but rarely mends his condition. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 9.] As balsam and fragrant perfumes marvellously refresh and comfort the natural spirits when they droop and are tired; so doth the very presence of a true-hearted friend, and much more his faithful counsel, rejoice a man’s soul: especially when he is at such a loss, that he knows not how to advise himself.

Ver. 10.] Forsake not therefore a friend, whom thou or thy father before thee hath tried and found sincere: but take thyself to him when thou art in distress, rather than to thy natural brother or kinsman, if he be not also thy friend: and above all other, choose a friend near thee, if it be possible; for as a man that is closely joined unto us in near affection, is better than one of our nearest kindred, whose heart is not knit to us; so a good neighbour near at hand, is better than either friend or brother who is so far off that we may perish before he comes to our assistance.

Ver. 11.] My dear child, if thou hast any love for him that was the instrument of giving thee a being, let such precepts as these make thee wise and good:
which will both give me the highest joy, and furnish me with an answer unto such as are apt to object the child’s miscarriages to want of care in his parents.
CHAPTER XXVII.

12 A prudent man foresight the evil, and hideth himself; but the simple pass on, and are punished.

13 Take his garment that is surety for a stranger, and take a pledge of him for a strange woman.

14 He that blesseth his friend with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, it shall be counted a curse to him.

15 A continual dropping in a very rainy day, and a contentious woman are alike.

16 Whosoever hideth her hideth the wind, and the ointment of his right hand, which bewrayeth itself.

17 Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend.

18 Whoso keepeth the fig-tree shall eat the fruit thereof: so he that waiteth on his master shall be honoured.

19 As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man.

20 Hell and destruction are never full: so the eyes of man are never satisfied.

21 As the fining pot for silver, and the furnace for gold; so is a man to his praise.

22 Though thou shouldest cast a foil in a mortar among wheats with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.

23 Be thou diligent to know the state of thy flocks, and look well to thy herds.

24 For riches are not for ever: and doth the crown endure to every generation?

25 The hay appeareth, and the tender grass showeth itself, and herbs of the mountains are gathered.

Ver. 12.] He whose long experience and observation of things have made him cautious and circum-spect, foreseeing a calamity before it comes, withdraws himself in good time from the danger, into a place of safety; but inconsiderate and credulous persons are so easily abused by crafty men, that they not only quite overlook the mischief which even they intend against them, and go on securely in their accustomed track till it overtakes them; but make haste to fall into it, notwithstanding any caution that is given them.

Ver. 13.] It is a great weakness to trust him who is so rash, as to be bound for one whose ability and honesty are utterly unknown to him; especially for a woman whose way of life makes her credit justly suspected; therefore have nothing to do with such an inconsiderate person; without the utmost security that he can give thee for the payment of what he owes thee.

Ver. 14.] He that spends all his time in nothing else but proclaiming his praises extravagantly, who hath bestowed great benefits upon him, disparages rather than commends his benefactor; in doing much for a base flatterer: who magnifying rather his own deserts than the other's bounty, incurres hereafter his just displeasure. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 15.] He is in an ill case, the roof of whose house is so ruinous, that in a very rainy day, when he shall be wet if he go abroad, cannot be dry at home: and it is no better that both a scolding wife, who torments herself if he stay at home; and makes him tormented with the jeers of others if he go abroad.

Ver. 16.] For it is altogether as impossible for him to keep the wind from blowing, and from being heard when it blows; or to enlose a fragrant perfume in his hand, so that it shall not be suspected; as to make her hold her tongue, or to conceal her hawling humour, which she herself proclaims. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 17.] As nothing is more natural, so nothing is more powerful, than society: for as iron is sharpened and brightened by iron, so one wit whets another; one friend encourages and cheers another; nay, all sorts of passions are stirred up, and men are made either good or bad by mutual conversation. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 18.] As he that diligently looks after the fig-tree (especially whilst it is young and tender), and preserves it from suffering by drought; by vermin, or by wild beasts, &c. shall at last eat of its pleasant fruit; so he that faithfully defends his master's person or reputation, and takes care his estate be not wasted, shall, in due time, be largely rewarded by him for his integrity.

Ver. 19.] The inclinations and designs of other men appear as plainly to the mind of those that are wise, as their faces appear to themselves in the water: where, as every man will find such a countenance represented to him (whether sour or smiling), as he brings when he looks into it: so he ought to expect no other affections from others, but such as he expressed towards them. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 20.] The appetite of man is insatiable as his eyes, which still desire some new sight: and are as far from being filled with all that they have seen, as the infernal places with all the souls they have received; or the grave with all the bodies it hath devoured.

Ver. 21.] As gold and silver are tried by putting them into the fire; which discovers whether they be pure or adulterate: so a man is discovered what he is, by trying how he can bear praises, commendations, and great applauses; which will presently show either the virtue or the vanity of his mind. See Arg. [h].

Ver. 22.] The folly and wickedness of some men are so incurable, that though unto reproves, and chidings, and threatenings, you should add stripes and blows; nay, beat and knock them, like wheat in a mortar; bruising their bodies (as we speak) till they are black and blue, they would not grow a whit the wiser or the better for it.

Ver. 23.] Whether thou be a private person or a prince, let not thy business thyself; and not to trust merely to thy servants and ministers: but go sometimes and take an exact survey of the state of thy affairs; and more particularly make it part of thy care to visit thy flocks and thy herds, and know in what case they are. See Arg. [i].

Ver. 24.] For as no riches are so durable as these, which increase and multiply continually, so the greatest estate, even in these, unless it be well managed, will in time be brought to nothing: nay, the crown itself will not continue to many generations, without due care to preserve its revenue; of which these ought to be thought the best and most lasting provision.

Ver. 25.] For the maintenance of which the earth brings forth plentifully, without any more pains of thine, than only in the spring-time to drive the flocks and herds into pastures; and to look after them, when the earth brings forth grass and young herbs for their food; and to gather hay in due season, which even the mountains afford, for their fodder and winter provision.

Ver. 26.] And if thou takest care to preserve them, they will preserve thee: for the sheep and the lambs-

Ver. 27.] And both of them, especially the goats, will yield thee milk enough for thy own food, and for the sustenance of all thy family, both men-servants and maidsens; who may hence be provided with all things necessary for their livelihood. See Arg. [3].

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 The wicked flees when no man pursueth; but the righteous are bold as a lion.

2 For the transgression of a land many are tирpates the very seeds of future riches, which he deprives them of all means of gathering. Upon which subject the lord Bacon hath discourse very ingeniously in his eighth book of the Advancement of Learning, ch. 2, parab. 24, "This parable (saih he) was by the ancients expressed and shadowed forth under the fable of two horse-leeches; one full and the other hungry. For oppression, coming from the prince, and received by the people, is far more grievous than that of the rich and the full; because it seeks out all tricks for exactions, and leaves no corner unsearched where money may be found. This kind of oppression was wont also to be resembled to sponges, which being dry suck in strongly, but not so being moist. And the parable comprehends in it a necessity, that is, so far as relates to the prince; that he be not the government of provinces or offices of charge to indigent and indebted persons: and to the people, that they suffer not their kings to struggle with too much want." But none have glossed better upon this place, than an excellent prelate of ours, Bishop Sanderson, in his sermon upon Prov. xxiv. 10, 11, where he discourses to this effect: "That is in matter of power, as it is in matter of learning. They that have but a smattering of scholarship, it is observed, are the forwarders to make ostentation of the few scraps they have, for fear there should be no notice taken of their mistakes or absurdities, when it is shown them; and yet then do they it so unduly, that when they think most of all to show their scholarship, they most of all, by some gross mistake or other, betray ignorance. Even just so it is in the case of power, when men of base spirits and condition have gotten a little of it into their hands; who conceive their neighbours will not be sensible what goodly men they are, if they do not, by some act or other, show forth their power to the world; but having minds too narrow to comprehend any brave and generous way to do it, they cannot frame to do it by any other means, than by trampling upon those that are below them; which they do beyond all reason and without any mercy." Which he illustrates very handsomely upon 1 Sam. xiii. 3. "If a mean man (says he) in any of our towns or hamlets, be a little gotten up to overtop most of his neighbours in wealth; or to be put into some small authority, to deal under some great man for the disposing his farms or grounds; or have something to sell to his necessitous neighbour, who must buy upon that day; or have a little money lying by him to furnish another; who, to supply his present needs, must sell off somewhat of that little he hath, though at an under rate; or the like:
CHAPTER XXVIII.

3 A poor man that oppresseth the poor is like a sweeping rain which leaveth no food.

It is scarce credible (did not every day's experience make it proof) how such a man will screw up the poor wretch that falls into his hand. &c., conclude hence, all ye that are of generous births and spirits, how unworthy that practice would be in you; wherein men of the lowest minds and conditions can, in their proportion, not only equal, but even exceed you: which should make you not to hate our own country, as it is wicked: but even to scorn it: because it is base.

[c] After this follow several bad characters of other men: and among the rest of him that oppresseth his brother by usury and increase, ver. 8, where these two words neschech and taribith, do not seem to signify greater extortion, and more moderate gain. For all usury is neschech, as it respects the debitor of whom it is taken: and taribith, in respect of the creditor who is the gainer by it: whether it be great or less, that the one gives and the other receives. If there be any other difference between these two, it either lies in this, that there were several sorts of usury whereby men increased their estates; or the God or man should punish the usurer, but have expressed all that the law forbids in this case, which was to take interest (as we speak) of their brethren, especially of their poor brethren, which some think are only meant; but I have contented myself to say, are principally meant.

[d] And in the next verse but two (ver. 11), he observes, that such men as grow rich, though it be by fraud and oppression, are apt to have a mighty conceit of their own wisdom: which understanding men, though never so poor, see through, and discern to be, at best, but craft: and many times to be no more such, which we call purse-pride, when they have no more wit than just to save and hoard up money. Upon which place some observe that Solomon secretly intimates riches to be an impediment to wisdom; and poverty a great advantage: because the one is apt to blow men up into a vain opinion of themselves; and the other to make them humble and modest; the former of which is the greatest enemy, and the latter the best friend, to wisdom. Certain it is, that money having so large a command, as to be able to purchase not only dignity, but great veneration, from the multitude; they that have it are apt to look no farther neither for wisdom nor virtue: which made a confidant to Caesar (as the lord Bacon observes) give him this counsel, that if he would restore the decayed state of the Roman commonwealth, he must by all means take away the estimation of wealth: "for these (said he) and all other evils, together with the reputation of money, shall cease; if neither public offices, nor any other dignities, which commonly are coveted, be exposed to sale." And the truth is, saith that lord (Advane. of Learn. book i.), as it was rightly said, that blushing is the colour of virtue, though sometimes it come from vice; so we may truly affirm that poverty is the fortune of virtue, though sometimes it may proceed from misgovernment and improvidence. And he adds further, that "the magnificence of princes and great men had long since turned into barbarism and rude-ness, if the poverty of learning had not kept up civility and decency of life."

4 They that forsake the law, praise the wicked: but such as keep the law contend with them.

[e] For bad princes, Solomon shows, ver. 13, bring great contempt and misery upon a nation, as bad men (ver. 13, 14) bring mischief upon themselves. But no princes are more grievous to their subjects, than such as are needy, and yet have no goodness. So I understand with the LXX. ver. 15, where that word we render "raging," is well translated by the Vulgar a "hungry bear," as Bochartus hath shown.

[f] Who also seems to me to have expressed the sense of the next verse most fully: when he observes, that, according to the manner of the Hebrew language, there is something wanting in one part of the verse, which is to be supplied out of the other. As when the psalmist saith in Ps. lxxxiv. 11, "One day in thy courts, is better than a thousand;" he means elsewhere, out of his courts. And Ps. xcii. 7, "A thousand shall fall on thy side (viz. the left hand) but ten shall be left;" he means 1000: In like manner we are to understand this verse, as if he had said: A prince that wants understanding, and is a great oppressor, shall shorten his days: but he that hates covetousness shall prolong them (see parab. 1, De Animal. Sac. lib. iii. cap. 25).

[g] In the next two verses I have endeavoured to connect several senses together: as he that examines them will perceive. And in ver. 21, have taken some notice of the lord Bacon's observation; that men may be bribed by something else besides money, to pervert justice: and more commonly by other respects than by that. His words are these (book viii. Advane. of Learn. ch. 2, parab. 29): "Easiness of humour in a judge, is more pernicious than the corruption of bribes. For all persons do not give bribes; but there is hardly any cause wherein somewhat may not be found, that may incline the mind of the judge, if respect of persons lead them. For one man shall be respected as his countryman, another as an ill-toned man, another as a man, another as a favourite, another as commended by a friend; to conclude, all is full of iniquity where respect of persons bears sway: and for a very slight matter, as it were for a bit of bread, judgment is perverted.'

[h] The rest of the chapter contains plain observations, concerning several sorts of good and bad men: and concludes with the repetition of a remark he had made before (ver. 12) about the state of public affairs; which are then in an ill condition, when bad men get into authority. For virtuous men begin then to be so ill treated, that they fly or hide themselves, to avoid the abuses which they see shall be put upon them. Then the Law suggests, when they translate the first clause of the verse thus: "In places where the impious bear sway, the righteous sigh and groan;" i.e. some are imprisoned, and sent into obscurity, by the unjust prosecution of the wicked; and others obscure themselves, and groan in secret under those oppressions, till there be a turn of affairs (which Solomon here intimates they may expect in due time) by the fall of those wicked persons, and the preference of better: which invites virtuous men to appear again; and by the countenance they then receive, to propagate piety among the people: who are so ready to confirm themselves to the example of their governors, that there is no blessing we should pray for so earnestly as this; especially when the days are evil. That that saying of the son of Sirach should be perpetually in every good man's mind. To support and comfort him: when he is constrained, perhaps, to lie hid and conceal himself to avoid trouble and danger. "The power of the earth is in the hand of the Lord, and in due time he will set over it one that is profitable." Exclus. x. 4. read the foregoing verses.

5 Evil men understand not judgment: but they that seek the Lord understand all things.
6 Better is the poor that walketh in his uprightness, than he that is perverse in his ways, though he be rich.

Ver. 1.] An evil conscience makes men timorous and cowardly, like a faint-hearted soldier who runs away at the appearance of an enemy, and never so much as looks back to see whether he pursues him; but men of integrity are not easily affrighted: but proceed like a young lion, with an undaunted resolution, even in hazardous undertakings.

Ver. 2.] There are many mischief that people draw upon themselves by their wickedness, and this especially—that falling into factions, every one thinks himself fit to govern: and throwing down one ruler after another, they can come to no settlement till they grow better and more considerate: and then, some truly prudent and pious person arises, who takes the right course to heal these breaches, and prolong the government in peace and tranquillity. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 3.] But there is none more wicked and intolerable than a needy fellow that is got into power; but never in the midst of the miseries of the poor, whom he squeezes and spoils, like a violent rain, which, instead of refreshing the corn, as gentle showers do, beats it down and lays it so flat, that it can never recover: but a famine comes upon the land. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 4.] From such a man there is none so wicked but he shall receive encouragement; for they that make not the law of God their rule, but their own lusts, will employ and promote the vilest person, and find something or other to commend him for: but they that resolutely observe God's law, are so far from approving such a wicked wretch, that they oppose him; and declare, as we say, open war against him.

Ver. 5.] For the minds of men that give up themselves to wickedness are so depraved, that sometime they do not so much as understand, and at no time regard, the difference between right and wrong; much less the difference that God doth and will make between them: but men piously affected understand and consider all things of this nature so exactly, that they are careful not to offend in the least against their neighbour.

Ver. 6.] An honest, upright man, that acts sincerely in all that he doth, though he be never so poor, is far happier, and more useful and commendable, than a crafty person, that knows how to wind and turn himself every way: though by his fraud and tricks he grow never so rich and great (see xix. 1).

Ver. 7.] He that studies the law of God, and observes the rules of sobriety and temperance, and other virtues, which it prescribes, is likely to prove a wise man, in whom his parents may find comfort: but he that had rather go into merry company, than into the school of the wise, and there spend his time and his money in sin, and pleasures, is a shame, as well as a vexation to them.

Ver. 8.] He that increases his estate by usury, for the money or goods which he lends to his poor brother (contrary to the laws provided in that case, Exod. xxii. 21; Deut. xxiii. 19, 20), shall not be able to make his family so great as he intended; but those riches shall be translated into some other hands, which will exercise that charity which he neglected. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 9.] He that refuses to hearken unto God and to obey his laws, deceives himself, if he thinks by his prayers to please him, and make an amen for his crimes; for God will be so far from hearkening unto him, that he will abominate such prayers as tend to nothing but to make God a partner with him in his sins.

Ver. 10.] He that studies by false suggestions, and deceitful representations, to seduce upright men into dangerous practices shall fall himself irrecoverably into that very mischief which he designed for them: while they, preserving their integrity, shall remain not only safe, but in a flourishing condition.

Ver. 11.] A man whose labours and cares have such success that he grows very rich, and is courts and complimented by every body, is apt to fancy himself much wiser than other men: but when a man of mean condition, who applies himself more to understand the value of things than to get riches, comes to discourse with him, he easily discovers, and makes it appear, that he is but a fool. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 12.] When the righteous are advanced to places of trust and authority, there is excessive joy among all virtuous men; and the whole kingdom feels the happy effects of it, in beautiful order, peace, security, and plenty, at home; and in the honour and reputation it hath abroad: but when the wicked get up into power, it makes a useful change, being wholly employed in finding reasons to ruin others: whose safety then lies in concealing themselves in their estates (see ver. 28).

Ver. 13.] He that studies to hide and extenuate rather than to leave his sins, shall be so far from escaping by his impudent denial, that he shall make himself obnoxious to severer punishments: but he that ingenuously acknowledges he hath done amiss, and not only promises to do so no more, but gives some proof of his amendment, shall obtain pardon both from God and man.
14 Happy is the man that feareth always: but he that hardeneth his heart shall fall into mischief.

15 As a roaring lion, and a raging bear; so is a wicked ruler over the poor people.

16 The prince that wanteth understanding is also a great oppressor: but he that hateth covetousness shall prolong his days.

17 A man that doeth violence to the blood of any person shall die to the pit; let no man stay him.

18 Whoso walketh uprightly shall be saved: but he that is perverse in his ways shall fall at once.

19 He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread: but he that followeth vain persons shall have poverty enough.

20 A faithful man shall abound with blessings; but he that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent.

21 To have respect of persons is not good: for, for a piece of bread that man will transgress.

22 He that hateth to be rich hath an evil eye, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him.

23 He that rebuketh a man afterwards shall find more favour than he that flattereth with the tongue.

24 Whoso robbeth his father or his mother, and saith, It is no transgression: the same is the companion of a destroyer.

25 He that is of a proud heart stirreth up strife: but he that putteth his trust in the Lord shall be made fat.

26 He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool: but whoso walketh wisely, he shall be delivered.

27 He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack:

Ver. 11.] From which happiness, if he would not relapse, let him constantly preserve a pious fear and dread of God and of his displeasure in his mind, and be cautious and circumspect in all his notions: for if he be presumptuously confident and careless, and, because God is so gracious, regard neither his commands nor his threatenings: he will fall back into deeper guilt and misery.

Ver. 15.] A lion and a bear are not more dreadful to the weaker beasts, especially when hunger presses them to seek a prey, than a needy prince, who fears not God and loves not man, is to the poorer sort: who have no wherewithal to fill his insatiable desires; and yet are the surest to be invaded, because the least able to resist his power. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 16.] But it is very great ignorance not only of religion, but of all things else, that makes a prince grievously oppress and pillage his people; which makes his reign short, as well as unhappy: when he that, hating such exactions, is kind to his subjects, prolongs his days in much tranquillity. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 17.] He that murders a man, and, pressed with the weight of his guilt, or pursued by the avenger of blood, flees to save himself, shall never think himself safe; but lead a restless life to his very grave: for all men looking upon him as a common enemy, shall refuse to succour him: no, though they see him falling headlong into a pit which he is not aware of, they shall not stop him, but let him perish.

Ver. 18.] There is no such way to be safe, as to be honest and sincere in all a man's words and actions; for he that endeavours to preserve himself by fraud and deceit, though he can wind, and turn, and hath several shifts he thinks to save himself by, yet in one or other of them he shall perish: for the time will come, when he will blindly choose the wrong course; and commonly when he begins to fall, he sinks utterly, and cannot possibly recover himself.

Ver. 19.] He that is a good husband in the management of his estate, shall have the satisfaction of providence sufficiently, if not plentifully, for himself and his family: but he that is careless, and follows the courses of loose and wicked companions, can reap no other fruit of his negligence, but the most miserable want and beggary.

Ver. 20.] He that is true to his word, and just in all his dealings, shall have abundance of blessings from God, and be well spoken of by men: but he whose eager desires make him heap up wealth, by right or by wrong, brings such guilt upon himself, as makes him execrable unto both.
but he that hideth his eyes shall have many a curse.

willing so much as to know them, for fear of having his compassion moved towards them, shall draw upon himself the curse of God as well as men; and fall into many and grievous misfortunes.

Ver. 28.] When wicked men are advanced unto power and authority, they favouring such only as are like to themselves, it makes good men scarce; who are forced to withdraw, and hide themselves from their tyranny; but when they perish (as they shall at last), and good men come in their place, then the righteous openly show themselves; and the number of them increase by their example, and by the encou"ragement they enjoy under righteous governors. See the church of its proper goods; or, if we will not take it in that strict sense, it denotes one that will suffer himself to be pacified by gifts, and bribed to wink at the most enormous crimes, which he ought to have severely punished; or, that is so unjust as to find fault, perhaps, with the most innocent persons, on purpose that they may appease him, offering one or other part of their estate to save all the rest:

one or other of these is the most literal exposition of the words. But I have contented myself with the LXX. (who render it παράπόρτος) to use only general expressions in the paraphrase which include all these, and whatsoever else that is contrary to the duty of his office. Rabbi Solomon doth not differ much from the sense of the LXX, when he translates it "a proud man," who heaves and neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy.

CHAPTER XXIX.

ARGUMENT.—[e] This chapter concludes the collection of Proverbs, made by the men of Hezekiah; and contains more advice proper to a prince (as he was) than any of the rest; but ushers them in with a general admonition, how dangerous it is not to profit by reproof or corrections (such as he and his people had by the hand of Semachthoth, which when they work upon men's spirits there is some hope of them: but when they become refractory, inflexible, and obstinately reject them, they are near to a final destruction. This wicked temper of mind he expresses by hardening the neck: which is a metaphor, as Iloehatus truly observes (ib. iii.
De Sacris Anim. cap. 41, par. ii.), taken from zenia, who being put forward draw back and withdraw their necks and shoulders from the yoke: and sometimes are so headstrong and stiff-necked, that they cannot be brought to submit to: unto which the scriptures often allude, both in the old testament and the new; for instance, Exod. xxi. 9;
Acts vii. 51. And both belong those expressions 1 sa. xviii. 4, where he saith his people had an iron yoke," &c. and that in Jer. v. 5, where he sayth they "had broken the yoke and burst the bands."

[b] Then follows a tacit admonition unto princes, to be good, by describing the happiness which a nation enjoys: they which they had noted twice before in the foregoing chapter (ver. 12, 28), but thought it so considerable and so needful, that they insert it here again; and the latter part of it once more (ver. 16), being a famous observation of his father David, Ps. xii. 3, where he takes notice how the wicked flourish, and go about confidenty into every place, nay, take the liberty to do as they list, when men of no account are exalted to power: who take no care to oppose growing wickedness, and to keep every man within the bounds of his duty.

And after an admonition (ver. 3) that the study of wisdom is the only preservative against the lusts of uncleanness; which, in the preface to this book, as it is observed, destroy abundance of young men, and their estates also (for lust is very blind and very prodigal); the next observation (ver. 4) is concerning kings again: where isch terumoth, which we translate "a man that receiveth gifts," is in the Hebrew phrase "a man of obligations." For so the word terumoth always signifies, throughout the whole bible, "the heave-offerings" which were offered to God: which would make one think that isch terumoth ("a man of heave-offerings") signiifies here "a prince that is sacrilegious," and robs selves: but when they perish, the righteous increase.

[e] And then seems to follow again a double admonition to princes, or those that govern under them.
Ps. xii. 3, through laziness, or contentedness to examine a poor man's complaint, and do him right (ver. 7). Secondly, not through profaneness, pride, or carelessness, to scorn admonition; especially any warning that is given of danger, &c. (ver. 8).

For when he says, "the righteous considers the cause of the poor," he seems to mean a righteous prince, or judge (and so I have explained it in the paraphrase): for who else is to consider of the din (as it is in the Hebrew), the cause of the poor which is to be judged? None but they, and the advocates who are to plead it: all which persons are obliged, in conscience, to search into the truth of things; not to be sparing of their pains (though matters be intricate, though the labour be like to be long, though they shall get nothing by it) to find out the bottom of a business: which he that refuses to do, nay, perhaps rejects the complaint of the poor, or beats them off with big words; or, out of the hardness of his heart, or the love of ease, or fear of great men, or any other respect, will not give them audience, nor consider and repress their grievance; Solomon pronounces him a wicked, impious person; and accordingly God will pro-cede against him.

[f] Such men, indeed, may scorn those threatenings
3 Whose loveth wisdom rejoiceth his father: but he that keepeth company with harlots speddeth his substance.

4 The king by judgment established the may, laugh at them: but thereby they will endanger the bringing all things into confusion; as Solomon observes in the succeeding words (ver. 8), where "men of scorn" (as it is in the Hebrew), signify such as mock at religion, and at all things that are serious, whom the LXX. call διακότως, "lawless pestilent men;" that regard neither God nor man, but only their own wicked humour; which brings the kingdom or place where they live into the greatest danger. We must express by the word scorners, and other translations by words of the import which I have expressed in the paraphrase, but shall not mention here, because I would leave room to insert the most admirable discourse of the lord Bacon upon this verse. "It may seem strange," saith he (book viii. Advane. of Learn. ch. 2, parab. 12), "that in the description of men, made and framed, as it were, by nature to the ruin and destruction of a state, Solomon hath chosen the character, not of a proud and insolent man, not of a tyrannical and cruel, not of a rash and violent, not of an impious and lewd, not of an unjust and oppressive, not of a seditious and seditious man, nor of a vain, and such as in the helm of government, are by nature scorners. For, first, such persons, that they may win the reputation of undaunted statesmen, do ever extenuate the greatness of dangers; and insult over those who give them their just weight, as timorous and faint-hearted people. Secondly, they scoff at all mature delays, and meditated delinquencies of men by consultations and deliberation, as a thing too much tasting of an oratory vein, and full of tediousness; but nothing conducing to the sum and issue of business. Thirdly, as for fame, at which a prince's counsels should especially level, they contend it as the crown of the vulgar, and a thing that will quickly be blown away. Fourthly, the power and authority of laws they regard not at all, but look upon them as cobwebs, that ought not to stop matters of consequence. Fifthly, counsels and precautions, foreseeing of events afar off, they reject as mere dreams and melancholy apprehensions. Sixthly, men truly prudent, and well seen in affairs, of great resolution and counsel, they defame with gibes and jests. In a word, they do at once overturn all the foundations of civil government; which is the more to be attended, because they secretly undermine it, and do not assault it by open force. And it is a practice which is not yet so suspected among men as it deserves."

[5] The latter end of the next verse (ver. 9), some refer to the fool, others to the wise man. They that refer to the fool understood it two ways, much to the same purpose. Some thus; the fool will always be angry or deride, so that the wise man cannot have peace of word: others thus; the wise man shall be either irritated, or derided by the fool perpetually. As much as to say, He shall get nothing, if he contend with a fool, but either to be derided or provoked to anger by him. This I have taken some notice of in my paraphrase: but the other being the most common opinion, that he speaks of land: but he that receiveth gifts overthroweth it.

5 A man that flattereth his neighbour spreadeth a net for his feet.

6 In the transgression of an evil man there is the way of a wise man's dealing with a fool, I have principally regarded. And the lord Bacon hath made this pertinent reflection upon it (in the first named book and place, parab. 3), which it will be profitable to set down here. "It is accounted a wise rule, not to contend with our betters: but it is a no less useful admonition, which Solomon here gives us not to contend with a worthless person; whom we may meddle with, without disadhave been reserved for replication and refutation, being disclosed already and tasted beforehand by this unadvised anticipation, quite lose their strength and their grace. Thirdly, if a man do not pour out all that he hath to say at once, but deliver himself by paroles; now one thing and then casting in another; he shall perceive by the looks and the answer of him with whom he discourses, how every particular passage affects him, and what acceptance it finds with him: so as what is yet remaining to be spoken, he may with the greater caution, either suppress, or select what is to his purpose. Thus that great person: who herein had followed the LXX. who express the sense, rather than translate the words, in this manner: "A man void of understanding brings out his whole mind, but a wise man dispenses it by part.

[1] The like observation he makes upon the next verse (ver. 14), where by "broadcast," or "the ends of falsehood" (as the Hebrew hath it), the LXX. truly understand גלון גלון, "an unjust report," that hurts our neighbours by calumnies, or false accusations (as the word commonly signifies in scripture, particularly Ps. lii.); unto which, if a ruler lend his ear, he will never want level informers, or rather slanders: party to work to the declinasion. Melecheth hath observed upon this verse, that the "love of lies" (as he translates it) comprehend a great many vices; according as there are divers sorts of lies: which are all repugnant to that eminent virtue of truth, in which a prince ought to excel, viz. vanity or perfidiousness, breach of promises, calumnies, suspicions, sophistry; which defends bad causes by colourable pretences to please great men; and persuades the prince, by plausible arguments, that he is tied to no rules; unto any of which if a prince be inclined, his ministers will not fail to make him break his word perpetually, to abuse him with false stories, to influse into his mind unjust suspicions: and to find cold comfort at his court, he never so wicked: of all which he gives examples.

But none hath opened this parable comparably to the lord Bacon, in the place beforementioned (parab. 13), "Where he takes it for an easy credulous temper in a prince, to believe detractors and syphocants without examination. From whence proceeds such a pestidens breath, as infects and corrupts all his hath followed the LXX. who express the sense, rather than translate the words, in this manner: "A man void of understanding brings out his whole mind, but a wise man dispenses it by part.

[1] There is an exposition of the next words (ver. 12), which would be very natural, if the wise man spake only of the commands of ministers to their servants; which they pretend some time not to hear, that they may not do as they are bidden. But he speaks of their not amending the faults of which they have been already told; which is not the quality of all servants: and therefore I have said above things of the servants; but this lack not. And, of εἰσπέραξεν, "a stubborn obstinate servant;" whose heart is hardened against all words that can be spoken to him, good or bad.

[18] But I must make no more gloses, for fear of prolonging this preface too much beyond its just bounds. And therefore I shall conclude it with the lord Bacon's observation upon verse 21 (where the LXX. have expressed but a little part of the sense), "that both princes and private masters should keep a mean in the dispensation of their grace and favour towards servants: which mean is threefold. First, that servants be promoted by steps (or degrees) not by leaps. Secondly, that they be more and the end more (or rather indefinitely, which (Machiavel well advises), that they have ever in their sight before them something whereunto they may farther aspire. For unless these courses be taken, in raising of servants, princes shall, instead of thankful acknowledgments and duties of observance, be repaid with nothing but disdain and contumacy. For from sudden promotion arises insolence; from constant attenuation of their desire proceeds impatience of being denied; and there being nothing remaining that they can farther wish, alacrity and industry will cease.

Ver. 1.] He that, having received frequent reproofs from good men, and perhaps corrections from God, will not yield in the least, but absolutely refuse to be guided by them, and submit unto them, is in danger to fall, and that on a sudden, into utter and irreparable ruin. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 2.] 5.

Ver. 2.] 3.

Ver. 3.] A young man whose love of wisdom and virtue preserves his body as pure as his mind, and his estate as entire as both, gives the greatest joy to his father: as, on the contrary, nothing can be a greater grief to him, than to see his son so sottish, as to maintain a company of harlots; whose covetousness being as insatiable as their lust, devoureth all that he hath. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 4.] A king that administers justice exactly to all, and defends his kingdom to a good estate, though it had been before in great disorder: but he who, having no respect to equity and right, takes the most illegal courses to enrich himself, subverts it utterly; though it be never so well settled. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 5.] He that soothes his neighbour, by commending all that he doth, though not done without just cause against his interest, is so far from being his friend, as he imagines, that he is a traitor to him; and leads him, unwares, into such dangers: that when he finds himself perplexed in them, he will treat that flatterer as his greatest enemy. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 6.] A naughty man hath a heavy heart at last, when he finds himself undone by those very arts, whereby he thought to have ruined others: but pious men are always cheerful, nay, full of joy; both to think that they are in safe and secure ways, and to see the evil-doer caught in his own wickedness.

Ver. 7.] A righteous man, when he is in authority, not only readily receives, and patiently weighs, the complaints of the poorest person; but is at the pains to study his cause, that he may fully understand it, and do him right, though he thereby incur hatred to himself from the adversary: but a wicked man will not attend unto it, or not use due care to be well instructed in it. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 8.] There are no greater fools than scorners, who, by laughing at all things serious, whether sacred or civil, put a kingdom into a combustion, when it is disposed to be quiet; nay, turn things topsy-turvy, and endanger its utter ruin, unless good and cautious men prevent it; who, by their piety, turn away the divine vengeance; and by their prudence, and other virtues, divert the fury of men, which these scorners have raised. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 9.] Let a man be never so wise, it is no purpose for him to dispute or to enter into any contest with an obstinate fool: for which way soever he deals with him, whether angrily or pleasantly, there will be no end of the controversy; but the fool will still have the last word; may, it is well if he do not restlessly rage, or laugh one to scorn. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 10.] Men enormously wicked, who stick not to kill those that oppose their desires, above all others hate and would destroy an upright magistrate; whose integrity makes him courageously endeavour to bring them to condign punishment; but such a person all virtuous men love the more heartily, and labour to defend and preserve them from their violence; or to revenge his death, if he should perish by them. See Arg. [h].

Ver. 11.] A fool is so inconsiderately transported by his passion, or conceit of himself, that when he comes to treat of any business, he can put no stop to his discourse, but runs on till he hath poured out all that he thinks upon that subject; but a wise man represses the heat and forwardness of his spirit, that he may pause and take time to declare his mind, not altogether, but by parables. See Arg. [i].

Ver. 12.] There is one sort of men: of poor, for instance, who are slow to borrow, and of rich, who lend them money, and perhaps oppress them: but these would all agree well enough, when they meet together, if they would but consider, that there is one Lord who makes the sun to shine equally on all; and who intends all should live happily, though in an unequal condition (see xxii. 24).

Ver. 13.] A king that administers justice equally to all his subjects, and cannot be moved by the power or interest of the greatest persons to deny it to the meanest; but faithfully and sincerely sets himself to help the poor to their right, or to defend them from violence and wrong: takes the surest course to settle himself in the affections of his people, and continue his kingdom for many generations.

Ver. 14.] The way to make a child wise and virtuous, is not only to instruct him in his duty, but to check him when he is in fault; and that not merely by reproof, but by the sharp discipline of the rod, when the other will do no goods for if he be left to his own will, or rather to wander after his own inclinations without such restraints, he will prove, in all 17 Correct thy son, and he shall give thee rest; yes, he shall give delight unto thy soul.
18 Where there is no vision, the people perish: but he that keepeth the law, happy is he.
19 A servant will not be corrected by words: for though he understand he will not answer.
20 Seest thou a man that is hasty in his words? there is more hope of a fool than of him.
21 He that delicately bringeth up his servant from a child, shall have him become his son at the length.
22 An angry man stirreth up strife, and a furious man abominded in transgression.

likelihood, a disgrace to his mother, by whose indulgence he was spoiled; nay, fly, perhaps, in her face, and openly reproach her (x. 1).

Ver. 16.] When the wicked grew numerous, by growing great (ver. 2), men take the greater license to transgress; and wickedness increases by having authority on its side: but let not the righteous hereby be discouraged; for the more wicked men are, the shorter is their reign: and they that preserve their virtue shall have the pleasure to behold their downfall.

Ver. 17.] It may seem most for thy ease to let thy child alone, without giving him correction or reproof; but let me advise thee to put thyself to this trouble, to save thyself a greater (viz. many anxious and restless thoughts, which his ill doing will raise in thee), or rather to give thyself the highest delight, when, by thy care of his education, he proves a great ornament unto thee.

Ver. 18.] Where there are none to instruct the people, and expend the will of God unto them, they first grow idle and careless, and run into all licentiousness; till, growing refractory and unmanageable, they be abandoned by God to destruction; but when they are not only well taught, but also strictly observe the laws of God, they remain in a prosperous, happy condition. See Arg. [k].

Ver. 19.] A slave, and he that is of a servile nature, is not to be amended by reason and persuasions; no, nor by reproofs, or threats: for, though he hears, and understands too, what you say, yet he will not obey, till he be forced unto it by blows. See Arg. [l].

Ver. 20.] Observe it when you will, you shall commonly find that he who is forward to speak to a business, before his betters, or before he understands it, or hath considered it, is so conceited of himself that a man wholly ignorant may sooner be rightly informed, than he who is so well persuaded of his own sufficiency.

Ver. 21.] It is so hard for a man of base condition, to bear a sudden preferment handsomely, that it is dangerous to express too much kindness to a servant at the very first; by feeding him delicately, clothing him finely, or indulging him to much ease, liberty, and familiarity: for this is the way to make him saucy, if not contumacious; nay, to demean and take upon him, as if he were a son, and, perhaps, endeavour to disinherit the heirs of the family. See Arg. [m].

Ver. 22.] A man's pride shall bring him low: but honour shall uphold the humble in spirit.

Ver. 23.] Who so is partner with a thief hateth his own soul: he heareth cursing, and bewrayeth it not.

Ver. 24.] The fear of man bringeth a snare: but whom putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe.

Ver. 25.] Many seek the ruler's favour; but every man's judgment cometh from the Lord.

Ver. 26.] An unjust man is an abomination to the just; and he that is upright in the way is abomination to the wicked.

Ver. 27.] A man prone to anger is very troublesome and unpeaceable, being apt to quarrel about trifles; and, as he offends very often, so, if he let it proceed to rage and fury, he falls into abundance of sins; both in word and deed, against God and against his neighbour.

Ver. 28.] Proud and contumelious behaviour, instead of procuring men respect, throws them into the contempt and hatred of all; and, at last, into destruction; but he whose meek and lowly mind makes him kind and obliging, shall be highly esteemed: and the esteem he hath shall his support, when others fail to ruin.

Ver. 29.] He that partakes with a thief, by harbouthing him, when he is pursued, or by receiving stolen goods, &c. hath the same guilt upon him with the thief himself: and, as he hath put his own life in danger to save the thief's, so this will engage him to run his soul into greater danger, to save his life: for being adjured to discover what he knows, he will go near to forswear himself, for fear of being hanged.

Ver. 30.] As all inordinate fear bereaves a man of counsel and power to help himself; so he that stands in too great fear of what men can do unto him, will be ensnared in many sins, and perils also, to avoid their displeasure: but he that confides in the Lord hath his wits always about him, and, being raised above such low considerations, preserves his integrity: and that, by God's good providence over him will preserve him in safety.

Ver. 31.] There are multitudes of men who are ambitious to be known to their prince, and obtain his favour for honour and preferment; but few remember that there is a greater Lord than he, the sovereign of all the world, whose grace and favour should be principally sought: for he determines and orders what every man's portion shall be; and will both judge of men's deserts better than any earthly king can do, and deal with them according as they behave themselves, in that condition wherein they are.

Ver. 32.] There is such a perfect antipathy between virtue and vice, that all truly good men extremely abominate him that doth mischief in the world, though he be never so great and powerful: as, on the contrary, the evil-doer hath every man that behaves himself uprightly, though never so useful, in utter abhorrence and detestation.

PROVERBS.
PART IV.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 The words of Agur the son of Jakeh, even the prophecy: the man spake unto Ithiel, even unto Ithiel and Ucal, 2 Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man.

CHAP. XXX.

Argument. — [a] This chapter contains a new collection of pithy sayings, which some fancy to be Solomon's; and therefore translate the first two words thus: the words of the collector, or gatherer. But why Solomon should call himself by this name, and also, instead of the son of David, style himself the son of Jakeh, seems to me unaccountable. And therefore it is the most reasonable to follow our translation (unto which the wisest of those that adhere to the Vulgate are forced to consent, as minutely, and to look upon this chapter as a fragment of some wise sentences, delivered by one whose name was Agur, and his father's name Jakeh: unless we will conceive that this son of Jakeh (whosoever he was) had gotten the name of collector, because, though he was a very wise man, yet he composed nothing himself; but by gathering out of other wise men's works such instructions as he thought most profitable, and comprised, in a few words, a great deal of sense.

[6] Which conjecture, if it be admitted, nothing can better explain his disclaiming the title of a wise man (ver. 2), which he would not assume to himself, because he was only a collector from other authors, and did not pretend to have discovered or invented any thing himself. But take it how we will, some of his observations are here annexed to the Proverbs of Solomon, after the manner of other writings of this nature. In which (as Melancthon notes) the greater part of a book belonging to one author, some notable spots of others being inserted; as some of the Sibyllines, verses, they say, were, into the poem of Phocilides.

[c] And these words of Agur are called masshe, which they translate prophecy, either to denote the weightiness of the sentences, or that they were called and selected out of some work of his, then remaining in their records, as fit (in the judgment of the men of Hezekiah, who perhaps extracted them) to accompany the Proverbs of Solomon. And they seem to me to be answers to several questions propounded to him by his scholars, Ithiel (who was the principal) and Ucal: who came to him, as if he had been an oracle, to be resolved in some hard doubts; asking him in the first place, just as they did Apollo of old, (as Aben Ezra conjectures.) "who was the wisest man?" To which he replies (ver. 2), "He that is sensible of his own ignorance." Much like the saying of Socrates, "This I only know, that I know nothing:" and of Pythagoras, who also refused the name of wise: which made much for the reputation of his wisdom.

[d] Upon this subject Agur enlarges, ver. 3, 4, wishing his scholars, especially Ithiel (who, I suppose, asked the question in the name of the rest), to be sensible how imperfect all human knowledge is; by considering how little or nothing we know of the works of God, which none can understand (though they perpetually before our eyes) but he alone that made them. And therefore advises him to make it his principal study to understand what belongeth to his own duty (which is the best part of knowledge), ver. 5, and herein also to be content with what God hath revealed, and not pretend to be wiser than he hath made us (ver. 6.)

[e] After which, he gives answers, as I take it, unto other questions, which Ithiel propounded to him. And, first, about prayer. For Agur, having repressed their busy humour of inquiry into all manner of things, had raised, we may suppose, some devotion in his scholars' hearts, which made them desire to be directed in it. And he gives them most wise advice, ver. 7, 8, to be very cautious what they prayed for; just as in Plato (Alcibiad. 2), we find Socrates giving Alcibiades instructions about this, as a principal part of virtue: in the practice of which, he tells him, there had need to be the greatest care, lest we imprudently ask those things that are not good for us. But he could not give Alcibiades such directions about this matter as Agur here gives Ithiel and the rest of his scholars, whom he informs, that the true knowledge of God is the chiefest good, and therefore to be desired in the first place above all other goods; and then (according to our Saviour's rule, in afterwards), having first sought the things that belong to religion, he directs them to beg of God moderate desires of all earthly things; believing that we are safer in a mediocrity, or middle estate, than either in fulness or in want. To which purpose Melancthon, and others have gathered together many sayings out of other writers.

But none have given such reasons for this choice of a middle state as this wise man (ver. 9.)

[f] After which, he seems to answer a question, which Ithiel propounded, about moral virtue: which having been largely treated of by Solomon, he only gives him one caution against hard-heartedness to slaves and servants (ver. 10), of which the Hebrew nation were generally very guilty, and thereby unmindful for that favour which they begged of God in their prayers, which ought to have disposed them to be favourable unto others.

[g] And then he gives the character of four sorts of men who are execrable unto God, and therefore ought to be avoided by all those that would be good (ver. 11—14), which I must pass by without any further account of them but what I have given in the paraphrase: because the fifteenth verse hath much difficulty in it, and therefore requires some time to be spent in opening it. Boezaire thinks to solve some of the difficulty by giving a new significance of the word aluka. But all interpreters, in a manner, taking it for that thick worm in watery places, which we call a horse-leech, I do not think fit to forsake our translation: nor to refer the beginning of the verse to that immediately fore-who hath established all the ends of the earth? what is his name and what is his son's name, if thou canst tell?

5 Every word of God is pure: he is a shield unto them that put their trust in him.

6 Add thou not unto his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar.
7 Two things have I required of thee; deny me them not before I die:
8 Remove far from me vanity and lies; give them more detestable, their carcases, perhaps, were thrown into some loathsomely, called the valley of carcases, or dead bodies (Jer. xxxi. 40), and the valley of crores (as Bochartus conjectures), or ravens: whom the wise man here speaks of. And besides this, they who abuse their parents, being of a village sort, were likely to be accused of roguery, and to commit robberies, murders, treasons, or such-like horrid crimes: which would bring them to the gallowys (as we speak), or some such infamous death. The Jews, indeed, might not suffer the body of one that was hanged, after he had been put to death, to remain upon a gibbet, beyond the evening of that day wherein he was executed. But they were not forbidden to let him lie unburied, in some polluted place, when he was taken down: and in some cases we find, they did let dead bodies hang a long time, as we read 2 Sam. xxii. And therefore Pau- lus Fagius (upon Exod. xx. 12), expounds these words of Agur after this manner: "Disobedient children shall come to be transmuted into ravens, and their days by a halter, or other punishment; and so become crow's meat." But there is no necessity of this explication. For we may conceive such a wicked person to be drowned by the just judgment of God upon him; and his body to lie floating on the water; or to be cast on shore, where the ravens (who frequent these waters) come and pick out his eyes, at which they are observed to fly, sooner than any other part. He might perish also in other countries, where the infamous punishment of the gibbet was in use: or be slain in battle; and left there to be a prey to beasts and birds. Among which the raven is the rather mentioned, because the young ones are so insipious (as Vossiuss speaks, lib. iii. De Idol. cap. 85), as to fall upon the old ones, and kill them, when they are hungry (which is affirmed by Aelian and others), and therefore more fitly employed to pick out the eyes of unchildish children. But I look upon this as having more of fancy than solidity in it: since the ravens (who frequent these waters) come and pick out the eagles here named, because they are a bird full of piety; as hath been observed out of Aben Ezra, by our learned Dr. Castell, who discourses in his speech (in Schol. Theod. p. 31), I shall here set down for the explication of one word in this verse; wherein he differs from all others, which is πρεπον. This word the Hebrews interpret "doctrina," and understand the verse thus: "The eye that despiseth the doctrine or the lesson of his mother," &c. But there is no known root in their language from whence to derive this signification of it: and therefore that doctor, out of the neighbouring languages, translates it rather "senium," "old age," which is most agreeable to the sense of the place. For that which is despised by the eye is some corporal defect (as crookedness, wrinkles, shaking of the head, &c. and such-like things which attend old age), not any thing belonging to the mind. And besides (saith he) it better agrees with what follows of the eagle's young ones playing out such things that they are observed to bear a regard to their ancients, and to have a kind of piety in them.

[3] In the next words (ver. 18—20), he resolves another riddle they put to him, which was this: "What things, me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me:

9 Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.

though ordinary and common" of which I have given the best explication I could in the paraphrase; but can not further explain here, without making this preface (which must necessarily be longer than ordinary, unless I should give no account of several things in the following verses which require explication) a great deal too much exceed the proportion which belongs to it.

[k] Next to these four inscrutable things, he subjoins four more, which are very grievous, or rather intolerable, because of their great indignity (ver. 21—23), the first two belong to men, and the disturbance of the commonwealth; the last two to women, and the disturbance of private families. And there are reasons peculiar to each: ex. gr. a slave is intolerable when he gets the sceptre into his hand (as they have done sometimes), partly because such persons, being ill-bred, generally have base principles, and are accustomed to vile things; and grow insolent by their good fortune: partly because they are full of fears and suspicions, especially that they are despised and contempted; and, therefore, believing they are not loved, they will be feared, and care not what enormities they exercise to their own ends. Partly also, the Jews object to themselves in Schebet Judah; where they bring in a philosopher laying this to their charge. That they, affecting dominion in the city of Toledo, proceeded to such boldness and sauciness, that they would openly strike Christians, which fulfilled, saith he, that of Solomon, xxx. 22.

[l] The like might be said of the other three; but I shall only observe concerning the last, that there being another way of explaining it, besides that which is most obvious, I have not omitted it; because the LXX go that way, who thus render it, "When a servant-maid casts her mistress out of doors." And there is a third way, which I have not mentioned, which is to subject it to the words; when the mistress is not expelled, but the maid also is taken to wife and preferred in the husband's love: as N. De Lyra takes it: examples of which we have in history, that have proved very fatal to families. But this preface, as I said, would be too long if I should name them; therefore I pass to the next.

[m] Which seems to be an answer to this question, Quid est magnnum in minimo? "What is great in little? or rather in the least?" ver. 24, &c., where he teaches us several things: first, not to admire merely bodily bulk, strength, or beauty; but rather wisdom, diligence, and sagacity, to understand and pursue our own interest; secondly, to admire the wisdom and power of God in the smallest things; and, thirdly (as Melancthon adds), to reflect upon our own degenerate state, which neglect our own greatest good; may, mind not self-preservation, but rather destroy ourselves by vice and wickedness; and, lastly, not to refuse admonition from the brutes. Among which, saith he, the ants teach us industry and forecast; the rabbits not to attempt any thing above our strength; the locusts, to preserve society by industry, and not to break it by sedition and disturbance of the public order; and the spider, to endeavour to excel in some art or other. All of these teach us not to rely merely on strength, but to use counsel and prudence.

The first and second of which reflections I find in St. Chrysostom, who discourses admirable (Hom. xii. ad Pop. Antich. p. 139) of the wonderfulness of the divine artifice, which in so small a body as that of the ant hath contrived such a perpetual desire of labour. To which, if we attend, we cannot but receive this instruction, μη χαράγματα λιτωτά, μηδὲ φιλέων ἄδητα καὶ κρύσος, "not to affect softness and delicacy, nor fly from sweat and labors." And when the wise man sends us, saith he, to learn of these little creatures, he does just as we are wont to do in families; when the greater and the better sort have offended in any thing, we endeavour to shun them by pointing to the little children, saying, Πάλιτι τῶν μικρῶν σου, πάντα ἐστὶ σπουδαῖος καὶ διάγγειος. "Behold, one that is a great deal less than thou, how attentive and ready he is to do as he is bidden."

[n] But that word which we translate conies, ver. 26, (which are small and call a small creature, than here speaking of, or make their holes in rocks) Bochardus hath evidently proved signifies a mouse in those countries (whose hinder legs are longer than their fore legs), called by the Arabians in their language aljarbuo; whose craft I have briefly expressed in the paraphrase.

[o] In what the locusts also, ver. 27, I have followed him: who observes, that to go forth, is a scripture phrase for making war. In which the general was wont to divide the prey among the soldiers, after a victory: but the locusts, having no settled constant commander, divide among themselves. Yet I have not neglected our translation.

[p] Which in the twenty-eighth verse hath forsaken the ancient interpreters, who take semenith not for a spider, but for a small sort of lizard, from its spots called stellio: which is accounted by all authors a very crafty creature: and to which the characters here given by Solomon do most properly belong. Some Bochardus hath shewn them at large, lib. iv, cap. 7. De Suer. Animal, par. 1. But if any have a list to understand hereby some sort of spider, they may read Coelins Secundus's little book called Aresius: in which he represents the wonderful wisdom of God, in the structure of this small creature; together with its admirable agility and cunning; both in weaving its webs and nets, and in hunting for its prey (particularly for young lizards), and in preserving itself; and its foreseance of dangers, and of opportunities to catch its prey: for instance, against rainy weather; when other little creatures grow dull in their motion and in their sight. In short, he observes, that as there is nothing in appearance so mean, so abject, so small, in which the Creator of all is not to be adored, and whose usefulness is not very great; so there are five things which are admirable in that sort of spider, which he describes: the exhausted matter which it spins out of so small a body; the wisdom of its contrivances; strength in fighting; knowledge of the future; and usefulness for medicine.

[pp] And from all these four, some have noted, that an abridgment may be made of all that is necessary for the conversation of a kingdom in good estate; where, first, care must be taken for provision of food, which we learn from the pismire; then for secure and commodious dwelling, which we learn from the second sort of creature; and then that there be concord and agreement among domestics and citizens, which we learn from the third; and, lastly, that labour, industry, and ingenious arts be encouraged and advanced, which we learn from the fourth.

After the consideration of these four little creatures, of small strength and contemptible aspect, he places four others which are great, stately, and undaunted (ver. 29, &c.) In which there are two considerable difficulties; one about that word in verse 31, which we translate a greyhound (the Vulgar a cock; though Maldonate ingeniously conjectures the true reading in St. Jerome was galliens canis, which afterward came to be corrupted into galleus), but I take rather for a horse (as our margin hath it), being a far braver and more stately creature than either of those; especially when he prances, and is managed by a rider.

The other is about the last words of the same verse: which are the character he gives of a king (who perhaps is immediately placed after the ke-gout, because that character is in scripture an emblem of majesty. Dan. viii. 5, 21: Isa. xiv. 9: Jer. 1. 8, &c.) Alkum immò, which Bochartus translates, "against whom none of his subjects ought to rise." For though many do, yet it is so contrary to their duty, and so dangerous, that he therefore calls him, "Alkum, against whom none arises." So Pallas was called by the Phoenicians, Ela Alkum, the goddess against whom none made "insurrection." And the city in Beotia that was sacred to her (she being reputed to be born there) was called Alabomensis; for though it was small and built in a plain, yet it always remained unassailed and inviolate, because out of reverence to the goddesse, none in speech, nor in writing, "all men abstained from all force and violence to it." Thus he discourses in his Epist. que Resp. ad tres Quest. p. 43. And I find he had said it before in his Pialeg, second part. lib. i. cap. 16, where he translates melae alex, reum inuitus, "an invincible king."

But there is another conjecture of a very learned man of our own, Mr. Peacock (Not. ad Greg. Abul. fart. p. 263), which is so pat, that I could not omit it in my paraphrase. For, according to the Arabic use of the word alkum (out of which language both rabbins and Christians take the liberty to expand the Hebrew words of the Bible, when they are singular), the sense is still more pregnant, and sounds thus: "A king with whom his people is," or, "whom his people follow." For as, when there is such a happy agreement between king and people, there is nothing more comely; so then he appears with the greatest and most awful majesty, and strikes terror into all his enemies.

The last two verses, if we take them severed from the foregoing, are an advice how to be happy: which the whole chapter shows in effect is, to endeavour to be innocent. But because no man can be so wise as never to do a foolish thing; he seems, in conclusion, to tell what is next to that, viz. when we have miscarried any way, not to justify it, but to apprise those whom we have offended, by silence, taking shame to ourselves, and not defending what we have done amiss, much less making complaints of others, &c. For (as I have expressed it in the paraphrase, verse last) by insisting upon our innocence, or charging others, or exagerrated faults, very great mischief may ensue. But these two verses may be connected with that which precedes (though I have not been bold to do it, because interpreters go the other way); and verse 32 may be an advice to subjects. If they have offended their prince any way, and been so foolish as to oppose him, not to persist in their error; much less to defend it, and clamour upon the government, &c. but sit down in silence, bewailing the guilt, and imploring a pardon. And then verse 33 may be looked upon as advice to princes, not to oppress their subjects; and thereby provoke them to rebel against them.

The Vulgar Latin seems to refer both to princes: for though in verse 32, according to that translation (which I cannot indeed reconcile well with the Hebrew), "It sometimes happens, that he who is advanced on high (to a throne suppose) appears to be a fool: who if he had understood (viz. his danger, or his folly, or what had been best for him) would have put his hand upon his mouth;" so the very desired is an advice which, perhaps, he earnestly sought. And though I know not how to justify this translation, it agrees well with what follows, which may well be applied unto princes, that "it is great folly to strain things too far." Either the laves, which if extended to the utmost rigour will, by such hard construction, necessitate seditions, and overturn public and human societies; or their taxes and exactions beyond what the people can bear. For by squeezing them too much, most dangerous seditions and rebellions have happened under excellent princes.

And thus Melanchthon understands the beginning of this verse (ver. 33), that empires and governments ought to be wise; and accordingly, in his excellent sayings of Plato and Solon; which he alleges; and then concludes that anger also ought to be repressed (according to the admonition in the last words), lest public discords arise which draw after them vast ruins: and oftentimes arise from light causes; which ought to have been mollified and cured by some moderation, and not exasperated into a flame. Ver. 1.] Here now follow some memorable sayings of Agur, who was the son of Jaché; out of whose works these weighty sentences were collected, which he uttered like a prophetic teacher to Ithiel, one of his most eminent scholars, and to Ucal, another of them, but especially to the former. See Arg. [a] [b].

Ver. 2.] Who admiring his wisdom, and desiring to be resolved in many difficulties, Agur modestly and humbly said, Do not call me wise: for I am so far from that acuteness which is natural to him who excels in wisdom, that I am simple, in comparison with such a person; nay, I cannot arrogate to myself the understanding of a common man. See Arg. [b] [c].

Ver. 3.] And as for improvements, which are made by the help of knowing persons, I have not had the advantages of many othermen: for I was never brought into the council of the prophets; neither have I learned some wisdom, much less have I received the knowledge of such sacred mysteries as thou inquiring 14 There is a generation, whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw teeth as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy from among men.

15 The horse-leach hath two daughters, crying, Give, give. There are three things that are never satisfied, yea, four things say not, It is enough:

after; the most I can pretend unto is, only to know what belongs to a pious life. See Arg. [d].

Ver. 4.] But had I a greater reach, or been better bred, it would have been impossible for me to give an account of the works of God; much less of God himself. For where is he among all the wise men that ever went up into heaven, and came down again to tell as the order and motion of the stars; and all the rest that is done there? Nay, who is it, that can so much as give us the least account of the wind, but God alone? who hath it perfectly in his power to make it cease and blow again as he pleaseth. And to come lower yet, who but he hath tied up the waves of the sea, that they should not exceed their bounds? Or, who hath fixed the earth (on which thou dostwaist, and art chiefly acquainted with) within such limits, as it never breaks? By what name is he called that can explain these things? or, if thou knowest, tell me the name of his son, or of his family; that, if he be dead, we may inquire of them.

Ver. 5.] The most that any man can do for thy satisfaction, is this; to send thee to the book of God, and bid thee search the contents with what he hath there revealed of himself, and of his will; which in every part of it is so sincere, and free from all mixture of deceit, that thou mayest safely rely upon it; and take his word, that he will protect and defend all those who, in obedience to his commands, trust him for what he hath promised.

Ver. 6.] The first is for my mind; that I may be perfectly secured from being deceived myself by false opinions, especially concerning thee and religion; and from being any ways guilty of deceiving other men: and then, for the supply of my bodily necessities, I desire thou wouldest neither give me scarcity nor sufficiency; but, if I may choose, a middling portion; and that, as I am disposed, in a befitting manner, to give thanks for. I am, indeed, sensible that God, in so giving, not only affords me an experiment of his goodness, but a most acceptable allowance as may be sufficient to maintain me decently, in that state and condition of life wherein thou hast placed me. See Arg. [e].

Ver. 7.] For I am sensible how great danger there is, either in having abundance of wealth, which may tempt me to be so profane and irreligious, as not only to forget the donor of all good things, but atheistically to condemn the works of his hand. Nor am I not indeed sensible, nor do I, inwardly confess, that I know no such thing as the Lord, nor have anything to do with him: or in a beggarly condition, which may press me, first to be injurious unto others for my own relief; and then to run into the fearful crime of perjury, to purge myself from the charge of theft (Exod. xxiii. 8, 11).

16 The grave; and the barren womb; the earth that is not filled with water; and the fire, that said not, It is enough.

17 The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it.

Ver. 10.] As for rules of behaviour towards others, they are generally well known; and therefore I only admonish thee to avoid one thing (to which our nation is too prone); that is, not to abuse any poor slave, whose condition is wretched enough; and therefore, for instance, rather excuse than aggravate his fault to his master, who perhaps is too rigorous: and be sure never to load him with unjust accusations, lest, being wronged by thee, and not knowing how to right himself, he appeal to the Lord, and pray him to punish thee; and thou, being found guilty, feel the heavy effects of his vengeance. See Arg. [f].

Ver. 11.] And now, to answer your inquiry, What company you should keep? there are four sorts of men, I would have you set a mark upon, and cautiously shun. First, those that are too familiar with them from whom they have received many benefits: for such a sort of men there is, who have no sense of obligations, no, not to their parents, to whom they have the greatest; but raise upon their father, nay, wish him dead; and cannot speak a good word of their mother.

Ver. 12.] Next to these are a sort of hypocrites; who have a great opinion of their own purity, and would be thought by others very virtuous: but hide the greatest filthiness, both in their minds and lives (which either they do not see, or will not take care to purge away), under this outward garb of holiness.

Ver. 13.] There is a third sort, whose pride and arrogance is so lofty, that it appears in their very countenance; and makes them superciliously overlook all other men, as if they were not worthy of the least respect from them.

Ver. 14.] But the fourth and last sort is most mischievous, whose ravenous cruelty hath no example; unless you can conceive a lion or a wolf that hath teeth, both small and great, as sharp as swords or knives, coming with open mouth to devour every creature that is weaker than themselves: such is the savage oppression of tyrants, extortioners, calumniators, &c. who have no mercy upon the poor and needy; but make their condition (which moves compassion in other men) so insufferable, that they are weary of living any longer in the world.

Ver. 15.] And here I will satisfy one of your other questions, What creature is most insatiable? I answer, the horse-leech; which sucks the blood of other creatures till it bursts: as those wicked men do the livelihood of the poor, till they ruin themselves. And in this perpetuity of hunger and more hunger, without any end, there are two things so like the horse-leech, that they may be called her daughters: nay, there are three that are never satisfied; or rather four, whose desires cannot be filled. See Arg. [g].

Ver. 16.] They are these: death, or the grave; which having consumed so many past generations, will as greedily swallow up and consume all that are yet to come; the barren womb; which is wont to be desirous of children beyond measure: the earth, which drinks up all the rain that falls upon it, and still thirsts for more: and the fire, which devours all the fuel that is thrown into it, and never ceases to burn, as long as there is anything to feed it.

Ver. 17.] I will not end this, till I have pronounced 18 There be three things which are too wonderful for me, yea, four which I know not; 19 The way of an eagle in the air; the way of a serpent upon a rock; the way of a ship in the midst of the sea; and the way of a man with a maid. 20 Such is the way of an adulterous woman; she singeth, and wipeth her mouth, and saith, I have done no wickedness. 21 For three things the earth is disquieted, and for four which it cannot bear: 22 For a servant when he reigneth; and a fool when he is filled with meat; 23 For an odious woman when she is married; and an handmaid that is heir to her mistress. 24 There be four things which are little upon the earth, but they are exceeding wise:

the doom of the first sort of wicked men, now mentioned (ver. 11), who are so ungrateful to their parents, as not only to disobey their commands, but to scorn, nay, and deride their persons; and mock at the infirmities of their old age: whose villanies shall bring them to an infamous end, and expose their Deborah bodies for a prey to the ravens (which frequent the brooks that run in the valleys) and to the young eagles; who shall pick out those eyes, in which their scorn and derision of their parents were wont to appear. See Arg. [t.

Ver. 18.] To your next question, my answer is, that there are three things, whose motions are beyond my reach: may a fourth, which is the most unaccountable of all the rest. See Arg. [r.

Ver. 19.] First, the wonderful swiftness of an eagle's flight into the air, quite out of our sight (xxiii. 5); secondly, the manner of a serpent's speedy creeping; without any feet, to the top of a slippery rock: thirdly, the way that a ship makes in the sea, though it seems sometimes to sink to the bottom of the water, and to mount up into the air: but above all, the slipperiness of youth (which is more inconstant than the air, &c.), and especially the impatience and restless tossing of a young man's mind, his cunning and slyness when he goes a wooing; and the wonderful secret of the heavens to his heart to slide into the heart of a maid; and win her love.

Ver. 20.] And yet the subtlety of an adulterous woman is equal to this; both in crafty contrivances of secret ways to enjoy her filthy pleasures, and in casting a mist before her husband's eyes to conceal them, when she is in danger to be discovered. For having defiled his bed, she not only looks modestly and demurely, but professes the greatest innocency; and behaves herself as if she were the honestest woman, and the kindest wife too, in the world; like one that having eaten some forbidden meat, wipes her mouth, and says, she has not so much as tasted it; but abhors to let it come within her lips.

Ver. 21.] And to satisfy your other question, What things are most intolerable? my answer is, that three things make such a disturbance, that men groan under the load of them: nay, there are four, which are an insupportable grievance unto those that are oppressed by them. See Arg. [k.

Ver. 22.] First, the insolent cruelty of a vile slave, when he is advanced to a throne: secondly, the potently arrogate fools; especially when he grows debauched, and is in one of his drunken fits: Ver. 23.] And, thirdly, a woman, whose moroseness, pride, and passion, and such-like ill qualities, make her hated by every body, when she gets a husband: and, lastly, a poor maid-servant, when she is puffed up by an estate, left her by her mistress; or, which is worse, that having supplanted her mistress, and thrust her, first out of her husband's affections, and then out of doors, succeeds in her place, and becomes his wife. See Arg. [l.

Ver. 24.] To these four intolerable things, of all which complain, I will add four more, that are very contemptible, but much admired; for though they have no bodily bulk, their wisdom is exceeding great, and very elaborate. See Arg. [n] [pp.

Ver. 25.] First, the ants: who are a creature so inoffensive, that one crush of our foot kills multitudes of them, and yet so provident, as well as industrious, that they prepare granaries under ground, with wonderful art, to receive their food: which they gather and lay up in harvest-time; and secure it too, that it may serve for all the year (see vi. 8).

Ver. 26.] Secondly, the mountain mice are a feeble sort of creatures also; but they have a leader to give them notice of any danger; and are so cunning, that they provide for their safety in high rocks: into which they have several entrances and outlets; that if they be assaulted in one port, they may escape at another. See Arg. [a.

Ver. 27.] Next, the locusts, which herein indeed differ from the former, that they have no king to govern them: yet go forth like soldiers to battle, in good order; and when they fall upon the spoil, divide it among themselves without any quarrel or contention. See Arg. [o.

Ver. 28.] Lastly (the spider, which weaves a curious web, or rather) the little spotted lizard, which takes fast hold even on the flat ceiling of houses; and there goes (with its body hanging down into the air) in pursuit of its prey: which as it nimblly catches, so it introduces itself to hunt for it even in kings' palaces. See Arg. [p.

Ver. 29.] And here, after the consideration of these four contemptible things, it will be fit to answer your last question, What things are most stately? and there are three, or rather four things, whose motion is majestic, and go after a goodly manner.

Ver. 30.] First the lion, when he is come to his full growth; who is the most heroic and undaunted of all creatures; never turning his back for fear of the greatest multitude of hunters, or dogs, that set upon him.

Ver. 31.] Next to him a strong and generous horse: especially when he is girt and equipped (as we speak) for the battle; and then the ke-goat, with his long
CHAPTER XXXI.

33 Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter, and the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood; so the forcing of wrath bringeth forth strife.

34 For from little things there is an easy progress unto greater. And just as you see milk is first pressed out of the cow's udder, and then being shaken in the churn is forced into butter; and as the noise being wrong, though at first it only purges itself, yet if it be pressed harder, there comes out blood: even so words, passing to and fro in a heart, and that, if continued, stirs up anger; and that, making men vehemently insist upon their opinion, or their desire, turns into scolding; and that, in the issue, grows up to quarrels, and irreconcilable enmities.

CHAPTER XXXI.

1 The words of king Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him.

CHAP. XXXI.

ARGUMENT.—[a] It is generally taken for granted, both by Hebrew and Christian writers, that king Lemuel, whose mother gave him the precepts contained in this chapter, was Solomon; whom Bath-sheba took early care to instruct in his duty, being, as some of no small name fancy, divinely inspired with the gift of prophecy. But, as all this depends merely upon conjecture, and that without the least ground, so there is no good reason assigned why Solomon should here be called Lemuel; and not by the name he hath both in the beginning of the preface to this book (Prov. i. 1), and in the entrance of the first part (x. 1), and of the last collection also (xxv. 1), made by the men of Hezekiah: whom Grotius fancies to be the king here mentioned, under the name of Lemuel; only for this reason, that this chapter follows the collection of proverbs made by his servants: which hath no force at all in it: for the words of Agur follow more immediately, which he cannot ascribe to Hezekiah, and therefore it is more reasonable to conceive this Lemuel to have been a prince in some other country; who had gathered some weighty sentences taught him by his mother (whose name is unknown), which it was thought fit to adjourn to the foregoing; because they are very wise, and of great moment; as if they proceeded from a prophetical spirit. And it is only the vanity of the Jewish nation, who would enclose all wisdom within the bounds of their own country, which hath made them ascribe that which follows in this chapter to Solomon and Bath-sheba. For which, as I said, there is no shadow; but it appears by the history of the queen of Sheba, and the embassies which came from the kings thereof, who sent to hear the wisdom of Solomon (1 Kings iv. ult.), that there were even in those times great persons very inquisitive after knowledge, as there had been, in the times foregoing, in those eastern countries, and in Egypt; which was famous for wise men. 1 Kings iv. 30, where we read of the "wisdom of the children of the east" (i.e. Arabia, where Job, a considerable prince, and the rest of his friends, lived in former ages), and the wisdom of Egypt. Of which country some have thought those famous men to have been; who are mentioned in the next words (ver. 31), where this demonstration is given that Solomon's wisdom excelled all the wisdom of those countries; "for he was wiser than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda," &c. upon which words Gaspier Sanchez notes, That the Seder Olam says, "These were Egyptian wise men." But it is not good to take things upon trust; for I find upon examination of the place (which is in ch. 30 of the greater book of that name) that it saith no such thing, but only this, that "the sons of Zara, Zimri, Ethan, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda (mentioned 1 Chron. ii. 6), were prophets, who prophesied in Egypt." But however this be, that very book acknowledges in the next chapter, that there were prophets in other countries before the law of Moses was given: though after the delivery of it, the Holy Spirit, they fancy, forsaketh all the world but them; immediately upon the speaking of those words. Exod. xxxiii. 16: xxxiv. 6. For which assertion, as there is not the least shadow of reason, so, supposing it were true, it must notwithstanding be confessed that there remained still among others many, even among wise persons both men and women: who had such communication also with the Jews, that many of them were proselyted to their religion: which might have counterneed their authors if they had said (and it seems to me a better fancy than any they have) that Lemuel's mother was a Jewish lady, married to some prince of another country, by whom she had this son; and took care of his institution in the wisdom of her people.

And by the use of the word bar three times for a son, in the beginning of this instruction (which is nowhere used in this book before, nor in the whole Bible more than once, Ps. ii. 12), one would guess this Lemuel to have been some person in Chaldea. For in the next verse also (ver. 4), we meet with the word melachin (kings), according to the termination in the language of that country.

[6] But this is all uncertain, and therefore I proceed no farther in it: but only note, that whatsoever was the mother of Lemuel, she was mightily solicitous to have him do well: as appears by verse 2. Which some think to be a passionate expression, when she saw him begin to incline to evil courses; as if she had said, "What dost thou mean, my son," &c. But it is more likely that it proceeded from a tender concern for his well-being, as soon as ever he grew up; whilst he was yet innocent and untainted.

2 What, my son? and what, the son of my womb? and what, the son of my vows?
PROVERBS.

3 Give not thy strength unto women, nor thy ways to that which destroyeth kings.

And that he might so continue, she gives him three, or rather four, of the most proper advices that could be thought of for a prince.

[c] First, to subdue that lust which she knew to be very violent in youth; especially in young kings: who have more provocations, and are apt to take more license, than other men; but bring thereby such mischiefs upon themselves and their kingdoms, as are not to be repaired; but often end in their destruction: (ver. 4).

[d] In order to this, she admonishes him, in the second place, to avoid drunkenness; and to preserve himself perfectly sober; whereby he would be fit also for counsel; and be able likewise to give a right judgment when causes are brought before him (ver. 1), which some extend so far, as to think she would not have him drink any wine at all, or other strong liquors (of which there were several made of honey, or dates, and divers other things; which go under the name of siecehar). But it is more reasonable to look upon it, to caution against excess: which is dangerous in all men, but especially in those that are to govern others as well as themselves. Then they hurt out the greatest secrets, as the Vulgar translates the latter part of the verse; or grow furious and outrageous, as the LXX. translate the same passage: but both of them without any ground that I can see in the Hebrew text.

[e] In which follows (ver. 5), the true reason of this prohibition is, that the strength and health of the princely person, to whom a larger quantity than ordinary of wine or strong drink, is fit to be allowed. Not to kings, who have innumerable ways to relieve their cares, and to divert themselves, when any thing troubles them: but to poor miserable people, that are ready to faint under their heavy burdens and oppressions. For whom this is a present relief; and the only one sometimes they are capable of; when they are in a very melancholy condition. And they that are of such a temper, or are otherways made exceeding sad, can better bear a great deal of wine, without any disorder, than the sanguine, and they that are gay and merry. "There are two things," says Huetius, "of which a rascal hath understood such as were condemned to die, and going to execution. Unto whom it was the custom to give a draught of wine, to support their spirits; and in the degenerate ages of the Jewish commonwealth, they put something into it to intoxicate the poor wretches, so that they might be insensible of pain. And some imagine this custom took its original from this place in the Proverbs; though it be not the true sense of the words. For the latter part of this verse, and that which follows (ver. 7), give the best explication of the first: and they show she speaks of those that were miserably poor. And so the best Hebrew expositors interpret those words, Deut. xxvi. 5, "My father was a Syrian, ready to perish:" that is, extremely poor; and in want of all things.

[f] And thus having enlarged this second advice a little, she passes to the third: which is (ver. 8), to take such care that justice be exactly administered (without which no kingdom can subsist), as himself and the whole body of those that were in danger to lose a good cause for want of an advocate to plead for them, or to open the true state of it, &c. Especially, she commends to him the patronage of strangers, orphans, and poor indigent people. The first of which, in the Hebrew, are called "children of change;" or that are passed by: that is, persons who have changed their country; or, that are in danger to suffer grievous losses in their condition, if right be not done them; or, who are deserted by all, and have none to stand by them. Several other ways there are to explain the phrase; but to the same purpose.

[g] But the great care of parents being to see their son well married, she concludes with the description of a pruient wife: and the whole book of which takes up the rest of the chapter, from verse 10 to the end. And it is in the form of a poem (as St. Jerome takes it), consisting of a sort of iambic verses; each of which begins with a new letter of the alphabet in order; the tenth with aleph, the eleventh with beth, and so to the bottom. Which was an elegant sort of compasse among the ancients, and a help to memory also: as we see in several Psalms, and other parts of scripture.

Now whether she composed these verses herself, or got her sense expressed by some eminent poet, cannot be known: nor is it material. But I do not think fit to follow the conjecture of Huetius (in his last work) that they are probably taken from some words in the head of it, as there are in ch. xxxv., and the beginning of this chapter, to denote it to belong to another author, I take it to be of the same piece with the first nine verses. That is, to be a copy of verses, delivered to Lemuel by his mother, in commendation of an excellent woman: which, perhaps, she did not make herself (though there be no proof of that, and both Deborah and Hannah we find were poets), but, notwithstanding, being recommended to him by her, would, she thought, have the same authority with him, as if she had been the author. And it is very observable, that the general character of such a woman as she would have "able men," and "extends this to vir- tus and virtue," we translate it. Which word chastit, signifies both strength (or rather valour and courage) and riches and virtue. And, in the description of fitting persons for the magistracy, Jethro, in general, saith, they should be anscheh chastit (Exod. xviii. 21), which we translate "able men:" and then follows more particularly wherein their ability should consist, "such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness." I take, therefore, escheth chastit to include in it a great fear of God, (mentioned afterward ver. 30), which is so powerful, as to endure one with courage to do well, when piety is contemned; nay, laughed at and abused: I have not therefore omitted this among other words, to express the force of this phrase.

[8] And then follow, after this, abundance of other good qualities, which are included in this: such as chastity; and such a care of her husband's estate that he might have a perfect confidence in her management; love to him without moroseness; diligence in her service; and a great detestation of idleness. She is very careful to inculcate the government of her family; a prudent care in the education of her children; and in settling all the family to some employment or other: and increasing also her husband's estate, and yet giving liberally to the poor; affability and courtesy to all.
5 Lest they drink, and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted.

&c. Which excellent endowments if her son found in a wife, she knew it would be a certain means to preserve him from following other women (ver. 3), which he took perfect delight in her company: and from drunkenness also (ver. 1) which few fall into who entirely love their wives, and study to please them in all things; for they generally abhor this loathsome vice. In order to this, she would have him marry such a one as he could perfectly confide in, and never in the least suspect of any levity, or unbecomingness, when he was abroad (ver. 11), and would never be cross to him; but always loving, and kind, and pleasing, when he was at home (ver. 12).

[7] An excellent housewife also; prone to take any pains herself, that she might give a good example to others: particularly in the linen and woollen manufactures, in which the greatest women it appears by ancient authors, constantly employed themselves heretofore, with such diligence, as is highly praised in their books, ver. 13, where, to express her propensity to this work he ascribes a willingness and forwardness to her hands: just as, Prov. xvi. 25, he makes the hands of the sluggard to be heavy to labour.

[8] Which turns to a great account. she shows, both in foreign commodities (ver. 11) and in the purchase of land, (ver. 16) which the good housewife herself views, and walks about with great expedition (ver. 17) tucking up her garments (as we speak) that she may be fit for motion every where; and not standing fine clothes more than her business, nor, for fear of spoiling them, neglecting that; but preferring strength in her arms, acquired by labour, before the ornaments wherewith they are wont to be adorned.

[9] The profit of which she finds is so great, that it makes her love labour better than sleep; and when there is haste of work, to continue it all night; so that 18 may be expended.

After which follows (ver. 19) another instance of humble greatness. Then her charity to the poor (ver. 20), her care of her own family (ver. 21), where the last word having different senses, I have expressed them all in the paraphrase.

[10] And then is wisely mentioned (ver. 29) her magnifier, in ascribing the adornment of her husband, and in her own apparel; which was the more allowable when the poor were not neglected; and the decking herself and house did not make her forget their necessities. The particular words there, I have not room to explain. Nor those which follow, ver. 23 (after she had mentioned the honour her husband would get by such a wife, ver. 24), for I think it is needful to give a brief account of ver. 35.

[11] Which seems not unfitly translated by Castalio to this sense: "that she being thus amply provided, and fortified, as it were, against all accidents; need not fear any want in future times." But considering what follows (ver. 26, 27), I have chosen only to touch on the sense; and to add, and honour for the excellent qualities belonging to her: which I have called her principal ornaments; because the Hebrews are wont to express that which adorns any person, and is most proper to them, by the name of clothing; as Ps. cxxii. 9, "Thy priests shall be clothed with righteousness."

[12] The rest I must wholly omit, and only observe, that "the fear of the Lord," in the conclusion (ver. 30), is the foundation of all these virtues (which will either not be found, where there is no devout sense of God; or not be constant and equal, but only partial and of short duration in the spirits), especially when it is in such a high degree, that a woman values herself "for fear of the Lord," more than any thing else. So the LXX. translate it: "A prudent woman is commended; but she praises the fear of the Lord:" which may have this sense also, that her virtues commend religion. 2 Macc. ii. 30, is by her excellent virtues: which are so exemplary, that they make others in love with them, as well as with her.

I conclude all with the observation of Melanthon, that this description, which he calls "Speculum honeste matronae," is altogether simple and plain, without any such allegories as Simonides used, who says, "he was happy that married a wife like a her:" and that all this, in a manner, is comprehended by the apostle in these words, 1 Tim. ii. 511. She shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith, and charity, and holiness, with sobriety. Faith, truth he, is the acknowledgment of the true God, and confidence in his son Jesus Christ (that is, belief in the whole gospel). out of which springs the love of God, and from thence the love of her husband and children: and then holiness or sanctification, which is that virtue we call chastity; and lastly, temperance, as he translates it, moderation in meat and drink: or rather, all manner of sober behaviour, and prudence, in the government of the family, and in moderate expense of all her things. Which things the apostle particularly mentions; because, in the enumeration of virtues, it is the manner of the holy writers to name those only, which are most proper and suitable to every one's state and vocation.

Ver. 1.] Unto these sayings of Agur, let these of king Lemuel be added and considered; which are weighty sentences also (xxx. 1), which his mother taught him with such authority, as if she had been a prophetess. See Arg. [a].

Ver. 2.] And with no less tenderness and affection also, saying, Hearken, my dear son, for whose will-doing, oh, how much do I desire thee to express the care I have about it: I am at a loss how to instruct thee according to my wishes: what shall I desire thee to do for my sake, who endured so much for thee: when I carried thee in my womb, and brought thee forth from thence! what shall I pray thee to do! for whom I have made so many prayers to God; and rows too, if I might but see thee be safe into the world, and grow to be a man, and sit upon a throne. See Arg. [b].

Ver. 3.] In the first place let me prevail with thee, as thou lovest me, and as thou lovest thyself, to be chaste in thy desires of bodily pleasures, and not to give up thyself to follow thy lust after women; which will destroy the strength of thy body, weaken thy mind, and exhaust thy treasures; that is, engage thee in such courses as are the bane of kings; and by making them neglect their government, have brought many of them and their kingdoms to utter ruin. See Arg. [c].

Ver. 4.] And next to this, O Lemuel, kings, of all other men,—kings, I say, should be sparing, very sparing in the use of wine, and of all other intoxicating drink: and so should their counsellors, and command-

PROVERBS.

14 She is like the merchants' ships; she bringeth her food from afar.
15 She riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens.
16 She considereth a field, and buyeth it; with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard.
17 She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms.
18 She perceiveth that her merchandise is good; her candle goeth not out by night.
19 She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff.

(Which may serve to direct others, as well as thee, in the choice of such a person), in whose charity, as well as prudence, frugality, and fidelity, in ordering affairs at home, her husband hath such a confidence, that he may go abroad, and attend the public affairs, without the least care or solicitude what will become of his domestic concerns: and not be tempted to enrich himself, or supply his own necessities, with the expenses of other men. See Arg. [k].

Ver. 12.] She will not only endeavour to answer his love with an equal affection, but to provoke and excite it, by pleasing him in every thing; and avoiding whatsoever is ungrateful to him: nay, by deserving well of him, and studying to promote the interest of him and his family, and to maintain his honour and reputation: and that not only by fits, and in a good humour, but all the days of her life; even after he is dead, if she survive him. See Arg. [l].

Ver. 13.] Idleness is so hateful to her, that she need not be desired to employ herself in some piece of good house-wifery: but of her own accord sets up a linen and woollen manufacture; to which she applies her own hands so willingly, as well as dexterously, that it appears she delights in the work. See Arg. [j].

Ver. 14.] And therevhere she maintains her family without expense, by carrying on a gainful trade for foreign commodities (which she gets in exchange for these), as if her husband set out a fleet of merchant ships; to fetch them from far-distant countries. See Arg. [l].

Ver. 15.] And she is so industrious and overmuch sleep, but in an early riser, before the break of day, to make provision for those that are to go abroad to work in the fields; and to set her maidens their several tasks at home.

Ver. 16.] So far she is from wasting her husband's estate, that by her prudent management she continually increases it: first purchasing a field for corn, when she meets with one that she judges worth her money; and then, out of the mere product of her own labours, adding a vineyard to it, which she causes to be well planted.

Ver. 17.] And as their diligence is unwavered, so she is neither slow in her despatches, nor refuses any pains; but nimbly betides herself, and goes roundly (as we say) about her business: nay, exercises her arms to the strongest labours, both within doors and without. See Arg. [k].

Ver. 18.] For finding, by sweet experience, not only how wholesome labour is, but how profitable her trade yields, she doth not conclude her work with that, but ever increases it as much as the night can spare her from necessary sleep. See Arg. [l].

Ver. 19.] And she doth not think it beneath her quality to put her hands to the spindle; but twists the thread or the yarn with her own fingers; and winds them with her own hands.
20 She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy.
21 She is not afraid of the snow for her house- hold; for all her household are clothed with scar- let.
22 She maketh herself coverings of tapestry; her clothing is silk and purple.
23 Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land.
24 She maketh fine linen, and seloth it; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant.
25 Strength and honour are her clothing; and she shall rejoice in time to come.

Ver. 29.] Which she stretches forth with no less forwardness to relieve the poor; being not only for getting all she can, but for giving liberally, out of her gains, to needy people; whom she supplies cheerfully, as well as bountifully; and extends her charity not only to those who are near, but to those who are remote from her.

Ver. 21.] Yet such is her prudence withal, that her own family and domestic servants are in no danger to suffer hereby, in the hardest winter: for she provides them with change of raiment, for the several seasons, and with double garments when the weather is cold; nay, not only clothes them, but adorns them so, that they may appear in a splendid manner, when they are to wait upon her. See Arg. [7].

Ver. 22.] The furniture of her house also is very noble, and her own apparel suitable to it: in which her greatness is not the less, but the more conspicuous; because they are of her own making. See Arg. [6].

Ver. 23.] And so are her husband's robes; which make him noted, when he comes into the courts of judicature, and sits among the senators of the country: who call him a happy man in such a wife, as doth him honour, and cares him of all his cares, but only those of the public business: which her wisdom, diligence, and prudent management, give him leisure wholly to attend.

Ver. 24.] For such is her industry, that she exercises more arts than one or two, to enrich her family; making, for instance, very fine linen, with embroidered belts, and girdles curiously wrought; which she sells to the Phoenician merchant.

Ver. 25.] But her principal ornaments are, the firmness, constancy, and vigour of her mind; her modest, comely, and decent behauiour; her generous and honourable way of dealing with every one: which (accompanied with the forenamed diligence, &c.) make her so happy, that they free her from all fear of what may be hereafter; and prepare her to meet old age, and death itself, with joyful satisfaction. See Arg. [9].

Ver. 26.] Unto which add this singular grace; that as she is neither silent nor talkative, so she loves not to talk of frivolous, but of serious things; of which, when occasion serves, she discourses pertinent and judiciously, not expressing her passion, but her wisdom: which shows itself not only in the constant softness and sweetness of her unprovoking language; but in the instructions and exhortations she gives unto doing good, exercising mercy, living peaceably and lovingly together; which is the less the she inculcates everywhere.

Ver. 27.] But especially in her own family, where she narrowly observes the motions and manners of every one; whom she neither suffers to god abroad at their pleasure, nor to labour at home without good instructions; but teaches them how to live as they ought; and by this, if she had nothing else, deserves the bread she eats.

Ver. 28.] Happy are the sons of such a mother, whose care both of their good education and to make provision for them, excites them, when they are grown up, to extol her virtues: happy is the husband of such a wife, whom he can never sufficiently commend; but having recited all her praises, saith.

Ver. 29.] Daughters may do much by their householdly, but nothing like to the care of a virtuous wife; and of all the wives that have done worthy, and mightily advanced the state of their family, there were never any comparable unto thee: whose merits far transcend them all.

Ver. 30.] A handsome shape and graceful behaviour are very taking; and so are a good complexion and lovely features; but, alas! as the greatest beauty soon fades and vanishes, so many ill qualities may lie concealed under goodly looks (which will utterly spoil all the happiness that a man promised himself in such a choice); and therefore a truly religious woman, who dares not any way offend the Lord, is that amiable person, and she alone, who will please a man always, and deserves perpetual praises.

Ver. 31.] Let every one extol her virtues, for I cannot do it enough; let her not want the just commendations of her pious labours; but, while some are magnified from the nobleness of the stock from whence they spring, others for their fortune, others for their beauty, others for other things; let the good things which she herself hath done be publicly praised in the greatest assemblies: where, if all men should be silent, her own works will declare her excellent worth.
ECCLESIASTES: OR, THE PREACHER.

WITH ANNOTATIONS ON EACH CHAPTER.

PREFACE.

I. This book not carrying in the front of it the express name of Solomon, it hath emboldened some to take the liberty of entitling other authors to it. Hezekiah, for instance, whom the Talmudists make to speak those words in the entrance of it, The words of the Preacher &c., or Isaiah, as R. Moses Kimchi, with some other Jews fancy; or, to name no more, Zerubbabel, whom Grotius (in his notes upon ch. xii. 11) conjectures to have appointed certain men to make this collection. For so he would have the word coheleth translated a collector, or heaper up of opinions, rather than a preacher.

II. But there are so many passages in the book which agree to none but Solomon, that it is a wonder so great a man as Grotius should be led away from the common opinion by such slight reasons as I shall presently mention. For instance, there never was anybody that could truly speak those words which we read ver. 16 of the first chapter, but only Solomon: for neither Hezekiah, nor Isaiah, nor Zerubbabel kept such great state as he did, much less excelled him in wisdom; and who but he could boast of such things as are mentioned ch. ii. 4–9, to represent the splendour wherein he lived, above all that had been before him in Jerusalem? Or on the contrary, who had such reason as he to make that sad complaint (ch. vii. 36, &c.) of the mischief he had received by women? And, to omit the rest, those words in the last chapter (ver. 9, 10) can belong to none but him who set in order many proverbs, as appears in the foregoing book.

III. Which things are so convincing that Grotius is forced to acknowledge that Zerubbabel caused this book to be composed in the name of king Solomon (for he was no king himself, but a governor under the king of Persia), repenting of his former vain and sinful life. Which very acknowledgment carries in it a plain solution of the principal argument whereby he was led to this odd opinion: which is, that he finds some words in this book that are nowhere to be met withal but in Daniel and Ezra, and the Chaldee interpreters; which makes it probable, he thinks, that it was written after their captivity in Babylon. But supposing Solomon to write here as a penitent, after he had frequented the company of many outlandish women (of whom we read 1 Kings xi. 1, 2), it need not seem strange to us that he had learned the use of many of their words. And so, notwithstanding this objection, he may still be thought to have been the author of this book himself; which the Hebrews generally conceive to have been written by him towards the end of his reign, after he had tried all manner of pleasures, even to an excess. Besides, in other books of scripture there are words, for the signification of which we are fain to have resort unto other languages, and particularly the Arabic, because they are not to be found elsewhere in the scripture; and yet for all that might be pure Hebrew, according to the language which was then spoken when such books were written.

IV. But it is not fit to stay any longer in the confusion of such a weak reason as this, which hath no force in it (though it be the best he hath), to make us think of any other author of this book than Solomon; who, if he did not write it himself, it is certain spake the things contained in it, and calls himself the Preacher, because of the great gravity and dignity of the subject whereof he treats; of which he was wont to speak frequently (ch. xii. 9), desiring it might be understood and laid to heart by the whole congregation of Israel, as the word coheleth seems to impart; which in the Ethiopic language signifies a circle, or a company of men gathered together in form of a circle, as Ludolphus hath lately observed. For the scope of this discourse is concerning the chief good or happiness of man: the great end he should propose to himself all his life long. Which is not that he shows which men generally follow, but that which is generally neglected. For most men mind nothing but just what is before them; which they will find at last, as he had done by sad experience, to be mere vanity; utterly unable to quiet their minds. Which must therefore seek for satisfaction in something else; and after all their busy thoughts, designs, and labours, come to this conclusion, that to fear God and keep his commandments is the happiness of man; who ought therefore to use all the pleasures of this world (which is the only good it can afford us) with a constant respect to the future account we must all make to God.

V. This, it appears, by the beginning and the end of this book is the scope of it. Unto which they that will not attend, are wont to pick out here and there a loose sentence which agrees with their desires, and then please themselves with a fancy that they have got Solomon on their side to help to maintain their infidelity; not considering what he asserts directly contrary in other places, where he presses the greatest and most serious reverence to almighty God (iv. 17, v. 1, &c., viii. 12, 13, xii. 13), together with a remembrance of the future judgment (iii. 17, xi. 9, xii. 11); works of mercy and charity also, whereby we may do good to others (xi. 1, &c.); and the contempt of those frivolous pleasures which draw our hearts from God and from good works (ii. 2, vii. 2, &c.). All which plainly show, that those words which seem to countenance men in the neglect of religion, and open a gap to licentiousness, are only opinions which he intends to confute, according to the method he had propounded to himself in this book. Wherein he first represents the various ends men drive at; which in the very entrance of it (that men might not mistake his meaning) he pronounces to be so vain, that he had no words significant enough to express their vanity: and then their different opinions about God, and his providence, and their own souls: and what thoughts he himself had tossed up and down in his mind; which at last came to that resolution I mentioned before, wherewith he ends his book. In the close of which, to give the greater weight unto what he had said, he adds this: that these were not only the result of his own thoughts, but the judgment of other wise men with whom he had consulted.

Let no man therefore deceive himself (to use the grave words of Castalio), as some, I wish I could say a few, have done: who, not minding the end and drift of this book, but having met with some one place in it that seems to favour their beloved lusts, lay hold on that scrap alone; and with that endeavour to defend their licentious course of life: as if they expected they should find God just such a judge hereafter, as they are of themselves at present.

VI. To comprise all in a few words. The sense of the whole sermon, as we may call it, seems to be comprehended in this syllogism:—

Whatever is vain and perishing cannot make men happy;

But all men’s designs here in this world are vain and perishing:

Therefore, they cannot by prosecuting such designs make themselves happy.

This proposition is evident in itself, and needs no proof. The assumption therefore he demonstrates in the first six chapters, by an enumeration of particulars; as I shall show in the argument before or annotations upon, each chapter: and then proceeds, in the rest of the book, to advise men unto the best course to make themselves happy; evidently proving all along, from this inconstancy and vanity of all things here, that he who wishes well to himself ought to raise his mind above them to the creator of the world: and expecting to give an account to him, so to demean himself in the use of all earthly enjoyments, that he devoutly acknowledge his divine majesty, fearing and worshipping him and doing his will.

Such indeed is the dulness of mankind, that, hearing all was but vanity, they might condemn every thing as evil and hurtful; and declaim too bitterly against this world. Which was so far from Solomon’s intention, that having explained the vanity of all our enjoyments here, and the vanity of human cares, solicitious desires and endeavours, he persuades all men to be content with things present, to give God thanks for them, to use them freely with quiet minds: living as pleasantly, and taking as much liberty, as the remembrance of a future account will allow; void of anxious and troublesome thoughts what will become of them hereafter in this life.

VII. But it may not be amiss, perhaps, to give a larger account of this sermon, and let the reader see in what method it proceeds. For many men imagine it to be a confused discourse, which doth not hang together, and therefore have explained this book only by giving an account of the meaning of each verse, as if it were a distinct sentence independent of the rest, like those in his Proverbs. But Antonius Corrannus, a most excellent person, in a small discourse of his upon this book, written above a hundred years ago, hath drawn such a scheme of it, as I believe will satisfy those who consider it, that Solomon proceeds after an exact order to deduce what he intended: and therefore I will translate the sense of what he saith into English, which is to this purpose.

VIII. The design of the author is to find out and to show, what it is in which the chief good and complete felicity of man doth consist. As appears by this, that reflecting upon various things in which men place their happiness, at the end of this discourse upon every one of them, he rejects them as utterly insufficient for that purpose, but continues his search so far till at last he finds it: and declares in the concluding epiphonema, that he had been seeking it through the whole discourse, saying, The sum of the matter is this “Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole of man.”

Now there are two principal parts of the whole sermon. The first of which contains a recital and confutation of men’s false opinions about their chiefest good; the other teaches in what our genuine, true, and solid felicity lies, both in this life and in the next. In both he shows very diligently what is the end to which a man should direct all his counsels, studies, and endeavours; what he ought to follow as most desirable above all things; and what to avoid as the extremest of evils.

Of the first of these he treats in his first six chapters: of the other in as many more that follow: which is both a perspicuous and exact method. For being to treat of felicity, it was but fitting he should divide it into false and true, and then define aright what that true felicity is. For we must first shun that which is evil, and then pursue that which is good: according to the frequent admonitions we meet withal in the holy prophets.

The first Part.

IX. Now the first part of his sermon relies upon a proposition which nobody denies, viz. that vain, frail, and troublesome things cannot make

Which assumption it may seem hard to prove, if we consider what account blind mortals make of their own inventions, counsels, studies, and labours by which they think to attain felicity. But to Solomon nothing was more easy: who, having made a full and long experiment of all enjoyments here, most evidently demonstrates this by an enumeration of parts, and that in an apt, perspicuous, and comprehensive order. For he neither confounds the parts, too curiously pursues them, nor mentions all the false opinions of men about the chiefest good (which would have been too tedious, if, like Varro, he had told us of two hundred and eighty-five, and yet that he could not reckon all); but reducing the most probable opinions unto four principal heads, he confutes them by various arguments: drawn chiefly from adjuncts and effects.

The first is of those who place blessedness in the knowledge of natural things, and in human wisdom, which begins at the twelfth verse of the first chapter, and reaches to the beginning of the second. For in the precedent verses he only lays a foundation for his discourse, and planes his way to the proof of what he intended. The second is of those who place it in pleasure; which he despatches, as unworthy of a long confutation, in the first three verses of the second chapter. But there being those of this sect who, joining these two together, pleasure and knowledge, imagine they will make up a complete happiness, he spends more time in showing their vanity: from the fourth verse of the second chapter to the sixteenth verse of the third: interposing only a parenthesis, wherein he compares wisdom with folly, and the effects of both show how much the former is to be preferred before the latter.

The third touches those who think honours, magistracies, and power in the commonwealth, to be the highest of all goods. In which number are they who seek to extend their empire, though it be by a vast effusion of their own blood, by which means also they establish their tyranny, when they have acquired it. Which disputation reaches from the sixteenth verse of the third chapter to the ninth verse of the fifth. Yet so, that from the beginning of the fourth chapter to the thirteenth verse of the same, he inserts the miseries that grow from such tyrannical administration, and the vices which break in upon the impunity of evil-doers, and neglect of the laws. Particularly, he gives us a lively description of emulation and covetousness: two of the foulest and most cruel pests of the commonwealth. In the fifth chapter also he inserts a discourse of that superstitious and vain worship of God, in which some, despising all other things, place their satisfaction: and most lamentably applaud those precepts in it. Which disputation contains in it some excellent precepts of true religion and piety; which the reader may find in the first eight verses of the fifth chapter.

After which follows the fourth opinion, of those who propound to themselves riches and wealth as their last end; which if they can attain, they doubt not they shall live very happily. Which extends itself from thence to the eleventh verse of the sixth chapter, where you have the general epilogue of the first part, concerning false felicity.

The other Part.

X. Then follows the second, and most elegant as well as useful part of the sermon. In which he teaches, that the felicity for which men take so much pains (every one going his own way to it), is not to be found anywhere but in a religious and serious fear of God: according to that of the psalmist, "Blessed are all they that fear the Lord; that walk in his ways;" and again, "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord;" that delighteth greatly in his commandments." For other things, though they promise felicity, yet they cannot perform it; because they have such a mixture of vanity, trouble, and grief with them, as will not suffer them to be absolutely good; and because, if they were sincere, yet they being so uncertain, that they may be lost before we die, and at the best are terminated within the narrow bounds of this short life; they cannot give that satisfaction and quiet of mind which we desire. But the fear of God is such a good, that it both gives true content, satisfaction, and tranquillity of mind as long as we live; and when we die, fills us with a sure hope of a better life in which true and genuine felicity is accomplished.

For the sum of what can be said in this matter may be reduced to this argumentation:—

That which can make a man's mind quiet, still, and calm, both in life and death, that alone can make him happy:

Now this the fear of the Lord can do for him, and this alone; therefore this, and nothing else, will make him a happy man.

The proposition needs no proof: for then we feel ourselves happy, when our minds are so quiet and well pleased that they neither grieve, nor fear, nor solicitously desire, nor vainly hope for uncertain things; but rest satisfied in that excellent and most certain joy and hope which arise out of a pure conscience.

The assumption is proved from two effects of the fear of God, viz. wisdom and justice. The first of which teaches us what to follow, and what to fly: and furnishes us with such caution, that we be not imposed on in the choice of that which seems to be good for us. The other instructs us to do our whole duty towards God, towards our neighbour, and towards ourselves. In which two all religion and piety, together with satisfaction, tranquillity, and felicity, are contained.

And because effects are more known than their causes, and it would be uncertain what he meant by the fear of God, unless he explained it by those things wherein it consists, he begins his disputation on this subject with those effects, and employs himself wholly in showing what are the offices of wisdom and justice; that he might inform us not only what is the chief good to which we ought to aspire, but by what ways and means we may come to it.

XI. Of wisdom and prudence, therefore, which are conversant in the choice of things, he treats in the first place, chapter the seventh: because no man can act either righteously, or valiantly, or temporarily, unless, by the benefit of prudence, he be before instructed what force they are unto our happiness. He explains therefore its various offices in such documents as these: that a good fame is to be desired above all things; that death ought to be the subject of our frequent meditations; that those things are to be avoided which incite to pleasure, and the contrary to be followed, which admonish us to be modest and sober; that severity and gravity are to be preferred before mirth; chastisements and corrections to willingly admitted; flattery and soothing people to be cashiered; not to be too much disturbed at calamities and reproaches; to take no bribes; to expect the issue and conclusion of things; to bridle anger, as an enemy to reason; to love the use of money, not money itself; and such like: unto which, last of all, he adjoins a brief commendation of wisdom; rejecting both the larger explanation of its effects, and its praises, to the end of the ninth chapter and beginning of the tenth.

Now this first part concerning wisdom, is handled in the first twelve verses of the seventh chapter.

XII. Then he enters upon the other, concerning justice; which he divides into that which respects God, and that which respects men. The former of which (comprehended under the names of religion, piety, and godliness), consists in this: that, in the first place, we conceive aright and judge well of God, and of his providence in the administration of human affairs; and then that we pay him that honour, worship, and service which are due unto his divine majesty.

This discourse, which he touches upon from the thirteenth to the sixteenth verse of the seventh chapter, he resumes again in the eighth chapter, and pursues it from the ninth verse of it, to the thirteenth verse of the ninth chapter.

As for that justice which respects others, it is manifold. For it is either towards men or towards women: which consists, in a manner, altogether in shunning both the extremes of it, and observing an insinuation, moderation or equity; and hath respect to their offences, either against ourselves or others: which we are partly to correct and partly to bear withal. Which is the sum of his discourse, from the sixteenth verse to the beginning of the eighth chapter.

Where interspersing a few things, after his manner, in the praise of wisdom, he begins another division of justice: concerning the duty of subjects to their princes, from the second verse to the eighth; and on the other side, the duty of princes towards their subjects: of both which it may be fit to give a larger account. For this tractate is truly royal, and worthy to be read perpetually in this most turbulent age, both by high and low: that from hence subjects may learn to perform obedience, and the greatest observance both in word and deed towards their princes; choosing rather to bear and suffer anything, than to attempt rebellion against them; and kings may also remember that they ought to govern their kingdoms according to the rules of law and equity, and not according to their own will and pleasure; God having committed unto them the sceptre of justice, clemency, and welfare of their subjects; not the sceptre of cruelty, tyranny, and destruction.

In which this wise king, observing both princes and people to be too negligent, and that hence ariseth a very great license in sinning, lest well-affected minds should be offended at this horrible corruption of manners, he digresses into a long, but very profitable and necessary disputation of God's providence, and the economy of justice. Which, though the wicked deny and deride, because they see not such manifest difference as one would expect made between the good and the bad, in the events that befal them both; yet he advises all that fear the divine majesty not to be dejected and disheartened at this, nor to search with too much curiosity into God's secrets; but steadfastly resolving that it shall not be well with the wicked, though all things flow at present according to their hearts' desire, and that whatsoever the godly may suffer now, they shall find at last that God is their friend; to look upon themselves therefore as happy men, both in the peace of their conscience in this world, and in a sure and certain hope of a better condition in the other. Upon which account he frequently incalculates this counsel, that they who are studious to fear God, and do well, being secure of God's administration and of the event of things, should enjoy the present good things which his divine bounty bestows upon them with cheerful minds, and with thanksgiving to him. This discourse (which it must be confessed is not altogether so methodical as some other) extends from the ninth verse of the eighth chapter to the thirteenth verse of the ninth.

And because he had shown that the event of things is not in our own counsel and in human wisdom, but in the hand of God, lest anybody should be so weak or perverse as thence to conclude that it is the same thing whether we act wisely or foolishly, he again makes a digression into the praises of wisdom, showing how much it excels folly, from the effects of both. It begins at the seventeenth verse, and reaches to the fourth of the tenth chapter. Where he returns to his discourses about the mutual offices of justice between one another, both of princes and subjects.

And then in the first six verses of the eleventh chapter, he exhorts most earnestly to liberality and almsgiving, which is no small part of righteousness; and with that he concludes the two effects of the fear of God, wisdom and justice.
XIII. The rest of the work is his peroration:
in which he fully opens his opinion concerning the chief good; which he confirms to lie wholly in a truly religious fear of God. Which therefore he seriously exHORTS every one to make his study as earnestly as is possible; before dull and inactive old age, and death itself (both which he elegantly describes) come upon us, and, before we think of it, oppress us.

This is the method of this most excellent sermon, which I cannot but exhort all men to study diligently, and with great intention of mind, both for the author's sake, and for the matter of it.
Which he handles in such a manner as, first,
to draw us from the desire and love of earthly things, and from the perverse use of them; and then to lead us unto the true and lawful use of them, without any offence to God, as well as without hurt to ourselves. And he teaches us how we may, without a preposterous solicitude and anxiety about events, enjoy all things in the fear of God with tranquility and satisfaction of mind at present; and, at last, by the same fear of God and observance of his commandments, arrive at a never-dying felicity.

To conclude, he interperses through the whole discourse abundance of common places, both philosophical and theological; which are so fitted to make us every way more learned, more prudent, and more pious, that we shall find great use of them in all the passages of our lives.

XIV. Thus that learned Spaniard concludes his preface; which I have contracted, that I might set before the reader's eyes, in one short view, both the design and the procedure of the discourse. Of the former (the design) there is no doubt: and the latter is very regular, as it will farther appear in the explication I shall give of it. Wherein I have not followed this author throughout, in every part of this division of the book; because, though for the most part I take it to be accurate enough, yet I think in several places I had reason to differ from him, and take another way to make the connection more easy and natural, and the sense thereby more clear and evident.

I beseech God, that the pains I have taken herein may not be in vain, but prove an effectual means both to make the mind of Solomon in this book better understood, and to turn all our minds from these frivolous things, about which they are now too much employed, unto the solid and full good which here he recomends to us. Who may be the better trusted in what he saith, because he had tried what satsatisfaction could be found in all manner of enjoyments here: and it could not be objected to him that he disparaged the world, merely because he could not get any share in it, or had not the liberty which was necessary to enjoy it. For no man ever had greater plenty, or gave a greater loose to his desires; but after all the experiments he could make, came to this resolution, which he 'd better have taken at first, that religion and virtue are the only things that can make a man happy.

And, perhaps, as God suffered St. Thomas to doubt of our Saviour's resurrection, for the greater confirmation of our faith, by the satisfaction he at last received; so he let this great man go astray, that by his dear bought experience he might teach us this wisdom, to keep the closer to God in faithful obedience.

Which it will be a very great shame if we do not learn, who live under the instruction of a greater master than Solomon, the Son of God himself; by whom we are taught these things in a more effectual manner, not only by his doctrine, but by his whole life and by his death: in which he declared the greatest neglect and contempt of this world; and that his mind was wholly set upon the other.

And what a blessed sort of resurrection would it be, if (as Erasmus somewhere admirably speaks) we would all lay aside our dissensions, strifes, and quarrels, and study the lessons our Lord hath taught us. Whose business it was in this world to form unto himself "a people that should wholly depend on heaven, and, placing no-confidence in any earthly support or comfort, should be after another manner rich, after another manner wise, after another manner noble, after another manner potent, in one word, after another manner happy: designing to attain felicity by the contempt of those things which are vulgarly admir'd. A people that should be strangers to filthy lusts, by studying in this flesh the life of angels; that should have no need of divorce, by being able to mend or to bear all manner of evils; that should be wholly ignorant of oaths, as those who neither distrust, nor will deceive anybody; that make not the getting of money their business, having laid up their treasures in heaven; that should not be tickled with vainglory, because they refer all to the glory of Christ alone; be void of ambition, as disposed, the greater they are, to submit themselves so much the more unto all men for Christ's sake; that should be unacquainted with wrath, much more with revenge, as studying to deserve well of those who deserve ill of them; that should be so innocent in their behaviour, as to force commendations even from heathens; that should be born again to the purity and simplicity of infants; that should live like the birds of the air, without care and solicitude; among whom there should be the greatest concord, nothing different from that which is between the members of the same body; in which mutual charity should make all things common; that whether there were any good thing it should help to supply him that wanted, or any evil thing, it should either be removed or mitigated by the good offices of others; who should be so wise by the teaching of the Holy Ghost, to live according to the example of Christ, as to be 'the salt of the earth, the light of the world, like a city on a hill,' conspicuous to all the country round about; whose abilities, whatsoever they are, should make them-forward to help others; to whom this life should seem vile, death desirable, out of a longing for immortality; who should neither fear tyranny, nor death, nor the devil himself, relying upon the invincible power of Christ alone, who should act in all things so as to be ever prepared and ready for that last and most to be wished for day, when they shall take possession of true and eternal felicity."

CHAPTER I.

1 The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king of Jerusalem.
2 Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity.
3 What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?
4 One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever.
5 The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—In the first eleven verses he lays the foundation of his following discourses, and makes his way to the proof of what he intends (viz. that nothing here can make us so solidly happy), by showing how empty all things are, and how short a time a man hath to possess them; and that while it lasts he can only enjoy the same empty things over and over again, till he be cheated with them. And then (ver. 12) he enters into a particular consideration of the insufficiency of human wisdom and knowledge alone, to give us full satisfaction: though this be one of the very best things wherein men place their felicity. Which discourse continues to the end of the chapter.

Ver. 1.] These are the words of him, who thought the name of a preacher, or public instructor of God's people (to whom he calls aloud in this book, to mind what he hath concerning the supreme good of man), no less honourable than that of the son of king David: whom he succeeded in his throne; and reigned after him in the holy city Jerusalem. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 2.] That good of which you are all desirous, is not there to be found where you seek it; for all things here below are so frail, so subject to change, and to vanish, that I have not words to express how vain they are. This is the thing which the preacher first undertakes to prove, that they are more emptiness, more vain than vanity itself; so full of trouble and care, as well as extremely unstable, that to no purpose are all men's endeavours, who seek for satisfaction from them; especially if they place their highest good in them. See Annot. [b].

Ver. 3.] For proof of this, let every man survey himself; who consists of body and of mind. And let him ask his mind, what great matter there remains, after all its cares for the things of this life! what contentment he or any man else in all this world hath reaped by his toilsome labours, and anxious thoughts, wherein he hath racked himself both day and night? which have often ended in disappointment; and when he hath enjoyed his desires, this very thing hath spoiled his pleasures, that he could not long enjoy them. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 4.] For if they do not presently leave him, he in a short time must leave them; his body (the other part of him) being made out of the earth; and therefore, how firm and solid soever it now seems, must be crumbled into earth again. Which continues for ever to receive back those bodies which come out of it, for no generation can abide as the earth doth; but follows the foregoing, as the next that comes after shall follow it, unto the grave. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 5.] Out of which they cannot return and stand up in their former places, as the sun, that quickens all things, doth: which in a constant and regular course ariseth, and makes no more speed to go down, than it doth to appear the next morning, in the same glory again. No; man dies, and appears here no more; though if he should, it would be to die again. See Annot. [d].

Ver. 6.] Nor is the annual course of the sun less certain than its diurnal; but it comes back the next year at a fixed time to the very same point from whence it moved this. Nay, the winds, as fickle and inconstant as they are, whirling with a marvellous swiftness round the earth, return at last to the same quarter from whence they shifted (and some of them the very same months of the year) to fetch the same compass, and run the same round they did before.

Ver. 7.] The like circle there is in watery bodies; for the torrents and brooks, that the rain makes, run into the rivers, and so into the sea, which nevertheless doth not swell beyond its bounds, because it restores all back again to their former places, by the vapours which the sun exhales, or by the secret passages through the earth: whilst poor man alone (who is compounded of all these, of the earth, the air, the water, and such heat as the sun administers) passeth away and cometh to his place no more; but must be content to imitate these things, only in their restless agitations.

Ver. 8.] Which is another thing that increaseth his trouble; that in this short life, which he cannot live over again when it is done, he can neither be quiet, nor move with ease (as the things forenamed do), nor yet acquire satisfaction with his perpetual motion; but tries himself even in his pleasures; and finds all sort of business so laborious, that he himself is not able to tell how tedious it is; and after all is done, he is no better pleased than when he first began. For the eye (for instance) and the ear, which are the noblest and most capacious senses, having seen and heard all manner of things, are as desirous of some new enter-shall be: and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun.

10 Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us.

11 There is no remembrance of former things; neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come with those that shall come after.

12 ¶ The Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem.

13 And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven: this sore travail hath God tainment, as if they had enjoyed none at all. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 9.] But, alas! the very same things (like the sun, the wind, and the rivers) come about again; and we are cloied with seeing and hearing what hath often presented itself unto us already; or, at least, hath been in times before us, and will be again in those that succeed us. There is nothing done now, but (the persons being changed) will be acted over again in future ages; to whom the sun can show nothing but what we have seen in these days, and others have seen in the foregoing. And therefore it is vain for any man to expect that satisfaction now or in future times, which none have found since the world began: men will always long these things present, as they have ever done; and long for those which are coming which will ever give them the same satiety. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 10.] Is any man able to contradict this, and point us to the thing which is altogether new, and hath never been seen, nor heard of before? It may appear, perhaps, so to him; but that is to be imputed merely to the shortness of human life: which makes us ignorant of what hath passed in former ages (save only in a few things transmitted down to us by observing men). For had we continued many generations, that which now seems new and unusual to us would have appeared familiar, and of great antiquity, as really it is.

Ver. 11.] They that went before us, indeed, might have registered such things: but as they observed little, so they have left the memory of less: nor will this age, or those that follow, be more careful; or if they should, posterity will be as negligent as former ages. For we come not at all times: for we differ nothing from our forefathers, nor will the ages to come excel this in which we live; but still the vanity of man, and of all his projects and contrivances, will continue till the world's end.

Ver. 12.] And let none imagine that I speak this only as a preacher, in a zealous passion, much less in a decrying a good; but remember that I have long sat upon a throne, ruling over God's own peculiar people, in that city which is the very school of wisdom; where I wanted nothing either for the body or the mind; and had both opportunity and ability to make trial of all things wherein men place their happiness, and therefore may be believed, when I declare nothing but from my own experience. See Annot. [z].

Ver. 13.] And being thus instructed with all the helps and assistances that the power of such a king could afford, I applied my mind, in the first place, and set my wits to work with all imaginable care and diligence, to search into the nature of all creatures here below; thinking I should be happy if I could find out the causes, beginnings, and progress of things; especially the counsels, contrivances, and endeavours of mankind, with the event of all their actions. But, alas! I soon found that this was a tedious business, in which, when I had travelled a great way, I met with small satisfaction: nay, found it to be the torture of the mind, unto which God hath concludes, in order to this, as a punishment for their vain curiosity, and gross negligence of heavenly wisdom. See Annot. [k].

Ver. 14.] And having now finished these studies, and taken a serious view of all that falls within the compass of human knowledge, I cannot say that they have given me any solid contentment: for we can know but little, and what we do know of natural things doth us small service: it puffeth us up, indeed, like wind, but gives no nourishment; it fills us with notions, but of little or no use; and therefore vexes us at last, and breaks our heart to consider that we have spent so much time, and so many thoughts, which have eaten up our spirits, to so little purpose. See Annot. [l].

Ver. 15.] For as there are inextricable difficulties in all sorts of knowledge, of which no man can give an account; so, with all our study, we cannot have skill enough either to prevent misfortunes, or to remove out of the way that which croseth our designs, much less to alter the nature of things (no, not so much as our own nature). Nor need we wonder, in government: the defects in which, and in all other things and conditions, we are so far from being able to supply, that we cannot number them; and yet the folly of mankind represents every thing to their desires, as if it were completely good, and wanted nothing to make one happy. See Annot. [k].

Ver. 16.] And though I chiefly set myself still persisted in my reach after knowledge, though I found it so painful, and so unsatisfactory: thinking within myself, that there was this good at least in it, that it had gotten me a very great name, and raised me so high in all men's opinion, that I was noted for the wisest person that had ever been in these parts of the world, there being no sort of knowledge wherewith my mind was not stored in abundance. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 17.] And, as the nature of all knowledge is to excite a thirst after more, this made me apply my mind more earnestly to comprehend, not only the greatest, but the meanest matter; to mark, for instance, the actions and occupations of madmen and fools, as well as the motions of wiser persons: but I perceived, that to be pleased merely with fame, was to live upon air; and it was an afflicting thought to observe how little the most of the world (though they thought themselves very wise) differed from lunatics and distressed folk. See Annot. [m].

Ver. 18.] So that though knowledge be the most excellent of all other earthly goods, being the orna-and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit.

ment of the mind, which is the best part of us, yet this also is insufficient for our happiness: because, after it hath cost a man infinite pains (and sometimes exhausted his spirits, and made him melancholy and morose, nay, thrown him into many diseases) to acquire that little wisdom he can attain; which raises also more doubts than it can resolve, and meets with troublesome oppositions from various opinions that clash against it; it cannot but fill him with indignation to find fally generally applauded more than his wisdom, and grieve his very soul to see that it is dangerous for a man to know more than his neighbours; and that he is so far from being able to remedy what is amiss, that he is hated if he endeavour it; and rewarded with reproaches for his care of the public good. See Amorit. [a].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] The wisdom, virtue, and dignity of an author making his work more valuable and regarded; Solomon (or he who composed this book from what he heard him deliver, or found in his writings) begins with his quality; not merely as a king, and as the son of a great king, and of a great people, in a famous city; but, which was most considerable, as a public instuctor, having ability and authority to inform all men where they should and should not have gone, which was the more, as he was not uncertain, but could not meet withal. This he proclaims with a loud voice; desiring serious attention to such a weighty discourse, and that they would often recollect, as he had done (all which may be the import of the word coheleth; see preface, Numb. IV.), how trivial and trivial all those things are which most men pursue with the greatest earnestness.

[b] Ver. 2.] This is the subject of this book, to show how senseless it is to place our happiness in these frail and inconsistent things, that we enjoy upon this earth: which he not only pronounces, but proves to be mere emptiness. So vanity signifies; and what is consequent upon that, dissatisfaction, trouble, and affliction (see Ps. lxxviii. 32). And this, beyond what can be expressed; for our translators take it to be a word of the same import with tosh; which is used in the Hebrew language, when they would signify that of which they speak to be so trivial, that it is below less than nothing (Isa. XI. 17). And yet Solomon is not content with this single word, but doubles it, to denote the extreme dissatisfaction he found in all things, which made a show of offering him contentment; but performed nothing of that which they seemed to promise. So the word vanity is also used for that which is also false, lying, and deceitful, Ps. lxxxi. 9, and other places, where idola are called vanities.

[c] Ver. 3.] Here begins the proof of his assertion; by comparing first the mind of man, which runs from one thing to another without any end; but finds no satisfaction remaining from all its restless thoughts. And then the body of man (ver. 4), which, as proud and lofty as it now looks, must moulder into dust; and the poorest person, perhaps, shall tread upon its grave. For it cannot last but the earth from which it stands and for ever, are a mere theatre, whereon men enter and set their part, and then go off, and never appear again: and when they go (as some prettily, rather than solidly, gloss upon the words, "the earth abideth for ever") they can carry none of it along with them, but leave it all behind them, unto those that come after; who pass away also, leaving the earth where they found it. [d] Ver. 5.] The sun also, in a second course, observes its times of rising and setting; whereas man, when he goes down to the earth, cannot, like the sun, come up again. So the fifth verse seems to be most naturally connected with the foregoing; and, in like manner, the sixth and seventh verses are to be expounded. There are many interpreters, indeed, who look upon the words mentioned in these three verses only as emblems of the instability of all human affairs, and of the constant resolutions of the same miseries: which cannot be hindered by any human counsels, but will return after all the changes, whereby we think to mend ourselves. Upon which sense I have just touched in my paraphrase, but not followed it, because it doth not seem to me to be the scope of these verses; in which man is represented by four comparisons, with the earth, the sun, the wind, and the sea, to be more subject to vanity than other things.

[e] Ver. 8.] Which having thus illustrated, he proceeds here more particularly to consider what he has said in general words (ver. 2), of man's vain endeavours to satisfy his heart in worldly vanities; in which he is tired, but comes to no end of his desires. How should he? when his whole business here is only to enjoy the very same things over and over again: as all men have done before us, and shall do after us (ver. 9—11).

[f] Ver. 9.] We may fancy, indeed, that we have found something fruitful from this; that this course proceeds merely from our ignorance; as the lord Bacon excellently discourses in his first book of the Advancement of Learning, ch. 8.

"Learning and knowledge (saith he) take away vain and excessive admiration; which is the very root of all weak counsels. For we admire things, either because they are new, or because they are great. As for novelty, there is no man that considers things thoroughly, but hath this printed in his heart, "There is nothing new under the sun." Nor can any man much admire a puppet-play which doth but thrust his head behind the curtain, and soth the instruments and wires whereby they are moved. As for greatness, we may say an exactly similar thing, and the, in Asia, receiving letters of some small fights or skirmishes in Greece, at the taking some bridge or fort, was wont to tell his friends, that 'it seemed to him that they had sent him news of the battles of Homer's frogs and mice;' so, certainly, if a man consider the universe and the fabric of it, to him this globe of earth, with the men upon it, and their busy motions (excepting always the divineness of souls), will not seem much more considerable than a hillcock of ants, wherein some creep up and down with their corn, others with their eggs, others empty; all about a very little heap of dust." And as Melanthon well observes, the same desires, the same counsels, the same ends, the same causes, of war, and calamitous events, return again: according to Thucydides, "While human nature continues what it is, the like mischiefs will happen; sometimes less, sometimes more direfully.

[g] Ver. 12.] Thus having confirmed his main propositions, he has such general arguments as reach to all things in this world; he proceeds here to a more particular proof of it, from his own proper experience. And designing (before he declared his own opinion of the chief good, and by what means it may be attained) to confute the vain fancies of men about it, he reduces them, as I have shown in the preface, to four heads. And observing that some place it in knowledge, and curious inquiries into all manner of things; others in pleasure, or in both these;
ECCLESIASTES.

or others in honour and power; others in riches and heaps of wealth: he begins with that which is the most plausible. And demonstrates, from the thirteenth verse to the end of this chapter, how little satisfaction is to be found in the mere speculation of things, though a man arrive at the highest degree of human knowledge.

Ver. 13.] Melanthon restrains these two verses to political wisdom, in the government of kingdoms, which gives men a double affliction: first, in that the wisest men often err in their counsels; and, secondly, that events sometimes do not answer to the best counsels that men can follow. Examples of the first are innumerable: sometimes they err through ambition, as Pericles, after Alexander; sometimes through a false opinion of right, as Brutus; sometimes through over-doing, busy-headedness, and inquietude of mind, as Pericles; sometimes through anger, as Marius. And how many ways good counsels have miscarried, it is too long here to remember:
because it is here farther observable, that sometimes more doubtfulness and uncertainty of mind what course to take; how different a temper and mind to his than any other. Thus Pompey was first perplexed in his counsels, before he saw the disastrous event of his error. To conclude this; all government is full of cares, perplexities, and impediments, that it made Demosthenes say, if he were to begin the world again, he would rather die than be promoted to it. And [Eschylus, that not only gave more credit to the future men of present evils, but foresee by the present to the contrary, injustice, baseness, perfidiousness, flattery, and such-like vices, possess the world, and carry all before them! Or what man can, without vexation, observe the preposterous judgment of mankind, which magnifies those things that are not only vain but hurtful and pernicious; and not only testimony, but hate those things which are truly good for them; nay, alone desirable! no man can either be wise alone to himself, in such a multitude of fools and madmen, without the greatest grief and indignation; nor can he accommodate himself, with an equal mind, to the understanding of common people, when he sees that which is better.

I shall conclude this chapter with the lord Bacon's observation, concerning this anxiety of spirit which arises out of knowledge, in the beginning of his book of the Advancement of Learning:

"Solomon (saith he) doth not pass this censure absolutely upon wisdom and knowledge, but only sets forth the true bounds, wherein human knowledge is to be circumscribed: which if we do not observe, it

ARGUMENT.—Having passed his censure upon the first way men take to find satisfaction (mentioned in the notes upon verse 12, of the first chapter), which without all contradiction is the chief, and the best of the four; he proceeds here to consider the second, which is the more common: most men immersing themselves in pleasure, as their highest good. Of which he was more capable to judge than any other man; because he denied himself no delights that he desired, and yet did not plunge himself wholly into them, but with a mixture of wisdom, as he tells us verse 4. We have perceived, that they who leave the pursuit of knowledge for the sake of bodily pleasures change for the worse: for, after he had tried all sorts of things that could give him any pleasure, he went back to wisdom and knowledge, as the better of the two (ver. 19), and yet, after he had considered that again the second time, he could not but confess, that there were such great imperfections in it; that it could not make a man happy, as he discourses in the following verses. Of which I shall give a more particular account in the annotations.

Ver. 1.] Being thus disappointed, therefore, in the expectations I had of happiness from much wisdom and knowledge, and beholding many men look jollily who had none at all, I resolved to leave off those troublesome cares and labours, and to follow my pleasures: saying to myself, Why dost thou vex and torment thy mind to no purpose? let alone these8578 crush’d studies which hasten old age, and indulge thyself in all these sweet delights which youth desires: try what satisfaction mirth and joy can give thee: and for that end take no thought for the future, but enjoy to the height the present goods of this life: which accordingly I did: but believe me, though this promised much at first, it performed little, but left me at the end of contentment than it found me. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 2.] For the noise, the tumult, the indecent motions, and scurrilous jestings, of men that let them servants born in my house; also I had great possessions of great and small cattle above all that were in Jerusalem before me:

8 I gathered me also silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces: I gat me men singers and women singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts.

9 So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem: also my wisdom remained with me.

10 And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them. I withheld not my heart from any joy; for my heart rejoiced in all my labour; and this was my portion of all my labour.

perfection or preservation of these places, I made with great charge, and no less art, either fountains, or cisterns, or pools of water; not only for delight, and for fish, but to serve instead of rain, to water the flowers and herbs, especially the young nurseries of trees, that they might not die with drought. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 7.] All which requiring the care of a great many persons, I purchased servants, both men and women, in great abundance; of whom I had a multitude of children born in my house, whom I employed in looking after my other possessions, which I had in herds and flocks of greater and lesser cattle; which would have been so numerous, that I killed every day for my family ten oxen crammed with the stalls, and twenty ewes out of the pastures, with a hundred sheep besides harts, and roebucks, and fallow-deer, and fatted fowl, to say nothing of other provisions. 1 Kings iv. 29, 30; and yet such was the plenty, my stock did not decrease, because a new brood grew up continually in such abundance as the like had never been seen in our country before my days. See Annot. [5].

Ver. 8.] By which, and divers other means (1 Kings iv. 21: X. 24—26, &c. 2 Chron. ix. 21), I had up vast treasures of silver, and gold, and jewels, and all that was choice and precious in other kingdoms; especially in those provinces which were subject unto me, which were great and many (1 Kings iv. 24); out of which, and at home, I availed together with the rarest songs and hymns, composed by the best masters in the world; and all sorts of instruments of music; than which nothing is more charming among the children of men, either to lay them asleep when they would go to rest, or to recreate their spirits when they are tired with business; to banish melancholy when they are oppressed with sorrow, and to augment their pleasure when they would be merry: being no less fit to wait upon feasts, than they that attend at the table. See Annot. [4].

Ver. 9.] Thus I was not only great in place, and power, and riches, but, by such means as these, added splendour also to my greatness, and made it more conspicuous and illustrious: and (which is still more glorious) I was not greater in any thing than in wisdom; which was not underrated by all these pleasures; but, when they were in danger to dethrone my reason, this settled it again in its former state and authority. See Annot. [1].

Ver. 10.] And, on the other side, my wisdom did not lay such restraints upon me, but that I took the liberty to please my eyes, and all my senses, with every thing that fell within the wide compass of their desires; it did not deny me any joy to which I had a mind; but taught me rather to reap this as the sweet fruit of all my labours: there being nothing (it showeth me) that came to my share of all that I had gotten with so much care and diligence, but only the free enjoyment of it; without which I had as good have been without it. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 11.] But then, after I had considered seriously how small a thing this pleasure was, how short, and how often interrupted, and how long I had laboured at it, and how still longer I had to labour at it all the time I had spent, and the pains I had taken, in contriving these magnificent buildings, gardens, paradises, and all the rest, it seemed to me as nothing; and I cannot but leave this observation behind me, that all this is empty and unsatisfying to the spirit of man; and there is also much vexation of spirit in it. See how often things go many times to our desires, how negligent they are who should look after such great works as mine were; but especially in this, that a man can reap so little benefit and so transient, from such vast and long labours (i. 3, 14). See Annot. [7].

Ver. 12.] Wherefore I began to reflect upon my former thoughts, and to turn them back again towards wisdom, as the only good of man (i. 13, 17), and especially that wisdom which moderates our pleasures, and keeps them from running into madness and folly (and who is there that can give a better account of this than I) who have had such advantages above any private man to know the history of former times, as well as of my own, that I am confident they who come after me for folly, the very evidence against them, as who should look after such great works as mine were; but especially in this, that a man can reap so little benefit and so transient, from such vast and long labours (i. 3, 14). See Annot. [7].

Ver. 13.] For I clearly discerned, that there is as wide a difference between wisdom and folly, as there is between the light of the sun, which beautifies the whole world, and shows all things distinctly to us, and the darkness of the night, which wraps up all in dismal confusion, and hides even our dangers from us.

Ver. 14.] Whence it is, that a wise man, having this light in his mind, looks before him, and rambles about him; which makes him cautious and well aware of dangers, into which a blundering fool, whose mind is blinded with the sottish love of pleasure, falls rashly and insconsiderably: and yet with all his circumspection (so imperfect are all things here, in which we place our happiness), the wisest man is not able to avoid a great many calamities, which are common to the whole race of mankind.

Ver. 15.] Which reflection made me sigh, and think with myself; If notwithstanding this excellence of wisdom, we so folly fall into the very same diseases, losses of children and friends, and innumerable casualties, happen unto me, even unto me who knows so much, that there do unto a fool; to what purpose have I taken all this pains, and studied so hard to be wiser than he! and upon this review of all that wisdom can and cannot do for us, I concluded, again the second time, that there is a vanity also in this; which makes it impossible of giving us full satisfaction. See Anot. [a].

Ver. 17.] For as both wise and foolish are alike subject unto death, so, when they are dead, their names live not long after them, but they and all their famous achievements are forgotten; there being few of those things which are now done, that will be so much thought of in the next generation; much less in future ages, when the memory of them will be utterly lost, and cannot be recovered; and is not this a lamentable case, that a wise man hath no more privilege than a fool, either from death, or from its inseparable companion, oblivion? See Anot. [a].

Ver. 18.] And besides all this, there are other reasons which made me despise all those goodly structures which I had erected, and those beautiful works which I had contrived (ver. 4-6, &c.); because, as I cannot keep them long myself, so I must leave them to I know not whom, to a stranger, perhaps, who without any pains of his enjoys the fruit of all my labour.

Ver. 19.] Or, if my son succeed me in the possession of them, there is no man can assure me, whether he will wisely preserve and improve what I have gotten, or foolishly squander all away; in short, whether he will prove a worthy or an unworthy inheritor of my labours; and yet, such as he is, he must have an absolute power over all that I leave, to dispose of it as he pleases; and sottishly, perhaps, to waste in a little time, what I, with prudent care and diligence, have been heaping up all my life long. This is a great addition to human misery; and renders even the study of wisdom very vain, which cannot find a remedy for these evils.

Ver. 20.] Which are so great, that, instead of pursuing my designs for this world, I turned my thoughts quite contrary way; and like one perfectly tired, I concluded it best to leave off all farther cares about anything here; despairing to reap any satisfaction from all my labours; particularly, to attain any certainty what kind of man he will be who shall inherit them.

Ver. 21.] For what hath happened to others may to me; who have observed a man no way defective, either in wise contrivance, or prudent management, or upright dealing, but as eminent for honesty, as he was for diligence; whose estate fell to the share of an idle person, may, of an ignorant, silly, unjust, and ungratefulretch; who prodigiously consumed upon his lusts that which cost him no pains, not so much as a thought to acquire. This likewise, it cannot be denied, is not only a dissatisfaction, but a torment, nay, a great torment, to the mind of man.

Ver. 22.] Who may well say, To what purpose is all this toil of my body, and these solicitous thoughts and anguish of my mind? For all that a man can enjoy himself of the anxious labours wherein he spends his days, amounts to little or nothing; and what comfort hath he in thinking who shall enjoy the fruit of them hereafter?

Ver. 23.] And yet, such is our folly, there is no end of our cares; for we see many a man whose life is nothing but a mere drudgery, and sure to enjoy not so much as heath, but still engaged in one troublesome employment or other to get more; which he follows so eagerly, as if it were his business to disquise and vex himself, and make his life uneasy to him; being not content with his daily toils, unless he rock his mind also with cares in the night, which invites him to take some rest. This is so void of all reason, that nothing can be imagined more vain and foolish.

Ver. 24.] Nor can any man reap the benefit of his labours, but by studying first to free his mind from over-much care and anxious thoughts: and then (instead of heaping up perpetually for his heirs) by allowing him; for a moderate and decent use of all that he hath gotten by his honest labours; cheerfully communicating them with his friends and neighbours; and lastly (in order to these), by being truly and devoutly religious, acknowledging God to be the donor of all good things; from whose bountiful hand proceeds even this power, both to enjoy all a man hath with a quiet, peaceful, and well-pleased mind, in the midst of all troubles of this life; and, in conclusion, to leave all with the like mind unto those that shall come after him.

Ver. 25.] For the truth of which, you may rely upon my experience; who, when I could have hoarded to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun.

21. For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil.

22. For what man hath of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun?

23. For all his days are sorrows, and his travel grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity.

24. ¶ There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink; and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God.

25. For who can eat, or who else can have hereunto, more than I?
26 For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy: but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to up as much as any other man, cease rather freely to enjoy the fruit of his labours; and was as forward to spend, as ever I was to get: but must acknowledge this to be the singular grace of God to me, who preserved me from that great folly of neglecting myself, for the sake of I know not whom.

Ver. 36.] For this is a blessing which God reserves for him whom he loves; whose sincere piety he rewards with wisdom to judge when, and with knowledge to understand how, he should enjoy, and take the comfort of, all that he hath; especially with inward joy, satisfaction of heart, and tranquillity of mind, in this favour of God to him; whereby the troublesome affairs of this life are tempered and seasoned: but he delivers up him who regards not God, to those least felicitous, which are his insatiable desires, and anxious cares, with busy labours and incessant pains, to increase his estate without end, and to heap up vast treasures, which God disposes afterward to those who approve themselves to him, in a pious, just, and charitable life, with contented minds.

Now what a vanity and vexation is this also to a simple and rich man? Who can ever design them? Nay, it is a sad thought to a good man, that if his son be not virtuous, the estate he leaves is not likely to prosper with him. See Annot. [e].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] Thus Themistocles, Lucullus, and others (as Melancthon observes), being weared in their attendance upon public affairs, by many unprofitable contentions, may, by the ingratitude of the people, delivered up themselves unto pleasures, as better than ill-bestowed pains.

[b] Ver. 2. Laughter.] The censure he passes upon this makes it necessary to explain it of such didoes and frantic mirth, as I have mentioned in the paraphrase.

c] Ver. 3. Give myself.] The word in the Hebrew (as the margin of our translation informs the reader) import something of extension: as in other places of scripture (Ps. xxvi. 10): because, when men indulge themselves very liberally in eating and drinking, in revels, in feasts, in the sea, and in the air, the skin of the whole body is distended.

Lay hold on.] The word signifies not simply to apprehend, but to keep under restraint what we have seized. As the Philistines are said to have taken David (had him in their power) in Gath; in the title of Ps. lxvi. Thus I have explained it here, as most agreeable to the sense of the place.

d] Ver. 4. Great works.] Include all that follow, to the end of ver. 8, consisting either in buildings, or in plantations, and water-works belonging to them; or in his household; or his stock upon his land; or his exchequer, and magazines; or in things that were for more state and magnificence, viz. royal furniture; or in great variety of vocal and instrumental music: to which some add a kind of seraglio of the most beautiful women that could be found: though for this last there is no ground to think it here mentioned; but what lies in two hard words, of which I shall give an account presently.

e] Ver. 5. Gardens.] The Hebrew word gennath, some will have to be proper places for flowers, herbs, salads, and all manner of fruit-trees; and paradiesin, which we translate "orchards," to be only woods, forests, or parks. Of which there is no certainty:

for this last word paradiesin is used but twice more in the holy scripture: and in the first of those places we translate it "forests" (Neh. ii. 8), and in the other (Cant. iv. 12), it signifies a place where pomegranates grew. And therefore it indifferently signifies either of those, I have expressed both in the paraphrase. And if we judge of such places by what the Greeks (from this word) call a parabola, they were so large as to comprehend not only all sorts of trees, both fruit-trees and others (such as cedars, cypress, &c.) but fountains and fish-ponds, and aviaries, and walks, for all kinds of beasts, wild and tame: in short, whatsoever could make a place pleasant, either by nature or art.

[f] Ver. 6. Pools.] The word bereaboth carrying in it the notion of blessing, some interpreters will have it to signify places filled and supplied by the great blessing of rain. But there is no reason for this limitation, it being as capable to signify any lake, or large hollowness in the ground, or upon it, for the reception of water, either from the clouds, or from springs, or from rivers; which are beneficial for many uses, as I have expressed it in the paraphrase.

g] Ver. 7.] Though the word baker properly belongs to oxen and cows; yet we well translate it, the "greater sort of castle," comprehending camels, asses, &c. In like manner, tzen is commonly used for sheep, but comprehends goats also; and therefore we well translate it, the "lesser sort of cattle." All which, both great and small, are comprehended under the general word mikneh, which we translate "possession."
entertainment of great persons; as I have expressed it in the paraphrase.

[2] Ver. 9. My wisdom remained.] For it was not the manner of great men, in ancient time, to pass their feasts only in eating and drinking, and, after the sottish custom now, to send the cups going round, when all was taken away; but to spend the time in pleasant, but learned discourses, or in telling stories, or propounding and resolving questions; which might whet the wit, and form men’s manners, or open the secrets of nature; and at the same time both refresh and instruct the mind. As we see at Samson’s marriage-feast he propounded a riddle to be unfolded, concerning the generation of bees, out of the carcass of a lion. In Plutarch’s Symposiumes, there are abundance of such merry and learned questions, and solved. And Athenaeus, in his Deipnosophists, hath excepted the flower of all irs, and authors, poets, philosophers, and historians. In Virgil also at the end of his first book of Aeneids, Jopas is introduced singing a philosophical song (at the feast which Dido made), concerning the motions of the moon and the sun, and in short of all that Atlas, that most famous astronomer, had taught. And in another place, Athenaeus himself relates the destruction of Troy.

[3] Ver. 10. My portion.] Though wisdom thus bridled his pleasures, yet it did not restrain him from such a free and plentiful enjoyment of them, that there was no sort which he did not taste as highly of as was possible, and that he might live happily with all. This he calls his portion, by a metaphor taken from inheritance; which being divided into parts, every one of the children had his part given him; or from lots, which as they were used among merchants, so sometimes in the dividing of inheritances; when the heirs could not agree among themselves about the equity in which they were set out for them.

[4] Ver. 11. I looked.] Having considered the value of this portion, he could not say it was much worth; but rather that there was very little in it: and therefore he prefers wisdom much before all this pleasure; and still far more before sottish and mad pleasure (ver. 12).

And yet, for all that, after he had taken the benefits of wisdom into a second consideration (ver. 13, 14), he could not but conclude again, that there is a vanity in that also. Which is threefold; as there are three ends for which men study wisdom. First, that they may provide for their safety and security; secondly, that they may commend their names to posterity; or, thirdly, that they may leave to their children what their singular prudence and great diligence have gathered together. But all these shows are vain designs.

CHAPTER III.

To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven:

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—Upon the mention of God’s overruling providences, in the latter end of the foregoing chapter, Solomon proceeds from thence to illustrate (in the first part of this chapter) both those things of which he had discourse before; viz. first, the imperfection of human wisdom; which is confined to a certain time or season, for all things that it would effect: which if we neglect, or let slip, all our contrivance signifies nothing. And, secondly, that the utmost perfection at which our wisdom can arrive in this world, consists in these things: first, in being contented in this order wherein God hath placed all things, and not disputing our selves about that which it is not in our power to remedy, or alter; or, at least, not for the present: secondly, in observing and taking the finest opportunity of doing every thing, as the most certain means to tranquillity: there being nothing that makes our minds more unquiet than striving against the stream (as we speak), and, when the wind 3 A time to kill, and a time to heal; a time to break down, and a time to build up;
4 A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance;
5 A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together; a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing;
6 A time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away; against us, labouring to bring about our ends, and to obtain our desires: and, thirdly, in taking the comfort of what we have at present; and making a seasonable and legitimate use of it: and, lastly, in bearing the vicissitudes, that we find in all human things with an equal mind; because they are necessary and insufferable.

These were the things he had suggested in the conclusion of the former chapter; and the beginning of this may have relation to every one of them. And since he had spoken before also (ver. 9, 10, of the same chapter) concerning the moderating of pleasures by wisdom, and of the study of wisdom by seasonable pleasures, I do not know but he may have respect unto that also; and therefore I have begun with it in the paraphrase.

Castalio goes still farther, and thinks the meaning of the first part of this chapter may be, that it is in vain to expect our happiness in this world, for this is no more the time and the place for it, than seed-time is the harvest. But we must stay till the next life for it; which is the proper time for complete happiness: here we must be content with a great many tears. Which is a pious meditation, but seems not to be the scope of Solomon; and therefore I have not touched upon it.

In short, he deems it injurious to himself upon the first two things, wherein men place their happiness; wisdom and pleasure: and comes not to the third till the middle of this chapter, where I shall observe it.

Ver. 1.] How vain an attempt it is to obtain the forenamed tranquillity by fixing our mind upon any one thing in this world; and how necessary it is to let the study of wisdom, for instance, and the enjoyment of pleasure, labour, and rest, take their turns, God himself hath shown us, by tying us to this order in the course of things: which, whether they be natural or depend upon our will, will have their certain appointed seasons and occasions; upon which all our designs, counsels, and endeavours have such a dependence, that if we will not observe them, we shall not only lose our labour, but miscarry vex and torment ourselves to no purpose. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 2.] As for natural things, we see in ourselves that there is a stated time for an infant's lying in the womb preparatory to him to be born; and the time afterward for its growth, and stay in the world; beyond which a man cannot go, but drops into his grave: and so it is not only with other living creatures as well as man, but with herbs, and roots, and plants, which we cannot set and sow at all times; but must take the proper season both for that and for gathering the crop when it is come to maturity, or else our labours are ill bestowed, and we find to our sorrow that we have laboured in vain.

Ver. 3.] And thus it is in the diseases of our body: there is a time when they are so infectious that they are incurable, or when it is so improper to administer physic that it doth no good, but certainly kills; when, if, in our great desire to save our lives, we employ effectual means to restore our health unto us; and so

7 A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak;
8 A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace.
9 What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he laboureth?
10 I have seen the travail, which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised in it.
11 He hath made every thing beautiful in his time: it is in other structures as well as our own bodies; there is a time when it is more proper to break down a building than it is to raise it; and when houses are built, there are seasons for repairs; and sometimes for pulling them down and erecting them anew, or else they will not stand. See Annot. [5].

Ver. 4.] Other alterations also there are in human life, which sometimes naturally move our tears; and at another time our laughter: nay, there are times not only for tears, but for the bitterest lamentations, which the funerals of our dearest relations, or the publick duties require; and again, there is a time (at a wedding suppose) which provides us so naturally, not only to be merry, but to leap and dance for joy; that it would be as absurd then to bewail ourselves, as it is to dance about the dead bodies of our friends.

Ver. 5.] And in the plantations which we make, there is a time when it is fit to pick up stones, and throw them out of our vineyards or fields of corn; and there is another time, when it will be as necessary to gather up the same stones again, to make a fence about those vineyards or fields, or to repair the highways; and as it is in these natural things, so it is in those that depend upon our own disposal: there are seasons proper for husband and wife to enjoy the fruits of their labours; and there are other times when they ought to refrain, and deny themselves even these otherwise innocent pleasures.

Ver. 6.] In like manner, in our traffic and commerce one with another, there is a time of gaining much; but there are other times, when a man must be content to lose by his commodities; sometimes also it is fit to lay up, and sometimes to get it; and at another time it will be as fit for him to spend or to give away to those that need it.

Ver. 7.] In direful disasters, also, as when God is blasphemed, it becomes us to rend our garments; but after a certain time, it will be as becoming to sew up the rent again; and as, on other occasions, the proper season is for joy, or for mourning, so in the like cases the time must be observed; so in great grief, it is to no purpose to administer comfort, till the passion be a little over; and then discourse will be as seasonable as silence was before (Job iii. 13: iv. 1, 2).

Ver. 8.] To conclude, love itself may turn into hatred; so that they who are now well-affected towards one another may be turned to enmity; and those in whose company we now delight, there may be reason hereafter to avoid: and the like turns there are in public, as well as in private affairs; there being just causes, sometimes for making war; and then, such a change in the state of things, that it is greater wisdom to conclude a peace.

Ver. 9.] And therefore, why do we fancy any thing to be settled, fixed, and constant here in this world; unless it be these opposite changes! Or, to what purpose is all our labour and travail for anything, out of the season proper for it! And what great matter is it that we then get; since we must expect another season, to part with it? See Annot. [c].

Ver. 10.] For that which I have observed from all this is, that God hath made it our business to mark time; also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end. 13 I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life. 14 And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God. 15 I know that whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever; nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it; and God doeth it that men should fear before him. 16 That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been: and God requireth that which is past. 16 ¶ And moreover I saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there. 17 I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work. 18 I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts.
CHAPTER III.

the times and seasons that are fit for the doing of all things, which hath great trouble and anxiety in it: and there is a further trouble, that after we have done what we desired, we must submit to that time and season, which will undo all again. Ver. 11.] And though we are not wont to be satisfied with this vicissitude of things, yet God, no doubt, hath disposed them thus most wisely: and there is such a beautiful order appears in several contrarieties (as, for example, of heat and cold, of day and night), that we may well conclude there is so in all manner of events, though never so opposite; which God also hath given us wisdom to discern, in part; having endued man with the understanding of the present state of things, in the age wherein he lives: yet as that is imperfect (it being beyond our skill to know what our industry will succeed, and when a change will come), so he is not able to find out what respect the present changes have to the times that are gone before; and this to come hereafter: and so cannot give an exact account of the government of God, because he sees not the beginning, and the progress, and the conclusion of every thing that comes to pass. See Annot. [d].

Ver. 12.] Wherefore long consideration and experience assure me, that, leaving these fruitless inquires and vexatious curets about the future, the only happiness that is in our power, is to make the best we can of our present condition: rejoicing that things are so well with us, and being solicitous for nothing in the world but to obtain a good hope in God, by living piously and virtuously, and doing good to others with what we have; and this not remissly and by fits, but evenly and constantly, as long as we live. See Annot. [e].

Ver. 13.] And if a man have arrived at so much happiness, as not to deny himself the use of what he hath at present, out of a vain fear of wanting in time to come, but can so freely and cheerfully enjoy the fruit of his honest labours as to be well satisfied in the midst of all the inconveniences of this life, let him not ascribe it unto his own wisdom, but thankfully acknowledge the great goodness of God herein: for it is a singular gift of him, to be able, with a quiet and contented mind, to take the comfort of those blessings which God's bounty has bestowed on us (li. 92).

Ver. 14.] And, on the other side, it is not only very foolish and vain, but a great plague, to be discontented that things go otherwise than we desire; for certain it is, God hath settled them by such an eternal and immutable law, in that course and order before described (ver. 1. &c. in which nothing is superfluous, nothing wanting), that it is not in the power of men to make the least alteration one way or other: therefore we must alter ourselves, and not our circumstances, so that we cannot change the course of things; which God hath thus immovably fixed, not to make us mis-

Ver. 15.] This alone is sufficient to silence all our unprofitable, as well as unprofitful, complaints, about that which hath always been, and ever will be. For we, in this present age, are subject to no other laws than those by which God hath governed the world from the beginning; nor will the next produce any other method than that wherein he hath already proceeded: but, though that which succeeds thrusts out what went before, it brings the very same things about again, as constantly as spring and fall, summer and winter, return in their seasons.

Ver. 16.] But, beyond all this, it is lamentable to consider how that which God hath provided as a remedy for great many evils which we bring upon another in this world, is quite perverted, and turned to be itself the greatest evil of all other. The power and authority, I mean, which are committed unto men of great power, wisdom, and dignity; who lean so much to their own affections, that I myself have observed nothing but corruption in the highest, as well as the lowest courts of judicature: for, whether men's lives or their estates were concerned, such unjust sentences were pronounced (to the condemning the innocent, and acquitting the guilty, &c.), that I could not but conclude there is nothing more dangerous than for a man who hath not that fear of God before his eyes (which I now mentioned, ver. 14), to be advanced to any public trust, and be trusted with power. So vain are they that place their felicity in these. See Annot. [g].

Ver. 17.] For, so rooted is this impiety in the hearts of men, and such arts there are to defeat the best endeavours to redress it, I could bring my thoughts about this matter to no other issue but this (in which we must all be satisfied), that there is a supreme judge of all, who will in due time make that difference between men and things, which we cannot do now: absolving and rewarding the righteous, and condemning and punishing the wicked: for as there is a time, I observed before, for all other things, so there is for this; they that govern the world have their time, and shall judge between man and beast, and between man and man; and shall declare the secrets of the heart. See Annot. [h].

Ver. 18.] But in the mean time I could not but think the condition of mankind, especially of the poorer sort, though it should be truly deplorable; which made me feel a deep sigh, and wish to God that he would be pleased to lay these great men open and manifest to themselves, and make them sensible, that 19 For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast: for all is vanity.

20 All go unto one place: all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again.

they have no reason to look down with so much contempt upon others; much less treat them like beasts destined to the slaughter: for, were they stripped of their outward power, they are so far from excelling other men, that in many regards they do not excel the very beasts. See Annot. [*]

Ver. 19.] For as the beasts are subject to many accidents which they think not of, so are all mankind, which can no more foresee several things that happen to them than the beasts themselves; or, if they herein differ from them, that they can better defend themselves from some things that befal them; yet there is one thing which makes them all equal, and that is death: for both men and beasts not only grow old, but die alike; and while they live, one sues in no other air than the other doth; which, when they can no longer breathe, a man remains as much an unprofitable lump, as a beast: and, therefore, herein can pretend to no pre-eminence above other inferior creatures; but they are both equally vain and perishing.

Ver. 20.] And being dead, their bodies are dissolved into the same principles, out of which they sprang; so that herein they are both alike again: for man, as proud as he is, derives his body from no other original than the dust; the very same dust of which the beasts are made; into which they, both men and beasts, must return again at the last.

Ver. 21.] As for the spirit, which makes all the difference between the beasts and us, that is invisible; and where shall we find a man, especially among those great persons (spoken of before), who seriously considers it! and believes that the souls of all mankind go to God that gave them (xii. 7), to be judged by him (ver. 17, of this chapter); whereas the souls of beasts perish with them? Nor herein did they differ not at all from all beasts, that having buried their minds in bratish pleasures, they have no more sense of a future life than they; but imagine that their souls die together with their bodies. So senselessly stupid are they that trample upon the rest of mankind, and yet have such ignoble thoughts of themselves, that they imagine their very souls are no longer lived than a beast. See Annot. [*]

Ver. 22.] And therefore, considering that our bodies have no privilege above the beasts, and that mankind are so liable to be abused by those who should protect them (ver. 16, 19, 30), I was confirmed in my former opinion (ii. 21), that it is best for a man herein also to imitate the beasts, by enjoying freely the good things God hath blessed him withal, and taking all the comfort he can find in them at present, without solicitous care about the future: for this is all he can be sure of; it being in no man's power to secure him, he shall enjoy that hereafter, which he makes no use of now; much less when he is dead, can he be brought back again to take any pleasure in the fruit of all his labours, or see what becomes of them.

ANNOTATIONS.
[a] Ver. 1. Sentence.] The Hebrew words zeman and gaweth signify either that point of time when things, being ripe, come forth of themselves, by the constitution of their several beings, as all natural things do: or that occasion which serves our voluntary actions, and is fit for effecting what we design. The Hebrews observe, that Solomon here reckons seven opposite seasons, of which he但是对于 a common demonstration by induction, of the truth of this general proposition in the first verse; which holds good even in virtue itself: which is not proper, but in its place. For fortune hath not always been successful (as the lord Herbert observes), nor temperance safe, nor justice opportune; the fury and insolence of the outrageous people natural, in the same insurrection, grown to that excess, that it has been greater wisdom to pass by awhile than to punish them. And it is very apparent also in our counsels, when they are conducted merely by human wisdom; which is not able, without a divine direction, to choose the most fortunate (as we call them) and happy seasons for undertakings.

[b] Ver. 3. Kill.] In the third place I have taken the liberty of following my own judgment in expounding the first part of it: which I have not referred to punishing and sparing offenders, as interpreters do; but to the condition of diseases that are in our bodies. For though the other be an excellent sense, yet this seems to be more agreeable to the wise man's meaning: because he is hitherto speaking of things natural; and the word kill is directed rather to that sense which I have given of killing, than the common one. The same may be said of the next part of the verse; there being a craziness in buildings, as well as in the body of a man: and some weather so improper to raise a fabric, that the parts will not hang together; but that which cements them is spent in pulling down a house, than in building it up.

As for the rest of the calendar or ephemeres (as the lord Bacon calls it), which the wise man hath made of the diversities of times and occasions for all actions, I need give no farther account of it here, than I have done in the paraphrase.

[c] Ver. 9. What profit.] Nor is it hard to expound the inference he makes in this verse, from the foregoing induction: which I have expressed as fully as I could in the paraphrase; and more largely in the argument of this chapter. Gregory Nazianzen thinks, he only intends to reflect upon the great inconstancy, as of all earthly things, so of human actions (sometimes, for instance, men are madly in love with a woman, and in time they as much hate her; now they are eager to get, and at another time they profusely spend; sometimes they kill, and sometimes they are killed; sometimes do nothing but talk, and at another time have not a word to say, &c.) and therefore all his labours are vain. But I have extended it farther with a reason to other things, which the forenamed induction suggests to us.

[d] Ver. 11. World in their heart.] There is greater difficulty in this verse, if we connect it with the rest of the discourse, as we ought to do. Which I haveendeavoured to explain by taking the word holass.

"The world," for the present state of things, in this age wherein we live (which is the genuine sense of it), whereas God hath given us some understanding; but not so perfect as to be able to give an account of the reason and scope of every thing that we see happening about us. We are ignorant of what went before, and of what will follow after, when we had or shall have no being here.

It is commonly understood of the works of nature. And in this sense the lord Bacon (in the beginning of his book of the Advancement of Learning) hath admirably expounded it in this manner: "In these words: 'the work of God hath wrought, from the beginning to the end,'" (chap. 111. Vol.) Solomon declares not obscurely, that God hath framed the mind of man, as a mirror, or looking-glass, capable of the image of the whole world; and as desirous to receive it, as the eye is to entertain the light; and not only delighted in beholding the variety of things, and the vicissitude of times; but ambitious to find out and discover the immovable and settled laws and decrees of nature. And though he intimates, that this whole economy of nature (which he calls "the work that God hath wrought, from the beginning to the end") cannot be found out by man; it doth not derogate from the capacity of his mind, but is to be imputed to the impediments of learning; and 'The world,' or "world," understands the circular motion of things for the service of man. But I can find no such use of the word any where, else the sense would be elegant enough, which arises from thence; viz. that this revolution being remote from our knowledge, and a secret to us, who cannot tell what day or hour it will be, we ought not to transgress the laws about that; but make use of the present, and refer the rest to God.

Methenlon also hath an unusual interpretation; which is, that God made things so, that we should sweetly enjoy them (that he understands by placing the world in man's heart), but men make the use of them unpleasant, by their wandering desires, by their vain solicitude, by their difficulty; which make them long after new things, and meddle with that which is unnecessary. Like M. Antony, who, when he had gotten the most flourishing part of the empire, could not be content; but, out of an unquiet nature, desired the whole, and so lost all. This he makes the sense of the last verse, viz. that he then tran- lates: "man cannot find out the work of God, neither the beginning nor the end of it." Therefore, as I said just now, it is wisdom to satisfy ourselves with what we have; for the present only is that which is in our power.

[f] Ver. 12, 13.] And so it follows in these two verses: the sense of which Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. liii.) hath thus briefly expressed, "the greatest good of man I persuade myself to be εἰκόνας καὶ εἰκόνας, cheerfulness of mind, and beneficence, or doing good to others; and this short pleasure alone the divine indulgence bestows upon us, if righteousness conduct all our actions.

[f] Ver. 11, 15.] And with this we must rest contented, for with all our toilsome thoughts, we cannot alter the course of things: which God, he here shows, hath immutably set; on purpose that we should be sensible of a power above ourselves. Which it is our wisdom to stand in such awe of, as not to contend with it, but submit unto it; that so we may obtain all the favour from him, which in such a state of things, as his wisdom hath appointed, can be indulged to us. And here, I think, Methenlon hath very pertinently observed, that Solomon doth not merely recite the vain complaints and endeavours of mankind, after the manner of philosophers and poets; but lays down a rule of life, as the best remedy that can be found for our disease. Which is, not to trust to ourselves, nor to indulge our curiosity and appetites; but to be sensible of our own infirmities, to fear God, to obey his commands, to keep within the bounds of our vocations, and to beg and expect the help of God, and to acquiesce in his holy will and pleasure.

[g] Ver. 16.] Unto these things it is better for us to apply ourselves, than it is to endeavour to be great and mighty: which is another vain desire of man, fancying he can thereby keep off many evils; for few can be at the top of all; and so there must he still greater than we, by whom we may be oppressed: and our vexations will be so much the greater, when with all our power we cannot hinder it. As for those that are in the very highest places (if they have not that fear of God, before spoken of, verse 13), their power doth but betray them, to do the more mischief unto themselves and others; and thereby increase the misery of mankind. This seems to be the dependence between the foregoing verses and this. Whereas in the wise man passes to the consideration of the third thing (mentioned upon ch. i. 12), unto which some aspire, as the highest happiness; viz. greatness, power, and honour. Which if a man be bad, make him so much the worse himself, and the world by his means; and if he be good, will trouble him very much, to do the mischief which they meddle with, which he cannot remedy. For Solomon himself saw several gross impurities committed (as he tells us in this verse), even by them who were appointed to be the guardians of men's lives, liberties, and enjoyments; which he, as great a king as he was, wanted ability wholly to redress; but still they went on so confidently in the most horrid and abominable courses of perversion, that he was even forced by his own sufferings to be unwilling to leave them to be judged by the supreme judge of all, God almighty. And if it were so in the reign of a good and wise king, what could be hoped for in the reign of those who were impious and injudicious, as most of the kings of Israel and Judah were? for such pervert all things by their covetousness, ambition, or folly; so that their subjects can have no justice, nor enjoy any tranquillity. And besides, they permit (as he shows afterward, ch. v.), many corruptions to creep into the divine worship; and ridiculous rather than religious ceremonies to be introduced, &c.; whereupon follows a great decay of all moral virtue.

In short, it is a great part of the vanity and misery to which we are here subject; that, as Methenlon well notes, there are many things done unjustly, even under just governors; because they are not able to look unto all things themselves, but must manage them by other men: many of which are negligent, others wicked and swayed by depraved affections; and yet craved enough to cover their own guilt. Here is the only comfort, that God notwithstanding preserveth government, and political order; and in his time will judge even kings and judges of the earth.

[h] Ver. 17.] The last words of this verse may, in my judgment, be thus illustrated, and translated out of the Hebrew: "There is a time for (judging) every purpose, and every work there;" viz. in those corrupt courts of judgment: every thing that hath been transacted in the judicatories he had been speaking of.

[i] Ver. 18.] These words, which follow the former, are variously interpreted; but they have a conspicuous sense, if they be taken in the ephoric way of the foregoing (as in reason they ought to be), without fancying, as some have done, that they are spoken in the person of an ephoric. And so I have considered them; as intended to take down the vain opinion those great men have of themselves (which makes them tyrannize over their inferiors), by representing to

CHAPTER III.
CHAPTER IV.

1 So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter.

2 Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead more than the living which are yet alive.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—Having considered the power which many times falls into the hands of unjust and cruel men, he now represents the miserable estate of those that are subject to them: as a farther argument of the vanity and vexation unto which mankind are liable in this troublesome world. And having noted some of the principal mischiefs of this sort (of which I shall give a distinct account in the paraphrase and annotations upon it), he concludes the chapter with some animadversions upon the condition of the greatest, nay, and the best, of princes: who are not so happy as the world is apt to think them.

Ver. 1.] But I have not yet done with the consideration of the miseries which mankind suffer by the abuse of that power which is necessarily placed in the hands of some persons for the good of others (lil. 16). For, reflecting again upon it, I observed the innumerable ways that were practised in this world for the undoing of others; both by violence and actions, and by fraud and calamities (as well as by unjust decrees), whereby so many were crushed, that nothing was to be seen or heard but the tears and cries, the sighs and groans, of such as lay in a deplorable condition, and could find no relief; no, not so much as one to comfort them: for such was the greatness of their oppressors, who had gotten all power into their hands; that as they could not defend themselves against them, so nobody else durst express their compassion towards them, much less plead for them; for fear of being served in the same kind themselves.

See Annot. [a].

Ver. 2.] Which made me think it was better to be among the dead, who have made a happy escape from all these calamities, than to remain still alive; either to suffer under this tyranny, or to live in perpetual fear of it; or to behold such great grief of heart (but without power to help them) which many miserable wretches endure.

Ver. 3.] Or rather (for why should I compare the living with those, who, though they now lie at rest in their graves, have been heretofore very sorely afflicted?) much more desirable than either of these, is it not to have come into the world at all; and so to 3 Yea, better is he than both they, which hath not yet been, who hath not seen the evil work that is done under the sun.

4 But go on to consider all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour. This is also vanity and vexation of spirit.

5 The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh.

have but no sense of the miseries which the dead have formerly felt, and the living undergo.

Ver. 4.] For besides what they suffer from mighty oppressors, they give one another a great deal of trouble; pride, ambition, emulation, envy, and hatred, reigning so uncontrollably every where among all orders and ranks, all trades and professions, that when a man hath taken a great deal of honest pains, in some useful work, and brought it to perfection, instead of gaining credit by it, and being honoured for it, his neighbours look awry upon him: nay, he is maligned, disparaged, and traduced by those who either cannot or will not imitate (but only carp at) his ingenious labours. So vain it is to exeal others in art or industry; which procure a man ill will, when he looks for thanks and commendations; and such an affliction it is to a man's spirit, to labour hard for an ungrateful world; who are tormented by that which should please them; and cannot see any worth in another, but they are vexed within themselves. See Annot. [b].

Ver. 5.] But see now (as a further instance of the vanity of mankind) what use some make of this; who are so absurdly foolish, as to be utterly discouraged, and to sit down in perfect idleness; because there are such oppressions, on one hand, from those above them (ver. 1), and such emulations, on the other hand, from those that are equal with them, and under them (ver. 4). Yea wise resolution this! to do nothing, because others do ill; not to satisfy one's self, because others will be displeased: not to satisfy, did I say! nay, he is hunger-bitten, and eaten up with cares how to live; he hath not a rag to his back to cover his nakedness; having reduced himself and family, by his laziness, to extreme penury. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 6.] And though he want not excuses for his folly, yet they are as idle as his slotto: for he senselessly applies that common saying to his purpose, "One handful with ease is better than two without it." Which is very true, if rightly understood; and may serve to reprove both him and those from whom he learns this folly; for as idleness and carelessness always go together (and therefore he in vain expects to have so much as one handful without labour), so is a moderate estate gotten honestly, with moderate diligence, and enjoyed handsomely, with perfect contentment, better than the greatest treasures gotten by oppression.
CHAPTER IV.

6 Better is an handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit.
7 ¶ Then I returned, and I saw vanity under the sun.
8 There is one alone, and there is not a second; yes, he hath neither child nor brother: yet is there no end of all his labour; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, 'What shall I do for my soul to live now?'
9 ¶ Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour.
10 For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but wo to him that is alone when he falleth: for he hath not another to help him up.
11 Again, if two tie together, then they have heat: but how can one be warm alone?
12 And if one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken.
13 ¶ Better is a poor and a wise child than an old and foolish king, who will no more be admonished.
14 For out of prison he cometh to reign; whereas also he that is born in his kingdom cometh poor.
15 I considered all the living which walk under the sun, with the second child that shall stand up in his stead.
ECCLESIASTES.

16 There is no end of all the people, even of all that have been before them: they also that come after shall not rejoice in him. Surely this also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Ver. 16.] Nor is this a thing that will have an end, but a humour so rooted in all mankind; that as, in all preceding time (before this king and son were born), they have been weary of that which they have long enjoyed; so this young prince, who is now followed with such applause, must not think that it will last always that they have so little delight in him as the present generation doth in his father; and, when he grows old, court his son, after the same fashion, as they now do him, being young. From all which it appears, that happiness is not to be found in honour and dignity; no, not in the very highest pitch of it, which is the kingly power; for he envied; and that which he calls, for a lie to express by two words, care and trouble, vexation and grief, to be in the Hebrew that signifies, when it is taken in an ill sense, all those vicious affections, which are the causes or the effects, of envious emulation, at the good qualities or prosperity of another person. Which St. James calls παράδος επάρδος, "better zeal or envying," (1) or, in St. Paul's phrase, it is worth to express by two words, παράδος and επάρδος, strife (or making hate) and envying; Rom. xiii. 13, "strife and envying," i. e. contentious or factions emulation; Phil. i. 15, envy and strife, i. e. invidious contention.

[6] Ver. 5. Foldeth his hands.] Here he passes to those evils which I called internal; which come not from others, but from ourselves. For some (seeing gers, troubles, and vexations cares, which very much disturb and perplex their spirits. See Annot. [1].

[7] Ver. 9, &c. Upon the occasion of the foregoing observation, ver. 8 (the better to represent the folly of that selfish humour he there describes), he sets forth the benefit of society, which Greg. Thaugartus here calls Koranica Domus, "living in fellowship and communion together." This he shows is profitable; first to procure us greater happiness, which is the subject of this ninth verse; secondly, to preserve us in the enjoyment of that happiness when we have attained it: as he shows by these three instances. First, it is the beauteous husband's, secondly to strengthen them against them. (ver. 11; thirdly, to repel them when they actually assault us, (ver. 12). Where is a proverbial saying of a triple cord or thread; like to which there are many in other authors; but I forbear to fill this paper with them, and leave those also who have a mind to allegorical applications of these three things, to seek for them in other books. For my business is only to give a brief account of the literal sense, which is this, in short: that a company will afford us his help and assistance many ways; and, if there were no other benefit to be reaped from him, this would be an exceeding great comfort; to have one in our adversity, into whose bosom we may cast out our sorrows, which will be the lighter if we see there is any body that sympathizes with us in our calamities.

[g] Ver. 13, 14.] And thus, having represented the miserable effects of power abused to oppression, which bereaves men of the sweetest comforts of life, making them avoid society, he returns to consider the wretched estate of such oppressors, though never so mighty. Both from their own folly, ver. 12, 14, (where that expression is very remarkable, he is made or becomes poor in his kingdom, as Dr. Hammond well expounds it upon Matt. i. 10) and from the fickleness and inconstancy of the people's affections; which create a great many troubles even render a reason, as Bishop Sanderson speaks) he utters sentences (but it is "like a parable in the mouth of a fool," a speech full of reason in itself, but wit- lessly applied) and says, that "better is a handful with quietness," &c. Wherein he makes a show of being the most contented soul that lives: but is far from it; desiring not content as much as the most toiling and moiling wretch in the world, if he might but have it, and never sweat for it. Thus some understand this sixth verse: which others take to be Solomon's advice to the envious spoken of before, or to the covetous spoken of afterward, that they would be contented with their con- tentations; and, seeing the value of things as it is, and would have it, and never sweat for it. Thus this is a great estate brings along with it in abundance. Unto all which I have had respect in the paraphrase upon this verse.

One, not a second! Is properly a man without an heir, or a successor; as ver. 15.
CHAPTER V.

I KEEP thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear, than to give rest, Solomon shows all those who would attain true tranquility of mind, what they must do, and what they must avoid in the worship of God.

And about the middle of the chapter, as I shall observe in the annotations, proceeds to consider the last of those four things wherein men place their happiness.

Ver. 1.] And now, lest any man add to the afflic-and torment of his spirit, even by that which is the only cure for it, let every one, who would be a true worshipper of God, abstain from the exercises of the happiness we seek, take care to avoid that negligence which is observable in many people; and to approach with all reverence, both of body and soul, into his blessed presence; but do not think to please him with mere postures of devotion; no, nor with sacrifice and incense without the obligation of an obedient heart. Both these are displeasing to God, and are vain exercises, in which the men who would do him honor, and seek the things that are best, might be of a better mind, and of a better temper, but were not content to do so.

CHAPTER V.

ARGUMENT.—Under an ill government in the state, religion itself is commonly corrupted in the church. And therefore having set forth the miseries people endure under the oppressions of an abused power, and the extremes of folly into which it drives them; he begins this chapter with a correction of those errors that are in religion. Which is the only remedy, indeed, the only comfort we have against all the troubles to which we are subject in this world. Those who are possessed of the true understanding of God, and of his will, and acquaintance in his pleasure; than with all the sacrifices and offerings in the world, which the wicked may bring him as well as the good.

To prevent therefore this new folly into which men are apt to run, when they intend to cure all the 2 Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God: for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth, therefore let thy words be few.

3 For a dream cometh through the multitude of business; and a fool’s voice is known by multitude of words.

4 When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it: for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed.

5 Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay.

6 Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin: neither say thou before the angel that it was an error: wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thine hands?

7 For in the multitude of dreams and many words there are also divers vanities: but fear thou God.

8 ¶ If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they.

9 ¶ Moreover the profit of the earth is for all: the king himself is served by the field.
CHAPTER V.

10 He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity.

11 When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good is there to the owners thereof, save the beholding of them with their eyes?

12 The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep.

13 There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt.

14 But those riches perish by evil travail: and

And yet, such is the vanity of mankind, that, disregarding these riches, which lie not very deep in the earth, all their business is, with incessant pains and danger to dig into its bowels for gold and silver: which tempt them also to oppress and squeeze the poor, to perpetrate judgment, and do all manner of evil, to extort their money from them. See Annot. [k].

Ver. 10.] And what can it do for him that sets his heart upon it, but only to increase his desires, that they can never be satisfied! For though necessary things have certain bounds set them by nature, beyond which we do not desire them; yet money, and riches, and all unnecessary things, are unlimited; and, therefore, excite an endless appetite after them; which very appetite also deprives him, who indulges it, of the fruit of all his abundance; for imagining he parts with so much of his happiness, as he doth of his money, he hath it not to make such provision for his pleasure; nor scarce for his necessity. This is another strange folly, or rather madness, which infests mankind; and miserably torments them. See Annot. [l].

Ver. 11.] But let us suppose that he mesth his riches; yet it is but a small portion of them that he can enjoy; and as his estate increases, the greater family and retinue (if he will live like himself) he must maintain; who have a larger share than himself in the daily provision that is made by his expenses. And as for the rest, that is not expended (which he calls peculiarly his), he hath no other benefit from it, but only that it feeds and entertains his eyes: from which he sees thus much: that he is richer than he was before him; if he keep a good house willingly, that he see and be continually supported by his hospitality; but this very thing, if he be covetous, is his torment, that he beholds so many mouths, which eat at his cost and charges. See Annot. [k].

Ver. 12.] And as he that tills his ground, or serves him in any other labour, hath commonly a better appetite, and stronger digestion, and therefore more health, than himself; so he sleeps soundly, and is recruited with new vigour against the morning, whether his supper be small or large; when his rich master, if he eat sparingly, hath his head so full of cares and fear, or if he cram himself, hath it so filled with unquiet vapours, that he cannot sleep a wink; or tosses up and down so restlessly, that he is not at all refreshed by it, but, by his cudgels, prepares matter for many diseases. See Annot. [l].

Ver. 13.] And, besides all this, there is another thing which is very calamitous, and may rather be called a grievous plague than a mere affliction: that these things have certain bounds set them by nature, and preserved with a great deal of care, from thence expecting their felicity, prove, in the issue, their utter undoing: for I myself have seen some of these mischievous men murdered by their servants, or by thieves, many by their own children, that they might be masters of these riches; which bring them also, perhaps, at the last into the same or the like destruction. See Annot. [n].

Ver. 14.] Or, if this happen not, these riches perish (to their no small grief and trouble) by fire; or shipwreck; or bad bargains; or ill debtors; or those very crafty practices whereby he seeks to increase his estate; or by some other misfortune or misadventure; so that the sea, whom he thought to have left possessed of abundance of wealth, hath nothing at all to support a wretched life. See Annot. [n].

Ver. 15.] These things, indeed, do not always happen, but this which follows doth: that, though he die possessed of all that he hath gotten, yet he cannot carry one farthing away with him; but in this, he and the poorest wretch are both alike, that, as he came naked into this world, so he must be stripped again when he goes out of it; and, though his labour hath been great, and his estate no less, yet it is not in his power to take along with him so much as a winding-sheet; but what others please to bestow upon him.

Ver. 16.] This is another grievous affliction, and sore torment, to mankind, especially to the wealthy, that the things, on which they have set their hearts, cannot accompany them into the other world; for as the richest man that ever was brought nothing hither, so he can carry nothing thither; but must leave all that he hath behind him: and then, what is left behind, is but the shape of his goods, and doth differ from a mere beggar? But in this only, that he hath taken a world of pains to no purpose; for that which gives no satisfaction, and which he can hold no more than he can the wind.

Ver. 17.] And as at death he can find no comfort in all his wealth, so he took as little, perhaps, in his life; but dwelt obscurely, and, denying himself even what he had, led such a sad, melancholy, and sordid life, that his meat, and his drink, and the very light itself gave him no pleasure: for such a man never thinks himself happy, but when some hope of gain shines upon him; and therefore at other times, he pine, and grieve, and fret, and vexes himself, at every thing that makes an expense, or crosses his covetous desires and designs; insomuch that the sickness of the soul appears in his pale and careful looks, and in his lean and meagre body; which consumes and wastes, even by the sorrow and sadness, the vexation and displeasure of his mind. See Annot. [o].

Ver. 18.] Behold, therefore, the truth of that observation, which I have made more than once (ii. 21; iii. 12, 13, 22), and now repeat again; that it is best for a man, and most becoming, freely to use and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him: for it is his portion. 10 Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given him power to enjoy the riches he hath gotten by his honest labours; both for the constant supply of all the necessities of nature, and for moderate delight and pleasure, for the entertainment of his friends, and the relief of his poor neighbours; and this not for a fit, but all the time that God is pleased to continue him in this world: for this is all that falls to his share; or that can truly be called his part, in the good things of this life; and the only way to prolong his days, and enlarge his portion in them. See Anot. [p.]

Ver. 19. And whosoever he be, whom God hath blessed, not only with plenty and abundance of worldly goods, but also with such a noble and generous mind, that he is not their slave, but truly master of them; being able to enjoy them innocently, and to take his full share in them, and that with cheerfulness and not with greediness to others; let him be very thankful to almighty God for so great a happiness: and acknowledge it to be a singular gift of his bounty, wherewith he rewards his honest labours.

Ver. 20. For he that is thus highly favoured of God, will not think life tedious or irksome; but (forgetting all) his past toils, and taking no care for the future), spend his life most pleasantly; because God hath given him his very heart's desire, and he hath attained the scope of all his labours: in that inward tranquillity of mind, or rather joy and gladness of heart, wherewith God hath compensated all his pains, and testified his extraordinary kindness to him. ANNOTATIONS.

[4] Ver. 1. To prevent or cure that folly mentioned in the argument of the chapter, he advises three things about the worship of God. The first of them is in this verse; to look to the disposition of their mind, when they go to God's house. And this pious disposition of mind consists also in three things: first, in the house of God he is worshipped: secondly, in a reverent behaviour there; suitable to the great thoughts we have of God, and to the humble sense we have of our own meanness: expressed by keeping or observing the feet: i. e. taking care to put off their shoes, or sandals, as the manner was in those countries; and to go barefoot into the sanctuary, which was the normal manner of doing, uncovering the head in our churches, &c. as Mr. Mede well discourses in more places than one (book ii. p. 441, 516), and then lastly, in readiness of the will to obey all the divine precepts as the best of sacrifices. For this is the sacrifice of wise and good men; and all other sacrifices without this are but the sacrifices of fools and the people of God are able, many times, to furnish the altar with more burnt-offerings than the best of men. But they are such fools as not to consider, that this very thing increases their guilt: that they imagine God will be pleased with the sacrifice of beasts, without the sacrifice of themselves; in entire obedience to his will. So our translation seems to understand the last clause of this verse: which may be thus also translated, "For they make no conscience to do evil." It is no part of their religion to abstain from wickedness: but fancying by their sacrifices they shall atone for that, they do not fear to commit it. To this purpose Malancthon expounds it more plainly than any that I have read.

[5] Ver. 6. Here he gives the second advice: which is about prayer, and about vows to God, or (as eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God.

20 For he shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart.

St. Jerome seems to take it, and to which Melancthon wholly confutes it) about the doctrines we deliver concerning God; which should be very well considered, before we affirm any thing of them. The first two are most proper to the place, especially the latter of them: both which I have comprehended in the paraphrase of this verse.

[c] Ver. 3. The reason for the foregoing precept (of not using many words), taken from the consideration of God's greatness and our meanness (ver. 2), together with the enforcement of it in this verse, is thus explained by St. Jerome: He requires us, that, whether we speak or think of God, we should not venture beyond our ability; but remember our imbecility; and that, as far as the heaven is distant from the earth, so much do our thoughts fall short of the excellence of his will. Therefore it is that the more we ought to be very moderate: for as a man that is full of thoughts commonly dreams of those things whereof his head is full, so he that attempts to discourse much of the divinity falls into folly. Or rather thus: Our words ought therefore to be few, because even those things which we think we know, we see through a glass, and in our own sense we do but dimly comprehend; that, which we fancy we comprehend. So that when we have said a great deal (and to the purpose, as it seems to us), the conclusion of our disputation is folly.

And so much, we may be certain, he suggests unto us, that in a multitude of words spoken unto God (for 1. 30. he mentions it), there are fewer of them as idle as men's thoughts are in a dream. For the third verse sounds thus in the Hebrew: "For a dream proceeds from (or by) a multitude of toilsome business; and the voice of a fool from (or by) the multitude of words." That is, if a man have a multitude of cares in his mind all the day, they will produce a voice; and in our own sense we shall do but dream dreams, if that proposition which we translate from, be translated with; in this manner: "As dreams come with a multitude of business (i. e. bring before the mind, in a confused manner, what we have been doing or thinking of all day), so a fool's voice comes with a multitude of words," i. e. he utters a great deal of incoherent, confused stuff, &c. thus. The voice of a fool comes in a multitude of words. And then the sense will run thus: As a multitude of business tires a man, and makes him but dream at last about it (and therefore he had better leave off, before he be unfit to attend it), so when a man enlarges himself too far in his prayers or discourses of God, he doth but babble in the conclusion, and therefore had better be shorter.

[6] Ver. 4. And now follows the third advice, about the performing of vows that have been made. Which is double; first, not to delay the performance, nor put it off from time to time (which is the subject of this verse, lest we be tempted, at last, not to perform our vows at all); which is the second thing of which he speaks in the next words, ver. 5, 6, where he cautious against excesses, which men are apt to make for not being as good as their intentions.
Greg. They sall it be made good: it is only the beginning of a good thing, and wants its finishing; which, if it have not, it becomes ugly and odious.
For God loves not (that is, hates) to be so dealt withal, as if he did either not understand, or not mind, what we say to him; or would put up that affright which the poorest man cannot bear.
With less upon himself as not only abused, but despised, when men give him fair words, which either have no meaning, or deceive him when he depends upon them. This Solomon represents in the fifth verse as far worse than promising nothing at all; in which men may be unkind, but in this they are unjust.
[y.
[6] Ver. 6.] And he presseth it farther in this verse where by malach, "angel," there are those who understand that particular angel, which is supposed by some (but cannot be certainly proved) to attend upon every particular person; others understand the priest, who is God's minister: but I have followed Mr. Mede (book ii. p. 358), who takes angel here collectively, for many angels, but not for three, but result.
Verse, Gen. iii. 2, 7, which attended upon the divine majesty in his house, where the vow he is here speaking of was made (ver. 1). Which angelical minister in God's house was represented to the Jews, by filling all the curtains of the tabernacle with the pictures of cherubims (Exod. xxvi. 36, 37), and by carving the image of the cherub which stood between the curtains (1 Kings xvi), and by the ark of the testimony being overspread with two mighty cherubimns (having their wings lifted up, and their faces looking down towards it, and towards the mercy-seat), called the "cherubims of glory," i.e. of the divine presence (Heb. ix. 5). And to all to signify, that it was a day of awe and reverence, that the blessed angels, out of duty, give their attendance; and therefore the LXX. I observe, in this place, instead of "before the angel" have κορυφωσων του θεου, "before the face or presence of God!" whose ministers the angels were, and before whom the vows men engaged themselves in being made; they were without excuses, or of their delays, to make them good.
As for the vulgar translation of those words [it is an error] which is this, "there is no providence;" I have taken no notice of it, because it doth not seem to be the genuine meaning; for why should a man make any vows, who believes no providence over him?
Unless we will say, that he might alter his opinion afterward; and so we may put both senses together thus: I was in an error: there was no providence; and therefore I need not trouble myself about my vows.
[7] Ver. 7.] In these words he concludes his discourse about religion, with a repetition (as some take it) of the third verse, a little varied and enlarged.
Which may be thus paraphrased, according to our translation: "To sum up all that concerns this matter, since in a multitude of words, as dreams, there must needs be much vanity; therefore have a greater reverence of God than to speak any thing rashly, or to make larger promises to him than thou art truly wise to make, both vanity and words are multiplied; therefore fear God. Which may have this meaning: they do but merely dream of God, and are not awakened to a lively sense of him, who make either those vain excesses, or those idle promises: of which that thou mayest not be guilty, possess thy soul with an awful dread of his majesty. This is exactly agreeable to the Hebrew, if we take vanity to relate unto the excesses of that verse or error before mentioned, and words and promises: and by "multitude of dreams," understand a great many conceotions concerning God;
more like dreams, than waking thoughts of him.
Interpreters explain the words many other ways, whom the learned reader may consult: I have followed my own conjectures; and shall also propose another translation of the words, which seems to me very natural and easy; which is this: "When, in abundance, dreams, and vanities, and words, are multiplied, then fear thou God." That is, have a great care of thyself, and let the dread of God overawe thee, lest thou offend, when thy head is hot and full of dreams and vain imaginations, which dispose thee to speak rashly of God.
[8] Ver. 8.] As the foregoing verse concluded his discourse about religion, so this concludes the third general head, whereby he demonstrates the vanity of all things, begun iii. 16. Which he here admonishes us, should not too much disturb, much less quite astonish us: because God will set all right in his due time. So he began it.
And here it is the only question, who is meant by the high: whether God or his viceroy, the king here on earth. I have expounded it of the latter; because otherwise the same thing must be said over again immediately, which is not unusual, indeed, in scripture; but where there is no necessity of it, and where the words will better bear another meaning, I have so expounded it. And the last word of the verse will no way be so plain, as by referring it both to the high person mentioned before, and to all his inferior potenates and judges, whom he observes from on high; that is, from his throne, or from his seat of judgment. Where he ought to call them to an account, and examine what they do and what are made by them; if he do not both, he and they are observed by the supreme Judge of all, and shall be accountable to him, whether they will or not.
[9] Ver. 9.] And now he seems in this next verse to make a transition to the fourth general head (mentioned in the beginning), concerning the vanity of those things, which are not in the least useful in getting and keeping up a great deal of money.
It is an obscure verse, both in its connexion and in some of its phrases; and therefore is diversely expounded by interpreters. To help out the connexion, I have made bold to prefix a little, and also to add such a conclusion, in my paraphrase upon it, as I took to be most agreeable to scripture (whose just what went before. I have expressed also both senses of the last clause, which we render, "the king is served by the field;' but may more literally be translated, "the king is a servant (or is addicted) to the field." For anciently the greatest persons did not think it below them to follow husbandry (whose just raises Cicero hath given in his Offices, but especially in his book De Senectute), as we are taught by the examples of Hiero, Philoneter, Atalus, Archi-ECCLESIASTES.

laus, Cyrus the younger, in profane story; and by the example of king Uzziah in scripture (2 Chron. xxii. 10). Which did not at all abate their courage, or dull their wit; but only made the one more patient of toil and labour, and the other more solid and more serious. Whence it is that we find the greatest captains among the Romans, such as Camillus, Regulus, Fabius, Cato, Cincinnatus, were fetched from the plough: as Gideon among the Israelites was from the threshing-floor; and Elisha called to the high office of a prophet, as he was driving one of the twelve ploughs his father had going in the field.

And therefore Maldonate's translation of these words is not to be despised; who (and he alone, as I can find) thinks they are capable of being rendered thus: "By following husbandry diligently, a man may grow so rich as to become a king." Melanchton alone translates the whole verse thus: "The king in the earth is above all for the tillage of the field." What is Solomon, saith he, distinguisheth a king from a tyrant. A tyrant depopulates his country, and lays all waste; a good king cherises his people, especially honest husbandmen and farmers; and loves to see them thrive, together with all good arts. The Vulgar Latin, I suppose, aimed at something of this, though it be taken otherwise by those that follow it. Thus the tyrant makes a little passage in a Persian writer, quoted by Mr. Pocock (in his notes upon Abulfarajji, p. 202, 203), "That in this country they kept a solemn feast every year; wherein the king descended from his throne, laid aside his royal apparel, threw away the veil from his face, and conversed with most ordinary people, even with the lowest sort of peasants, with whom he ate, saying, 'I am one of you; or can the world subsist without tillage, which is performed by your pains;' and that tillage subsists, it is owing to the king: so that neither of us being able to subsist without the other, we are, as it were, individual brethren."

There are those that comprehend pasturage, as well as tillage, under these words; because the ancient patriarchs were shepherds. But there is no need of this; and husbandry or gardening was far more ancient: even as old as Adam; and after the flood we find Noah thus employed; as Isaac also was in succeeding times. [7] Ver. 10.] The latter end of this verse runs thus in the Hebrew: "Whoos lovey (viz. silver) reaps no fruit of his abundance?" i. e. doth not enjoy it, as St. Jerome expounds it, which is very often the miserable condition of worldly-minded men.

[k] Ver. 11.] The latter end of this verse, also, is capable of contrary senses; which I have expressed in the paraphrase, but shall not give an account of it here, because I see these annotations already grow too large. For which cause I will not note particularly every thing that is observable in the following verses; but only touch upon some of them, under this observation, that he seems to demonstrate the vanity of that sort of happiness which men place in riches, from ten considerations. The first two are contained in the tenth verse, that the desires of such men are insatiable: and the more insatiable they are, the less they enjoy of what they have.

The third and fourth in the eleventh verse; that if they will enjoy it, the more they have, the more others must also have of it, and the pleasure of it is then more small; hence, the more they partake, the more many people eat and drink at their cost. [7] The fifth—verse 12—that their servants commonly sleep more sweetly than they. For so hafed (which we translate "labouring men") signifies "one that serves;" that undertakes work for another; or any way ministers unto him. [m] The sixth, that their riches expose them to the danger even of their life; by poison, or by open violence, verse 13. Where the first words rai chala "sore evil," import such an evil as makes one sick, when he be by that means especially what he fears it. For the Hebrew word chalah always carries in it the notion of sickness and weakness, and that sometimes accompanied with pain and torment (as in the case of Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 1), and proceeding from a deadly wound; as in the case of Ahab (1 Kings xxii. 1). It may therefore be translated here a tormenting or a killing thing. For an evil that disables a man, and makes him so feeble and languishing, that he is unfit for any thing. For the LXX. frequently render the noun that comes from hence ἀφοσία: see verse 17 of this chapter.

[n] And, seventhly, though they escape these dangers, there are many other ways whereby their riches may be lost, was set up to be included in that phrase (ver. 14) injan na, "an evil business, or matter," which may signify, as well the way of their perishing, as that they perish with the great grief and affliction of him that loseth them. Whether that way be by their very merchandise in the way of their trade: or by their own frauds and subtleties in merchandise, which they overreach themselves; or, lastly, by other accidents, as we call them, such as fire, storms, &c.

And then follows the eighth, that he leaves his son a beggar; which is no small trouble to them both, he having bred his son in expectation of an estate, which never comes to him; or if it do, neither father nor son can enjoy it more than the tenth verse. [14.] Which is the ninth thing: if their riches do not leave them, they must leave their riches (ver 16). [o] And whilst they live (which is the last, ver. 17), they spend their time, perhaps, either in filthy lusts (as Gregory Thaumaturgus understands these words, "cathet in darkness") with vile harlots; or in wretched niggardlie, and such scald penuriousness, that the miseries of it possesseth himself; taking no joy, no comfort, in any thing that he possessed. So darkness signifies, being opposed to light in scripture, which denotes joy and gladness: and thus the LXX. here explain it by adding a word, "in darkness and in mourning." It may refer also to his dismal habit of (to which I have had before mention made in the paraphrase) the place, where he hopes nobody can find him; or in a room, whose windows are shut up and barred for fear of thieves.

The last clause of this verse runs thus. word for word, in the Hebrew; "Sorrow is multiplied (or there is much sorrow), and sickness, and wrath," the force of which I hope I have expressed in the paraphrase. The phrase shall only note, that the first word "sorrow" (as was observed ch. i.) includes in it indignation, together with heaviness; and the next word "sickness" includes in it pain and anguish, as was observed before; and the last word (ketseph) "wrath," denotes the highest commotion of that sort. For being applied to the sea, it signifies such a boiling rage as makes it foam. There is another word, indeed, which we render "hot displeasure:" but this is joined with it (Ps. xxxix. 1), as equivalent to it, or the effect of it.

[p] From all which he concludes this chapter, as he had done his discourse upon the foregoing subjects, with this consideration (which Mr. Bp. with his intercalations), that the greatest blessing a man can enjoy in this life, is to have a heart to use what God hath given him, for his own honest pleasure; with due acknowledgments to God, and charity to others, verse 19—20, where (ver. 19), there are two words to express abundance of worldly good, as I have paraphrased them. The last of them, οἰκεῖον, is larger than the former, comprehending all manner of goods (cattle and all) which a man gathers together. For it seems, by a transposition of letters, to be derived from κανάς, to collect or gather (ch. 8); from which comes the Latin word census; the revenues which a man is esteemed to have, and accordingly is rated and pays subsidies.

CHAPTER VI.

1 There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men:
2 A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease.
3 If a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial; I say, that an untimely birth is better than he.
4 For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness.

CHAP. VI.

Argument.—The first ten verses, at least, of this chapter, are a continuation of the same argument he handled in the latter part of the foregoing: and therefore ought to be connected with it. For they set forth the vanity of riches in the possession of a covetous wretch: who only increases the number of unhappy men in this world: being never the better for anything that he enjoys, as he shows in the conclusion of the chapter.

Ver. 1.] But, alas! this divine benefit, though above all others, is coveted by very few: for I have observed this most wretched, miserable humour reigning among mankind; which, though it be the greatest mischief, is grown so common, that it hath overspread the whole world. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 2.] When a man is blessed by God, with such abundance of money, and goods, and height of honour, that he need not, unless he will, want any thing which his largest desires can wish, should administer to his pleasure; yet so great is his ingratitude to God, and his uncharitableness to men, that for these and other sins, God denies him the power to enjoy these gifts of his bounty, to which he is a slave, rather than their master: for he possesses them, as if they were not his own, but kept by him for somebody else; and those not his children, nor his kindred, but a mere stranger, perhaps: who (either in his lifetime, or after he is dead) devours all that he hath saved. What can be more senseless than this? nay, what sorer plague can infect mankind? See Annot. [b].

Ver. 3.] Unless it be this, that one of this sort of men, being blessed also with abundance of children, and with an exceeding long life; yet thereby is made only so much the more, and so much the longer, miserable: being so solicitous for posterity, that he hath no heart to take the comfort of any thing he possesses at present: no, nor so much as to take order for his decent funeral when he is dead; but he goes out of the world without any notice that he hath lived in it. Of such a one I pronounce, that an abortive, which came into the world before its time, is not so despicable as he. See Annot. [e].

Ver. 4.] For though in this they are both alike,

5 Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other.

6 ¶ Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place?

7 All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled.

8 For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living?

9 ¶ Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire: this is also vanity and vexation of spirit.

10 That which hath been is named already, that they come into the world to no purpose; and go out of it so obscurely, that nobody minds their departure; and leave no memory behind them that they have been in it. See Annot. [d].

Ver. 5.] Yet in this they differ, that an abortive, having never seen the light of the sun, much less been acquainted with anything in this world, had no desire to enjoy that of which it was perfectly ignorant, and was as utterly insensible of grief and pain, as it was of joy and pleasure: whereas this man's insatiable desires, carrying him after every thing he sees, torment his soul with anxious thoughts, care, and labour; which not only make him pine away with grief for what he cannot get, but deprive him of the comfort of what he hath. And how much better is it never to live at all than to live only to disquiet a man's self with restless solicititude of mind, and toil some painful body, for that which he can neither keep, nor part withal, with any contentment?

Ver. 6.] Men are so fond of life, indeed, that because the one lives long, and the other not at all, they imagine the former to be incomparably more happy: but let us suppose this covetous wretch to live more than as long again as the oldest man that ever was, what is he the better for it, when his greedy desires, not suffering him to enjoy his goods, multiply his miseries equally to his years? Which will expire also at last, and then, what are his riches able to do for him? can they privilege him from going down into the grave, and rotting there like the abortive? See Annot. by [a].

Ver. 7.] And while he lives, to what purpose is his restless labour? Seeing if he desire only what is necessary, it is easily provided; and, having food and raiment, a man may be contented: and if he extend his desires farther, they are infinite; and therefore can never meet with any satisfaction.

Ver. 8.] For let a man be otherwise never so wise as well as rich, yet if he bridle not his desires, he is little better than a fool: and he that is poor, but hath so much understanding as to know how to behave himself among men suitably to his condition, and to be contented therewith, is incomparably the wiser and the happier man. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 9.] It being much better to enjoy what a man hath at present than to live upon the hopes of that 12 For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?

"sore evil" (v. 13, 16) is here called cholri ra, an "evil disease," and sickness of grievous torment. Which is only an inversion of the words, the same sense being still preserved.

[5] Ver. 3. Days of his years. &c.] He seems to represent in this verse a higher degree of that evil disease, by the example of one who hath not only great store of goods, but lands and honour, but also abundance of children; and such firm health, that he lives to a great age. Which is expressed by two phrases, which we translate thus, "lived many years, so that the days of his years be many!" but to avoid tautology the latter clause should be thus translated, "and the days of his years be abundantly sufficient," so much, that he cannot reasonably expect or desire more. For this rah signifies in many places where we translate it enough; Gen. xxiv. 55, "straw and provender enough!" Gen. xxxiii. 11, "I have enough, my brother." And yet this man, thus abundantly provided for a long happiness, doth no good, either to others or to himself, with what he possesseth: but grudgeth even the expenses of a funeral, after he can no longer enjoy anything wherein he delighteth. His reason indeed, is "he have no burial." Which are generally understood, I confess, of lying neglected, without any interment: which the Hebrews (every one knows) looked upon as a great judgment (see Jer. xxii. 19): and so Anton. Carraus glosses upon these words, Why the just judgment of God, such wretches who would not feed the poor while they lived, become the food of dogs, or crows, when they are dead.

[6] Ver. 4. He cometh in. Is born. With vanity. Or in vain, to no purpose. Which some refer to the covetous wretch, others to the abortive before named: but I have referred to both. For this makes the clearest sense; if in the next verse (ver. 5) we suppose that he compares these two together, nd prefers the latter before the former; as he plainly doth in the conclusion of it.

[7] Ver. 5. Sees no good.] To see, is to enjoy, as the phrase is used in many places: particularly Lev. xx. 27; John xviii. 21. And the sense of this verse is, That the life of a covetous man is so far from making him happier than he who never lives at all, that if he should live as long again as Methuselah, he would only be so much the more wretchedly miserable. For when he hath tired himself with labour, he hath not taken one step towards satisfaction: which he might have had with less pains, if he had taken the right course to it (ver. 7).

[8] Ver. 7. Whence.] There is so great a difficulty in this verse, that I did not know how to connect it with the foregoing, but by taking the latter part of the sentence as if Solomon had said, "What comparison is there between him (viz. the man before named) and the poor that knows how to walk before the living?" i.e. the poor man who hath so much care to know how to live, as is naturally to be preferred before him, whose wisdom still leaves him such a fool, that it doth not restrain his superfluous appetites. And this suits well with the next words (ver. 9), where the "sight of the eyes," being opposed to the "wandering of the desire," it is reasonable to take it for the fixedness of a man's mind, to rest satisfied: what is before that, is in things present.

Or the words may admit of this construction (which.

and it is known that it is man: neither may he contend with him that is mightier than he.

11 ¶ Seeing there be many things that increase vanity, what is man the better?

which his ravenous desires continually pursueth; which sure is a very foolish thing, and another great part of the miseries of human life: that men are still craving more, when they know not how to use what they have already; and, neglecting what they possess, wish for that which, perhaps, they cannot get: or, if they do, can give them no more satisfaction than what they possess. See Annot. [6]

Ver. 10.] And what a man have already arrived at great renown (as well as riches), still it is notorious that he is but a man, made out of the dust: and therefore weak, and frail, and subject to many disastrous events: which it is not possible for him, by his most anxious cares, to prevent, or, by his power and wealth, to throw off when he pleases. See Annot. [5]

Ver. 11.] And since there are so many things, and of great consideration, that add to the natural uncertainty which attends all worldly enjoyments, what can a man promise himself from all his cares! and how frivolous are his hopes! and how senseless are they when they will not suffer him to enjoy anything for fear of diminishing that heap, which they would fain increase! See Annot. [5]

Ver. 12.] For (beside all that hath been said) there is this great mischief still will remain: that if he should attain his hopes, he cannot tell whether it would not have been better for him to have been dimensioned also; for by the example of one that hath skill enough to know, whether that eminent station (for instance) to which he aspiris will prove so good for him as the private condition wherein he is? And the same doubt may he made of all other things which he desires in this short life; which passes away insensibly, but very swiftly, and ends in the like uncertainty, what shall become of a man's family and possessions, which he leaves behind him when he departs out of this world? See Annot. [7]

ANOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1. Common.] Covetous wretches, it seems, were no rare creatures in those days, but the nation of the Jews abounded with them; being of the same humour they are now, scraping up riches by right or wrong, which they scarce ever enjoy. But I have expressed also the other sense of the word rabbah, which signifies great (Gen. vi. 5) as well as many or frequent.

[b] Ver. 2. Riches, &c.] He describes in this verse the ridiculousness, as well as the misery, of this practice of greediness; for by the example of one that hath nothing, and yet wants all that he hath; being like one that stands up to the chin in water, but fears to take a sip to quench his thirst. For to those two words, riches and wealth (mentioned in the nineteenth verse of the foregoing chapter), he here adds a third, to express the greatest plenty, viz. glory; which is much more comprehensive than the other; including in it all those goodly things which may do a man credit, and raise him to a splendid condition in this world. For so Laban's sons called the ample possessions which Jacob had got in their father's service, "all this glory" (Gen. xxxi. 1) as substance, as some render it; which makes him (as we now speak) a substantial man, or a man of such immense substance that hath weight in it, and makes a man to be valued.

Evil disease.] That which was called ra'ah cholah, a CHAPTER VII.

is come into my mind since I wrote the paraphrase),
"What excellence is there in the wise man (that is, in the opinion of the wretch before mentioned there is none) more than in a fool, especially if he be poor,"
&c. That is, to all other miseries of the rich charul, that is commonly added, that they are very ignorant of what is most truly valuable: having no eseme of the wisest man in the world, no more than of a fool. Nay, they prefer a rich fool before a poor wise man; who knows how to carry himself so decently, that he is not afraid to appear before any man living. This is a great sottishness (ver. 9), and breeds no less sorrow; to be led by blind appetites, and not by reason and judgment. For so the words of the ninth verse may be interpreted: "Better it is to understand aright, than to follow after one's desires!"

[g] Ver. 10.] That which hath been. The sense of I have given of the beginning of this verse (taking the first word for an interrogation, and name for renown, as is common in scripture) seems to me to be the most simple, and most agreeable to the whole discourse. And it is that which Melanchthon hath expressed in these words, "Although a man grow famous, yet it is known that he is but a man; and he cannot contend with that which is stronger than himself." That is, he cannot govern events. But I shall mention two other interpretations, which some give of it. One is this: "As he was made at first in the name was given to him, i.e., the name of Adam, signifying that he was taken out of the earth, and therefore mortal. The other is this: "He that hath been, his name is called already;" that is, his memory is abolished together with himself. This is Maldonate's sense; but it is not agreeable to the Hebrew phrase, "his name is called;" for that in the scripture signifies rather the contrary, viz. fame, and honourable mention, as I have expressed it word for word out of the Hebrew, in the paraphrase. The common interpretation may be found in all commentators, which is this; that "God hath appointed what every man shall be; whether rich or poor, &c. and therefore it is in vain for them to contrive as they do, to be either than what they are." For it is to endeavour to alter that which is immutably settled by the Almighty.

CHAPTER VII.

1 A good name is better than precious ointment; and the day of death than the day of one's birth.

Ver. 1.] But though there be such uncertainty in all other things, yet a good name, which a man gets by a virtuous life, is lasting and durable: and as the latter consequences seldom gives a greater pleasure to the mind for the present, than the most fragrant ointment can do to the senses of voluptuous men, so the fame of it will remain after he is dead; and he will still live in a good report, when all those sensual joys expire, like the vapour of the ointment, which is soon dispersed and lost after it is poured out: and therefore, if we would be happy, we ought to order our life, in such a manner, that death, which fools and wicked men fear, may be welcome to us; and only let us out of the troubles into which we are brought at our birth. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 2.] And, that it may befriend us, it is our wisdom to think often of it: and consequently, choose rather to converse with things that will make us serious, than with those which will make us merry: to go, for instance, into the company of those who are mourning for the dead, rather than of those who are feasting for joy that a child is born into the world: for in the midst of these pleasures we are apt to be dissolved and forget ourselves; but that sad spectacle inclines us naturally to be considerate, and disposes our mind to humility, modesty, gentleness, sobriety, and charity; when, in one we see the fate sadness of the countenance the heart is made better.
4 The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning; but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth.
5 It is better to hear the reproof of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools.
6 For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity.
7 ¶ Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad;
and a gift destroyeth the heart.
8 Better is the end of a thing than the begin-of all: and we follow him to his grave, who a little while ago, perhaps, was as vigorous and strong as ourselves. See Annot. [b].

Ver. 3.] Sadness, therefore, and sorrow, are much more profitable for us than mirth and jollity (as we see in those severe and stern rebukes, which make men sorrowful for their faults), because that grief which makes a man look sadly, whether it be for his own sins, or other men’s calamities, is apt to do his soul good; by giving him a right understanding of God, and of himself, and of all things else. See Annot. [e].
Ver. 4.] Whence it is, that wise men affect to think of such things, when they do not see them, as show them how vain all our enjoyments are: but fools seek all occasion to put by such thoughts, and to divert themselves with merriment and pleasure. See Annot.
[a].
Ver. 5.] And he that would be in the number of those wise men, must look upon this as one of the first steps towards it, to lend an obedient ear unto the reproofs of him who is truly wise and virtuous: which, though never so sharp and rough, are to be infinitely preferred before the smooth praises and commendations of a great many fools. Nay, ought to sound more gratefully in our ears, than the most delicious music, songs, and jests, of all the merry companions in the world. See Annot. [c].
Ver. 6.] These jolly fellows, indeed, make a great noise and show: as if they were the only men that enjoy this world: but, alas! their mirth and joy are but for a spurt, and then end in heaviness: like the crackling of thorns, which sometimes blaze under a pot, but they gave a mighty heat; but leave the water in it as cold as they found it.
All their jollity, therefore, is vanity. See Annot.
[f].
Ver. 7.] And there is the greater need to be well instructed, and therefore to hearken to the wise (ver.
5), because there are other things, besides vain pleasures and diversions, to disturb and unsettle our minds, if we be not well fortified against them. For the better any man is, the more he is in danger to suffer from slanderers, revilers, and all sorts of injurious persons: whose violence sometimes is so great, that unless a man be provided with more than human wisdom (and it be deeply rooted in his heart), it will not only miserably disquiet, but even distract him. Nor is this his only danger; but that power and authority which raises him above the former, may expose him to another; unless he be armed with great integrity: for his mind may be corrupted by gifts and presents to do injustice unto others, which he hates should be done to himself. See Annot. [g].
Ver. 5.] And he will be the less able to resist them both, who is so wise as to look, not merely to the beginning of them, but attend to their conclusion:
for that which seems grievous at the first appearance, in the issue proves very advantageous: and, on the contrary, that which promises fair at first hath a deadly farewell with it; and therefore it is much better to endure patiently, and humbly wait to see the issue, than to be provoked by pride and disdain hastily to precipitate events; for he that seems to wait and attend upon the leisure progression of things, commonly undoeth himself and his affairs, by his fierce and violent attempts presently to compass his desires.
See Annot. [a].
Ver. 9.] It is another point therefore of that wisdom, which must make us happy, to repress the movements of anger that we feel in ourselves, and not suffer them, without great deliberation, to have any effect: for anger is an exceedingly perilous vice, and is, indeed, the property of fools; who, out of weakness of mind, and shortness of thoughts, are familiarly transported with it upon the slightest causes; and not easily appeased again, as wise men are when they chance to be incensed.
Ver. 10.] It is wisdom also to correct in ourselves that complaining humour which is apt to be ever finding fault with the present times, and complaining of the foregoing ages as far better and happier than the present. For perhaps it is not true: and thus much is certain, that he is foolishly inconsiderate, who imaginates, that then there was no evil, and that now there is no good; or if it be true, that there was more good in those times, let us not murmur and repine, asking why we are cast into a troublesome age, full of oppression, suppose, and violence, and wrong (ver. 7), but rather submit to the providence of God; conceiving, that there is no age so bad as to hinder us (which is the principal point of wisdom) from being good: and therefore let us do our duty; believing God hath such reason for suffering the times to be as they are, that we have no reason to quarrel at them; or to call in question his wisdom, goodness, or justice.
See Annot. [f].
Ver. 11.] Yet do not think that wisdom or virtue consists in despising riches; but only in using them well when we have them, and in being contented without them; for as we cannot be happy by riches alone, without wisdom, so we cannot be completely happy with wisdom alone, without riches: for he hath a vast advantage to do good every way who is rich as well as wise; it giving him an authority even to speak more freely than other men; and making what he speaks to be more regarded: but of the two, wisdom and virtue must always be preferred; which can do greater things, and bestow nobler benefits upon mankind, than treasures alone can do. See Annot.
[g].
Ver. 12.] For as wisdom, for instance, contrives many ways whereby a man may innocently defend himself from danger; so can money oftentimes purchase his protection and safety: but herein is the pre-em-ience of wisdom, that when neither of them can shelter a man, nor stave off the calamity that invades 13 Consider the work of God: for who can make that straight, which he hath made crooked? 14 In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him. 15 All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man, and there is a wicked man; and both are from the hand of the Highest. 16 Be not righteous over much; neither make thyself too wise: why shouldst thou destroy thyself? 17 Be not over much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldst thou die before thy time?

him, it marvellously supports, revives, and comforts the souls of those who are owners of it, under all the evils which it could not help them by honest means to avoid. See Annot. [9].

Ver. 13.] And in order to it, the highest piece of wisdom is, to live in a serious sense of the sovereign power of God: and to consider, that as he hath settled all things in heaven and earth, in an unchangeable course, so nothing comes to pass without his providence: with which it is vain to struggle, when he is pleased either to crown us in any of our private designs; or to send any public calamity, which, by our art and power, we can neither avoid nor remedy. See Annot. [n].

Ver. 14.] No, we ought rather to accommodate ourselves to the present state of things; and when we are found to err, to entreat God's blessings cheerfully, with thankful and charitable hearts; but so soberly also, as not forgetting that affliction may come: and when it doth, let us take it patiently, considering, among other things, that there may be a change to a better condition again: for as both the one and the other come from God, so he hath ordered they should have their turns in such due season, and balanced one with the other with such exactness, that the meanest man hath no reason to complain of him; nor the greatest to fancy himself more than a man; who cannot invent any means to dispose things otherwise, much less better, than God hath done. See Annot. [m].

Ver. 15.] Know what may be objected to this, having, all my life long, made observations upon all manner of things, in this troublesome world, and it seems very hard that a just man's integrity should not be able to preserve him; but he is therefore, perhaps, destroyed, because he is better than others; when a wicked man escapes, nay, is concomted and encouraged, or suffered to prolong his days in (and perhaps by) his wickedness. See Annot. [g].

Ver. 16.] But besides other things which may be replied to this (as that good men are sometimes removed from, and wicked reserved unto, future evils), it must be noted also, that some pious men are more strict and rigid than they need, and not so prudent as they ought to be; but unnecessarily expose themselves to danger. And therefore, it is good advice, in order to a safe and quiet passage through this life, to be temperate in thy zeal, and not to overdo; either by extending thy own duty beyond the divine commandment, or by correcting the inverte errors of others, and opposing the vulgar opinions too severely or unseasonably: whereby they are only exasperated and enraged, but not at all amended: for why should a man bring a mischiefe upon himself, without any benefit unto others? See Annot. [n].

Ver. 17.] And, on the other side, let not impuity tempt any man to presume to grow enormously wicked, and foolish, as to embrace and follow the lowest opinions: for this may awakened the public justice against him, even for the common safety; or the divine vengeance, may, his own excessive wickedness may cut him off, before he come to the natural term of his life. See Annot. [o].

Ver. 15.] And this pious prudence, which proceeds from the fear of God, will be a stronger guard and security to him who is enwed with it, both against all inward fears and all outward dangers, than a multitude of valiant commanders, and all their troops are, to defend a city, when it is besieged by its enemies. See Annot. [p].

Ver. 20.] Though this must always be understood, when we thus discourse, that no man is either so perfectly wise, or completely virtuous, as never to mistake and commit a fault; but sometimes the best of us may slip into a sin, notwithstanding all our caution and care; and thereby fall into danger. See Annot. [q].

Ver. 21.] The consideration of which frailty of mankind is useful many ways; not only to abate our severity in censuring or chastising public offenders, but to teach us gentleness towards those who do us private injuries; and therefore not to regard (for instance) every word that is spoken against us, but rather to dissemble our knowledge of it; first, because otherwise we shall have no quiet; for, perhaps, we may chance to overhear our own domestics speaking slightly of us; which we may easily pass by and overlook, but cannot take notice of without great disturbance. See Annot. [r].

Ver. 22.] And secondly, because, if thou examinest thy own life, thou wilt find this fault is so incident to human nature, that thou thyself perhaps hast been guilty of it many a time; and done as much by others that are thy betters as thy servant doth by thee.

Ver. 23.] For my part, I cannot exempt myself from the guilt of great errors; for though I have not only studied to be wise and virtuous, but made a trial of the excellence of all these rules which I have now delivered; and resolved also that I would strictly observe them; and never, in the least, swerve from 24 That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out?
25 I applied mine heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness:
26 And I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whose pleaseth God shall escape them; yet, alas! I fell far short of these holy purposes. See Annot. [x].

Ver. 24.] That which I have done already, in time past, is far from the wisdom whereby I intended to have acted; and who can tell, when he once sinks below himself; how much deeper and deeper he shall be plunged in sin, till he cannot find his way out again!

Ver. 25.] Notwithstanding which I did not cease my endeavours, but diligently looked every where, and viewed every corner, even of my heart; making the most exquisite search after the surest means to attain that wisdom and virtue which I desired and laboured for.

Ver. 26.] All things; and to be settled, upon strong grounds, in my holy resolutions: for which end, I likewise endeavoured to understand what is the very height of folly and wickedness; even that wickedness which besots a man's mind, nay, turns his brain; and not only infatuates him, but makes him act as if he were distracted.

Ver. 26.] And I found, at last, that nothing so destroys a man's understanding, nothing leads him into so many dangerous errors, and makes him quite forget himself, as that filthy lust which carries him to a harlot; who brings him into so many grievous mischiefs, that he had better die than be acquainted with her: for she is made up of wicked arts and wily devices, and doth nothing but contrive how to ensnare and entangle him that approaches her; whom she holds so fast by her charms that he remains her prisoner for ever, without a wonderful grace to deliver him; which he hath little reason to expect, when he considers, that it is commonly some other great offences against God that betray him into these snares; from which he can be approved himself sincerely unto God, finds so much favour with him, as to be preserved. See Annot. [?].

Ver. 27.] Behold then the result of my most serious thoughts, which I publicly proclaim to all, and would have it diligently observed; that having distinctly considered all things, one by one, I find nothing so dangerous, and therefore nothing so much to be avoided by him, that would be steadfastly wise and good, (ver. 23), as the conversation of woman; especially those that are of a lowd inclination.

Ver. 28.] And where to meet with any of them, with whom it is safe to have society, I am still to seek, though very desirous to find: for though here and there I have found a truly honest man, among those multitudes that attend upon me in my court, yet I cannot say that among all my acquaintance of the other sex (and I have a great many), I Kings xi. I have met with so much as one, that is what a woman should be: modest, plain-hearted, humble, sincerely virtuous, without guile, hypocrisy, and dissimulation. See Annot. [?]

Ver. 29.] Only observe this, that I do not herein accuse (far be it from me) the Creator of the world; for I am assured of nothing more than this, that as God made all other things very good in their several kinds, so he made both men and women in perfect integrity; with a clear understanding to judge aright, and with an honest will, inclined to do accordingly; prescribing from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her.

27 Behold, this have I found, saith the preacher, counting one by one, to find out the account:
28 Which yet my soul secketh, but I find not: one man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found.

29 Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.

them also no other rule of life, but such as was just and good; but they, affecting to be greater than God intended, and to have more liberty than he allowed, raised scruples and doubts, questions and disputes, about their duty; inverting many ways to shift it off; and so deprived themselves, by following their own vain fancies, and false reasonings, rather than his blessed will. See Annot. [x].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Among all the maxims of true wisdom and piety, which are to be learnt for the settlement of our mind in peace and tranquillity, notwithstanding the vanity that is in all things, Solomon recommends to us in the first place, the care of that man foolishly lose by minding nothing but keeping up wealth, or pleasing themselves in a voluptuous life, &c. &c. to acquire a good name. Which nothing but a virtuous use of all things can bestow upon us: and when we have it will give us a singular delight at present, and embalm our memory when we are laid in our graves.

Which good name (as Melancthon observes) consists in two things: in the approbation of our own consciences, judging right, and in the approbation of other men who also rightly judge. Both which are required by God; that we should do right things, and that others should approve of what is rightly done. Unto which they are bound, for two reasons; that the difference of virtue and vice may be the more conspicuous, and that others may be taught by examples. He requires, therefore, that infamous persons be cast out of society, and that they be honoured whose manners are without infamy. Now, since such an approbation is a divine ordinance, it is manifest we may desire this glory; and, by the same reason, that we must avoid all scandal, and take care that we may be commended.

Which Solomon here compares to a precious ointment, because nothing was more grateful and refreshing in those eastern countries; and therefore used not only in feasts, but at other times, when they were weary or languishing; for comforting the brain, creating the spirits, cheering the countenance, supplying the joints; and for other services tending to health, as well as pleasure. Which made ointments to be held in the greatest price and estimation, and to be mentioned among the treasures of kings (2 Kings xx. 13; 1sa. xxxix. 5). Suitable to this is that the word stands for a bath of warm water does not so refresh the tired bones as glory.” And this of Thucydides, that “honour is the nourishment and food of an old man,” who lives upon the reputation he hath gotten by worthy deeds, which will make death not unwelcome to him. So the latter part of this verse must be understood, with reference to a well-spent life; for otherwise it would be only a discontented saying, like that of the heathen, “the best thing is not to be born, the next best to die presently.” Unto which doctrine (as Melancthon well speaks) the church is a stranger.

I cannot well pass over this verse without observing what all interpreters note: an elegant paramomastia as they call it), that is, a near affinity both in the letters and in the sound, of these two Hebrew words, schein, name, and schemen, oil or ointment; as there is afterward (ver. 5, 6), between three other words, shir, a song, sirum, thorns, and sir, a pot. Which being stand also in several other parts of the Bible, it shows that such allusions are not unceasingly, nor ought to be censured as fictitious; if they be sparingly used, and wisely, graciously, and decently scattered in a discourse; not insomuchly, upon every occasion, obtruded.

2. Now the wise man, knowing that nothing stirs as up more powerfully to a religious life, than the frequent remembrance of our mortality (which, alas! we are not willing to think of), he next advises him that would be happy, to embrace all occasions that may put him in mind of it. "The meditation of death" being as was anciently said, "the very abridgment of all philosophy." All the precepts of wisdom they thought were comprised in this; and therefore no wonder Solomon not only begins with it, but presses it so largely as he doth in the following verses; to the end, that we may make our life not only a meditation, but an exercise, of death; which in the Christian language is called mortification. In short, the thought of death will, without any other teacher, force us to be a prayer, and thus we use all those virtues, which will procure us a good name; some of which I have touched in the paraphrase. And the more healthful we are, the more we have need to charge ourselves with the thoughts of it, because that is apt to make us forget it. So I have taken chci not merely for living; but lively, vigorous, lusty, and flowing, as we translate it truly: Psalm xxxviii. 19.

3. In the explication of this verse, I have touched upon another sense of the first word of it: which signifies not only sorrow, but anger or indignation also; by which some explain this verse. And understand thereby, either the anger of God afflicting men for sin, or the angry reproaches that are given sinners: which are better for them than prosperity, or to applaud and humour them in their folly. But this is mentioned ver. 5, and therefore I take it not to be intended here.

The truth of the latter part of this verse is admirably expressed by St. John, 2 Cor. vii. 11. As for the phrase, I shall only note, that an ill look is an exact translation into our language of the Hebrew phrase, which is here translated sadness of the countenance. Now a man may look ill not only by sickness, but by reason of any other thing that afflicts him (as we find in the case of Nehemiah, ii. 2), some of which I have expressed in the paraphrase.

4. The thoughts, affections, and delight.

5. Rebuke. The word includes roughness and severity in it; and is opposed to the smooth flatteries of those that seduce to sin. So I have understood song (not excluding the common sense of the word, which I have also expressed): for as the first part of wisdom is for a man to be able to give good advice to himself and others; and the next part of it, to take such advice when it is given; so it belongs to the first part, to see a man's own faults, and prove himself for them; and to the second, to receive such reproof willingly from others, and to abhor to be flattered and soothed, as if he had no faults at all.

6. This comparison between flattery and flattery, Coranus thinks is continued also in this verse, upon which he paraphrases in this manner: "As thorns put under a pot, and kindle, make such a crackling, as if they would set the whole house on

Vol. III.—19 fire, and by their noise raise an expectation of the greatest flame; but presently end in smoke and vapours: so senseless flatterers make a great buzzing in men's ears, and blow up their minds, extolling them to heaven with their praises; but in truth make them not one whit the better." Sc. But I do not see how the word laughter can be well applied to this; and therefore I have omitted it, and only thought fit here to mention it.

7. The connection of this verse with the preceding is a little obscure; unless we translate it, as Maldonate doth (following Monster), A wise man despises calumny, and a mind that can be corrupted with gifts: which is an excellent admonition, and well suited to Solomon's purpose. But no interpreters besides them take the word jeholot in the signification of despising (except Forsterus, who takes it for making one despised, translating it thus, "calumnies make even a wise man inglorious"), but rather in the sense of giving disturbance, or "making mad," as we translate it. Though a great many by oschek (which raiseth the disturbance in a wise man) understand that sort of oppression which comes from calumny. Particularly Melanchthon herein follows the Vulgar; showing what a most pestilent mischief this is: in all conquerors; whereby he shows how men may acquire a good habit of mind, able to hold out against oppression on the one hand, and bribery on the other; which none can do, who is not very virtuous.

And in this exposition I have taken wise as St. Jerome doth: not for one that is perfect, but for a proficient: who hath not yet settled wise principles in his mind.

It is possible, also, that Solomon may have respect to the oppressions which men generally endure in a state ill governed; which raises a just indignation, and holy warmth of zeal, in the best of men; but if care be not taken to repress the violence of that perturbation which this is apt to give us, it may turn into fury, and make us behave ourselves towards our superiors as men out of their wits.

8. I have connected this verse with the foregoing; though it may be taken alone by itself. And the word debras, signifying either speech or thing, some (following the Vulgar) interpret this of the care that ought to be taken in the epistle, or close of an oration (as St. Jerome speaks), rather than the beginning or preface to it; that, as we are wont to say, we may come off well, and leave a sting in the minds of those that hear it. But this is so wide from the wise man's purpose, that I do not think fit to set down an excellent discourse of the Lord Bacon's upon this sense of the words (lib. viii. De Augm. Seient. parah, 10).

And if we expound it of things, it is but a dilute sense to say, that a thing perfected is better than a thing begun. Others, therefore, take it to be the same with that, Fins coronat opus; which is true, but doth not complete the sense; unless we understand it in this manner; that the conclusion of all things is to be expected before we judge of them. For whilst they are growing and coming on, they appear with a quite different face from what they have when they are in the first beginning; and shall be more.

In the latter part of the verse, "patient in spirit" is properly one that is long before he grows angry, or falls into any passion; who is opposed to "proud in spirit," because it is high-mindedness (as the word signifies) which makes men's passions rise and swell hastily. It makes them think by the former part, and be expended in this manner: "A patient man, and slow to anger, despatches business better than a proud, huffing, and blustering spirit; whose passion so disorders his mind, and indisposes it for the management of affairs, that he seldom brings them to a good issue."

Or thus: "A proud man is a hontefou, who begins to-day: but the patient in spirit is the man that must end it (if ever it be well ended), and that is much the better work, and the greater honour to him who is employed in it and effects it."

Or, which is still clearer, we ought to attend to the end of a thing with patience; because it cannot be known, what it will prove, nor whether it tends in the beginning to the成就 of the ends. And for the same reason, the patient in spirit, if we would expect the issue of every thing. Thus Coranuses paraphrases upon the words most excellently; but a little too long: "It is no small part of wisdom to judge of things, and of business proposed to us, slowly and maturely, &c. for we see frequently that inconsiderate men, finding a thing very agreeable to them in the beginning, and not thinking how profitable and pleasant the issue may prove, immediately despond; and out of an impatience, shall I say, or rashness of mind, desist from the most excellent enterprises; and many times take themselves to worse. From which rashness and inconstancy he will be very far removed, who, endowed with divine wisdom, waits for the desired and happy conclusion of his affairs. And unto this nothing contributes more, than a slow, constant, and patient mind, that can endure labour and pains: which steadfastly and quietly considering how fruitful the end may be which it affects, will not suffer himself, by any difficulty, trouble, or weariness, which he meets withal in the beginning, to be drawn from his purpose. For if any man be a hontefou, or an arrogant humour, think it is baseness, and unbecoming a gallant man, to attend upon the slow and leisure progresses of things, and to expect their events."

Thus he: which sense, I have not neglected in my paraphrase: but comprised it among the rest; and it is thus, in part, expressed more briefly by a wise and good man in that age: when he told his friend (who was undone because he would not mind it), that he was like an unskilful player at tennis, ever running after the ball: whereas an expert player will stand still to observe and discern where the ball will alight, or where it will rebound; and there with cunning will let it fall on his racket, or on his hand."

[1] Ver. 9, 10.] These two verses depend on the foregoing, showing that anger is inconsistent with wisdom; and so are murmuring and repining at the hardships we meet withal in evil times. And therefore, as the same Coranuses well glosses, "let us not throw the causes of our anger upon the times;" but blame ourselves, who at all times, if we want "meekness of wisdom," shall grow angry upon the most frivolous occasions; and not only let loose the reins of our anger, but of all other vices.

But I think this advice (ver. 10) is not merely to be restrained to this, but extended unto all sorts of discontent, which are apt to make us complain of our present condition; and so to admire what is past, as if the present were not so good as those past; and not to compare the present with good, but with what was good but what was good lived before us; and we nothing but what was nought in these days. Whereas they complained just as we do now; and that of Thucydides was true, as it ever will be, ἀνά τον παρόν ἀπείρον, "the present is always burdensome." Because, as Menenethus observes, we have a feeling sense of present incommodities; but as the happiness of long enjoyed, but not of our own, which may be as good. This we are sure of, that all times have their troubles: and it is the part of a wise and good man to bear them, and not to increase them by a foolish cure. According to that saying, μη τον παρόν ἀπείρον, "let not one evil be remedied by another." And that of Pythagoras, ἐνίκη, not only to report; and so we praise those ancient times, but do not like our own, which may be as good. This.

The longer in these observations, because they are things of mighty moment, but most of the rest I shall contract as much as is possible.

[2] Ver. 11.] Most take this verse as denoting their happiness; as little as it is worth; and as well as wisdom; which commonly is despised without wealth. But the words may bear another construction (which I have not neglected, because it agrees well with what follows), that "wisdom is equal to an inheritance; nay, much to be preferred before it." For they may be thus translated, "Both wisdom and an inheritance are profitable for men in this world; but especially wisdom. Or, as Maldonate renders the last clause, et residuum est videtur solenn. "there is a remainder to those that see the sun." That is, when all things in this world fail us, the fruits of wisdom only remain with us.

[3] Ver. 12.] This is further explained in this verse where it will be needless to do more than barely observe, that the word we render defence is shadow in the Hebrew; which in their language signifies protection and comfort: Gen. xix. 8. For this cause they came under the shadow of my roof: i.e. that they might be secure from violence. Num. xiv. 9. "Their shadow (i.e. protection) is departed from them."

[4] Ver. 13, 14.] Here follows an admirable advice to comply with our present condition, and suit our mind unto it; because we cannot bring things to the bent of our own mind, and therefore had better study to conform our mind to our condition, whatsoever it be; whether prosperity or adversity. Into which the divine wisdom hath divided our life, and so proportioned them one to the other, that none can justly find fault with his divine disposal; nor, all things considered, tell how to mend them, or order them better.

So I have understood the last clause of ver. 11 in which is the only difficulty: "and find nothing after him." Which words (after him) some refer unto God, and make the sense to be, that after him (or beside him) a man shall find nothing certain: and therefore it is best to depend upon him alone. Which I have not taken notice of in the paraphrase, and therefore mention here. Others refer after him, unto man: and that two ways (which it may be fit just to set down). So we translate it thus: "For this end, that man may find out none of those things which shall befall him hereafter:" and so, being perfectly ignorant of what is to come, neither presume in prosperity, nor despair in adversity. Others thus (which is Maldonat's gloss): "That a man losing in time of adversity what he had gotten in prosperity, might not be able to do the things of this world." Melancthon alone interprets find nothing, in this sense, that he might not betake himself unto unwallowed courses: but in prosperity keep himself within the bounds of his vocation, and not be carried beyond it by vain curiosity; and in adversity expect the help of God, in the use of such remedies as he hath ordained.

[a] Ver. 15.] This verse may either be joined with the precedent, or with the following: I have connected it with both in my paraphrase upon it, and ver. 16, where I have attended to the scope of the wise man in this chapter: and accordingly interpreted that and the seventeenth verse; which will admit of several other explications. They are highly expounded of public justice; which ought to be neither too rigid, nor too remiss and negligent. Insomuch that Melancthon's words are, non dubium est; there is no doubt he speaks of political justice, which governs the things of this life, and consists in a mean, between cruelty and negligence. Too much severity becomes cruelty; as it will not be to much advantage with men in wickedness; as it was in the days of Arcadian. A good governor, like Augustus, takes a middle course; and doth not seek that middle with too much subtlety: but rather, as in God, lets mercy prevail over judgment. The like admittance, saith he, is subjunctive in wisdom: for, as too much severity becomes cruelty, so too much wisdom becomes sullenity, and is, subtlety, becomes availing sophistry and cheating. And thus he interprets ver. 17, that a magistrate should not tolerate enormous vices.

Dr. Hammond alone, as far as I have read, makes the sixteenth verse, "Be not righteous over much," &c. to be the objection of a worldling, who takes that for an excess of duty, which brings any damage or worldly destruction upon him. Which is answered, saith he, in ver. 17, "Be not wicked over much," &c. that is, the fears, and from thence the prudential (but oftentimes very impious) practices of the worlindom, are the more probable path, to the most lasting ruins. (Vide Ans. to Cowdrey, chap. 1. sect. 2.)

But this is not coherent, in my opinion, with the rest of the chapter; and therefore I have followed rather the opinion of Gregory Nazianzen; who interprets it of heat and zeal, more than needs, without reason and discretion: which, as it makes all the sense of the world, so produces a great many other evils. And the same passion, saith he, is both about righteousness and about wisdom: ἐφαρμόζεται καθεξής τῆς ἔργου. (Vide Orat. xxvi. p. 416.)

I shall omit other interpretations (which are collected by Del Rio, and more copiously by Hackspan, lib. ii. Miscell. cap. 1), and mention only that of Gravinius: which is the more fit of all, and the interpretation of justice and wisdom. Which interpretation is in part followed by the lord Bacon (lib. viii. De Augment. Scient. cap. 3, parab. 31), whose discourse upon the words I shall not send the reader to seek, but set it down entire; because it is very useful: "There are times (saith Tacitus), wherein great virtues are exposed to certain ruin. And this fate befalls men eminent for courage or justice; sometimes suddenly, sometimes foreseen afar off. But if prudence he also added to their other accomplishments; that is, if they be wary and watchful over their own safety; then they gain thus much, that their sudden destruction proceeds from counsels altogether hidden and obscure; by which both envy may be avoided, and their ruin fall upon them unpaved. As for that nimiurn (overmuch) which is set down in the parable (since they are not the words of some Periander, but of Solomon, who now and then notes the evils in men's lives, but never commends them), it is to be understood by the term itself (in which there is no nimiurn), but of a vain and invidious affection and ostentation thereof.

"A point, something resembling this, the same Tacitus intimates in a passage touching Lepidus; setting it down as a miracle, that he had never been the author of any servile sentence, and yet remained safe in several grand times. This thought (such he often comes into my mind, whether these things be governed by fate, or whether it lies also in our power to steer an even course, free both from danger and from indignity, between deformed flattery and abrupt and sudden contumely."

[6] Ver. 17.] There are these who, by at tiraza, understand not be not too wicked but, be not too busy; make not too great a stir and bustle about the things of this world (especially in dangerous times); do not destroy thyself by too much toil and labour: or by too much stirring, when it is better to be quiet and sit still. Of which I have taken no notice in the paraphrase, and therefore mention it here. For though the word be not used commonly in this sense, yet it is its original signification. And the advice of the son of Sirach is something to this purpose. Eccles. vii. 6. 7.

[p] The foregoing advice he looks upon as so useful, that he presses it farther here (ver. 18), and promises more security from such a religious prudence, as teaches us moderation, and yet keeps as strict to our duty, than from the greatest armies that men can raise for their defence (ver. 19).

For (as Melancthon observes) Alex. Pheraxus was slain by his wife and his brethren: though he lay in a high tower, well garrisoned, to which none could ascend but by ladders. And the father of Alexander was slain in the midst of a public pomp, his princes and his guards looking on; as Julius Cesar also was in the sewer of the Venetians.

Ten mighty men] Every one knows, is, in scripture-phrase, as much as many mighty men. And so Bocchiatus interprets that difficult place, Numb. xi. 31, where speaking of the vast quantity of quails that came into the camp. Moses saith, he that gathered least gathered ten omers; that is, saith the forenamed writer, many heaps: for so he thinks omer should be there translated, as is in some other places (lib. i. De Sacris Animal. cap. 15, p. 166, par. ii.).

[q] Ver 36.] Here he seems to limit what he had said before, with this exception; that no man can be always so wise and cautious, as never to offend. Which Melancthon truly calls politics sententious: and refers them to no element in the nature of Josiah, who was a very good prince, but perished by engaging rashly in an unnecessary war. And therefore the character of a governor, as well as of a man, must be fetched from the constant strain and bent of his actions, and not from particular facts. For he is a good governor that always intends to do right, though he sometimes commits a fault. And David was esteemed Josiah, and he is an ill governor, who hath no such design, but quite contrary; though sometimes he do well, as Cambyses. The difference therefore must be from their perpetual will and inclination.

There are those who connect this verse with the next, rather than the foregoing: but I have referred it both, and not unif/it; I think; as may be seen in the paraphrase upon ver. 21.

[2] Ver. 21.] Which the Lord Bacon (lib. viii. cap. 2, parab. 4), refers principally to vain curiosity; and thus discourses upon it:—'It is a matter almost beyond belief, what disturbance is created by unprofitable curiosity, about those things that concern our principal interest; that is, when we make a too scrupulous research for the discovery of every secret, that is closed and found out, do but cause disquiet of mind; and nothing conduces to the advancing of our designs. For, first, there follows execution and disquiet of mind; human affairs being so full of treachery and ingratitude, that if there could be procured a magical glass, in which we might behold the hatreds, and whatsoever malpractices we were involved in, as if it were against us, it would be better for us if such a glass were withal thrown away and broken in pieces. For things of this nature are like the murmurs of the leaves of trees, which in a short time vanish. Secondly, this curiosity loads the mind too much with suspicions, and ungrounded jealousies: which is the most capital enemy to counsels, and renders them constant and involved. Thirdly, the same curiosity doth sometimes fix those evils which otherwise of themselves would pass by us and fly away. For it is a dangerous thing to irritate the consciences of men; who, if they think themselves to be undiscovered, are easily changed for the better: but, if they perceive they are suspected, and do not like to be suspected, they will drive out one mischief by another. And therefore, I was a great deal of curiosity in the saying of the highest wisdom in Pompey the Great, that he instantly burnt all Sertorius's papers, unperused by himself, or suffered to be seen by others.'

Some take this verse to speak of those, who willingly lend their ears to informers and detractors; who will bring them what is said abroad, whether true or false. And therefore, saith Solomon, since there is no man but who offends sometimes, not thou thyself excepted, do not hearken unto those who reckon up other men's faults; lest thou hear thy own, from those that are of thy family. Thus Maldonate.

[3] Ver. 22.] Here he seems to resume his discourse, in the beginning of the book, concerning the shortness of human understanding and the difficulty of finding the truth and the reason of things. But no account can be given, why he thus starts from his subject, on a sudden, without any coherence. And therefore I have endeavoured to give another account of this and the following verse; which I have so interpreted, that they may be linked to the foregoing. I cannot say that herein I have followed any such as my own judgment: which led me to think this to be a continued discourse. But they that dislike my connexion, must rest satisfied (as far as I can see) with that of Corrannus (which hath more colour for it than any other), who takes this verse to be a preface to what the wise man had to add concerning the subtle arts of women to draw men in, if they be not exceeding cautious. Their wits being so versatile, their cunning so sly, and their allurements so many, that he who would be good, to be very cautious how he enters into familiarity with that sex, who have brought sore calamities upon the greatest men; such as Samson, David, and Paris, and many other besides Solomon himself. The next verse I have made to relate to that.

The two words we translate 'snares' and 'nets,' (which Melancthon calls 'hazards' and 'hearts,' e. h. inventions, devices, &c.), both signify nets. Only the former signifies the nets of hunters: the latter, the nets, or drags, rather, of fishermen (Ezek. xxv. 5), as the LXX. distinguish them. The former, indeed, is applied also to fishers, in this book (ix. 11), and therefore the truer difference perhaps is, that the former signifies 'hazards, devices, &c.,' which are not to be broken, and as cannot be broken, will certainly destroy; as the root from whence ekerem comes denotes. Both these words are in the plural number, to denote the vast multitudes that they catch, and the innumerable ways they have to entangle them, and hold them fast.

[4] Ver. 23.] Gregory Thaumaturges interprets this verse as signifying the manner of those women, that first show the manner: 'I have found a chaste man, but never a chaste woman;' and, indeed, of that he is speaking, which makes this sense not unreasonable: though I have not so restrained it, nor do I think this is to be looked upon as the true character of women in general, in all ages and countries, but of such only as Solomon was acquainted withal; and of those in that and the neighboring countries, especially of women there excelling in beauty, which commonly betrayed them to their ruin, and to the ruin of others; without an extraordinary grace to preserve them.

[5] Ver. 24.] In the beginning of this verse (Melancthon thinks) Solomon speaks not of the first creation of man, but of the rule of man's house under the good providence of God, after he had said, 'God instituted a good order how men should behave themselves in all things; but they contrary how to go beyond their bounds.' As David, for instance, had many wives of great beauty; but he would not be content without another man's. Anthony had a great power, but he would be a monarch: which is the fault of many other great men, e. g. her invariable, negligent, &c.

This I have not altogether neglected; and also taken notice of De Dieu's interpretation of the last words of the verse, 'Men sought out the thoughts of the great or mighty;' taking robustia for magnificis: that is, not contented with his own condition, he affected to be like the angels, nay, like God. Maimondies refers it to the evils and miseries man draws upon himself here in this world; understanding by cheesboneth inventions (inventions) man's foolish reasonings, whereby he precipitates himself into all the evils he endures. 'For he thinks he wants this and that, while he doth not: and he thinks this and the other way making him miserable which he has no need of.' But we have already said in the third doth (i. 9), 'This hath been by means of your ownselfes;' and as the wise man elsewhere (Prov. xix. 3), 'The foolishness of man perverteth his way; and his heart fretteth against the Lord!' (More Nevoclin, par. iii. cap. 12).

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Who is as the wise man? and who knoweth the interpretation of a thing? a man’s wisdom maketh his face to shine, and the boldness of his face shall be changed.

2 I counsel thee to keep the king’s commandment, and that in regard of the oath of God.

3 Be not hasty to go out of his sight: stand not in an evil thing; for he doeth whatsoever pleaseth him.

4 Where the word of a king is, there is power:

and that not merely for fear of his displeasure, and the penalty of the law, if it be broken or neglected, but out of respect to God, whose minister he is, and with whom his subjects (as to the sincerity of their hearts, when they swore true faith and allegiance to him. See Anot. [b].

Ver. 3.] Let not thy passion transport thee to show the least disrespect to him, much less to refuse his commands unmannishly, or to do any thing that may throw thee out of his favour; but if thou hast offended him, let thy next care be not to persist obstinately in the error, but to humble thyself and beg his pardon: not imagining thou canst flee so fast from his anger that it shall not reach thee; for his power is so large that it will, one time or other, lay hold on thee and punish thee. See Anot. [c].

Ver. 4.] For the king’s commands are backed with power; so that if he gives sentence against thee, his officers are ready to do execution immediately; never examining whether it be right or wrong, but holding themselves obliged to do as he bids them. And indeed, who may question him, or call him to an account, that hath no superior? Or who can control him that hath the power of the kingdom in his hands? See Anot. [d].

Ver. 5.] Therefore, not only for conscience’ sake, but for thy own safety and security, yield obedience to the king’s commandment; for so thou shalt avoid the trouble both of thy mind and of thy body; and if thou pretendest to wisdom, shew it, not in opposing him and contending with him, but in a prudent declining what thou canst not honestly do; and in observing and taking the fittest season, and in the most inoffensive and winning manner, to insinuate good advice, when the king comitts an error. See Anot. [e].

Ver. 6.] For want of which sort of prudence men suffer very much: because there is a certain season for, and a certain manner of doing every thing; which if it be not understood (and it requires no small pains to be able to discern it), or not embraced, it is not only impossible to be done, but many and great inconveniences ensue upon that oversight, or neglect. See Anot. [f].

Ver. 7.] For no man can be sure that the like opportunity will return again: future things being so much in the dark, that neither his present nor any one else can inform him what shall be hereafter; or when that will come, which in the course of things may probably be expected. See Anot. [g].

Ver. 8.] But let no prince, though never so great spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death: and there is no discharge in that war; neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

9 All this have I seen, and applied my heart unto every work that is done under the sun: there is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt.

10 And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity.

11 Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil.

12 ¶ Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him:

13 But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow: because he feareth not before God.

14 There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked: again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous. I said, that this also is vanity.

15 Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun.

16 ¶ When I applied mine heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes:)

17 Then I beheld all the work of God, that a presumption hereupon to abuse his power to tyranny, because he hath no superior to control him: but remember, when I am amended; First, that though he command over men's bodies, yet he hath no dominion over their minds and spirits; nor can he hinder them from thinking what they please, no more than he can the wind from blowing where it listeth: and next that he cannot command them long; for death will come, and irresistibly seize on him, as well as on the meanest man: he cannot rule the chances of war, nor promise himself certain victory in the day of battle: or, if he have had a great while good success, yet neither his policy, nor his power, shall be able always to defend him from the vengeance that will be taken, of the injustice, cruelty, and iniquity, which he exercises in his government.

Ver. 9.] There is no reason, therefore, to be so much as ambitious of great power; for in the view I have taken of all manner of things in this world, which I have weighed also, and considered daily, I have observed that sometimes unlimited power breaks itself in pieces, and the dominion to which a man is promised ends in his own ruin, as well as theirs whom he pillages and tyrannically governs. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 10.] And, among other things, I also observed such wicked men carried to their graves, who had been honoured as gods while they lived, because they were God's ministers, and sat in the judgment-seat, in that very place where he himself is present; but were no sooner gone, but they were forgotten, in that very city where they had enjoyed such high authority: so vain is the pomp wherein great men live, and wherein they are buried; which vanishes together with them, and, if they were not good in their place, is no more remembered. See Annot. [g].

Ver. 11.] But these observations move not vain men, who look no farther than their present prosperity. For though God had pronounced a dreadful doom against all wicked men, and especially those that abuse their power unto tyranny over others; yet, because execution is not presently done upon them, but they live in all earthly splendour, both they and others also, by their example, grow more subduedly powerfully to their wickedness, and think of some thing but doing mischief, by rapine, and all manner of iniquity in the world. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 12.] Not considering or believing this, which I am assured, as an undoubted truth, that though such a powerful sinner commit innumerable spots upon his poor subjects, and no harm befall him a long time, yet, as God will make those good men an answer to the wicked men, so the wicked men choose rather to suffer than to sin; and, notwithstanding all their oppressions, maintain their integrity, and continue in awful obedience unto him, and unto his governor: See Annot. [m].

Ver. 13.] So he will take a time to punish that impious tyrant, because he despises God and his providence, and fears not this divine vengeance: nor are we without examples of such men, who have hastened their own ruin; and, by their violence, shortened their reign; and vanished away suddenly, like a shadow.

Ver. 14.] Such examples, indeed, do not deter them from wickedness, because they see instances on the other side (which is an afflicted consideration), that virtuous men sometimes fall into such miseries, as the wicked rather deserve to suffer: and, on the contrary, those impious men enjoy all the prosperity which, one would think, belongs only to the righteous: this, I have acknowledged already, is the lamentable condition of things, and a great part of the trouble of this world: to which I have given the best satisfaction I could, iii. 17, v. 8. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 15.] And must again commend that advice wherewith I conclude one of these discourses (iii. 22) that this ought neither to discourage a man in virtuous proceedings, nor make him careful and solicitous about events; but only move him, in the fear of God (of which I just now spake, ver. 11) to be merry whilst he may: for there is nothing better than soberly and freely to enjoy the present good things, which the bounty of God bestows upon us; with thankfulness to him, and charity to others: for when a man has plenty of goods and labours, and has at his estate this is all that he can call his; God having only sent him what he hath for his present use, while he tarryeth here in this life; and then he must resign it unto others, and give an account how he hath used it unto him. See Annot. [o].

Ver. 16.] In this therefore rest satisfied, and do not trouble thyself with curious inquiries, why things are administered with such inequality, as is before mentioned: for I have travelled, as much as any body, in that disposition, and, with great application of mind, have made a most diligent search into the causes and reasons of the whole management of affairs here in this world (my mind being one of those that are as eager and greedy of knowledge, as others man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it: yea, farther; though are of riches; for which they toil all day, and take little rest in the night). See Annot. [o].

Ver. 17.] But this was all the satisfaction at which I could arrive, that the providence of God, without all doubt, governs every thing in this world; but why he suffers the wicked to prosper, and the virtuous to be oppressed by them: why he doth sometimes speedily cut off a wicked tyrant, and sometimes defer the execution so long, that he lives to do a world of mischief, and yet goes, perhaps, to his grave in peace (ver. 10); it is impossible to give a full account: for there is little or nothing that any man can know of the secrets of his counsels, or indeed of any other of his works; which are inscrutable by us, though a man take never so much pains to find them out: nay, though the wisest man in the world make it his constant business, he will be still forced to confess his ignorance; and the height of his knowledge will be to know, that God’s ways are past finding out.

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] To the advice he had given in the foregoing chapter, he now adds some new ones: the first of which is this: that the wisdom which will make us happy in this world must not make us morose and supercilious, severe and rigorous; but kindly, friendly, generous and mild, and under all cases, as much as we know, the more humble we ought to be: and by the very cheerfulness and pleasantness of our countenance invite others to us; and not by our frowning forbid them, or make them afraid to approach us.

This I take to be the meaning of the first verse: in my paraphrase upon which I have had respect to several acceptations of the several words, which it will be too long here to give an account of. They that will consult interpreters will find how they vary: and therefore I shall only mention the exposition of Melanchton upon the latter part of the verse (which is not commonly known), which, following the LXX, he thus translates: "Wisdom is the light of true happiness; but a pertinacious (or impertinient, obstinate) person is worthy of hatred." Which he explains in this manner, That wisdom which can judge aright, when severity is profitable, or when lenity will do best; when it is fit to make war, when to be quiet; brings a man great gladness; but a pertinacious person, who is stiff and obstinate in his opinion, and will not hearken to those that give him good counsel, but follows the motions of his own anger, and obeys his passions, destroys himself and others. As the pertinacious humour, for instance, of Pericles and Demosthenes was most pernicious unto all Greece.

[b] Ver. 2.] This pertinacious humour shows itself of times in opposing the sovereign authority: whereby men create to themselves and others great trouble in this world. And therefore Solomon advises men, in the next place (desiring them not to dislike the counsel, because the king gives it), to live in dutiful subjection to their prince; as a singular means of leading a happy life. For it is hard to say, whether the prudence and justice of a sovereign, in ruling well, or the humble and peaceable spirit of the people in complying with the established orders, contribute most to the public welfare. Certain it is, that it is much safer and easier (as well as more honest) to submit and be quiet, than to contend, and unsettle the persons of kings; though princes do at govern as they ought.

Mclachlan makes this verse to contain two precepts (as the LXX. also seem to do), in this manner: "Observe the commandment of the king; and the word of the oath of God." A sentence, saith he, exceeding worthy of consideration and remembrance: in which he commands us to observe the command of the king; but with this restriction, that we observe the law of God, and do nothing contrary unto that. For he calls the law the oath of God; because God made the sanction of it, in promises and threatenings with an oath. But this interpretation wholly neglects one word in the Hebrew, viz. al: and it draws both dibrath and shebhnath elohim, from their ordinary and usual sense, to a meaning that is forced and strained. For which reason another exposition is not natural: which makes this indeed one precept, but instead of taking the latter part of it for an obligation to observe it, turns it into a restriction of it; in this manner: "Keep the king’s commandment, but according to the oath of God," that is, as far as religion and the faith we owe to the great Lord of all will suffer.

This is true, but not the true sense of the Hebrew word for oath; which some would have relate to the covenant made with God in circumcision; which is still farther off from the business than the notion which Melanchton had of it. Our translation is the plainest and most literal: Be obedient to the king, and that in regard to his harmless commands, to which God is a witness, and a severe revenger of the breach of it. From which a moderate interpreter doth not much vary: whose words it will not be unprofitable to set down in this place, which ran thus in English: "Regard the king’s mouth, i.e. do whatsoever comes out of his mouth; whatsoever he commandeth and appointeth, out of that authority which he hath by divine ordinance: and chiefly the intention of the oath of God (so he translates the latter part of the verse), that is, the oath whereby every one citeth God as his witness and judge, that with a good conscience he will obey the king; because God hath so commanded." Thus Jech. Coxe. Which oath is either taken by all the very ancient Jews in the Oath-taking of a project carrying with it (as the late primates of Armagh speaks), by implication, a silent oath of fidelity and due obedience; or express, in the direct form of an oath, which princes have, for their better security, been wont to exact of their subjects. This is an ancient form, still remaining in Vegetius, of the oath wherein the soldiery bound themselves to the Christian emperors: "By God, and by Christ, and by the Holy Ghost, and by the majesty of the emperor, which, next after God, was to be loved and honoured," lib. ii. cap. 5, where he adds this remarkable reason for it; because to him, when he hath received the name of Augustus, faithful devotion is to be performed, and as a vigilant service paid, as unto a present and corporeal God. The violation of which oath, though made to a heathen prince, how heinously God takes, even as a despising of an oath, made to himself, and a breach of his own covenant, those terrible threats do sufficiently demonstrate (Ezech. xvii. 12—14, 46.), which are denounced against Zedekiah, who rebelled against the king of Babylon, "who had made him swear by God" (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13). Some of the phraseis were the first that we read of who would not take this oath of allegiance: but (as Josephus tells us, lib. xvii. Antiq. cap. 3), boasting themselves to be the most exact observers of the law of God, and therefore the most in this favour (while they were full of inward pride, arrogance and frand), dared openly to oppose kings, and presumed by their motions to raise war against them, and annoy them: refusing, saith he, to take the oath, when all the Jews had sworn to be faithful to Cæsar. Of this sect, he adds, there were above six thousand: who were all driven out of their country by this refusal, and making what they did against his authority to be no rebellion; that it heightened it very much, and was in itself a piece of rebellion: they having a natural allegiance unto him, by being born his subjects.

There are some who, from the beginning of this verse, and this book not to be Solomon's; because he saith of himself, “I observe the mouth (i.e. commandment of the king.” So they translate the first words: which the LXX. translate as we do: and so do the Chaldees, the Syriac, and Arabic interpreters. For though the Hebrew word he do eego. I: it signifies nothing to this purpose: because he doth not say, I observe, but simply I: do thou observe. To be being a distinct note;* I, and what follows: showing that it is a short form of speech, to be supplied by some such word as this, I say, or I command, or counsel; or rather charge thee. And the reason, perhaps, why the principal verb was omitted, might be (as the learned prince of Ireland, Usher, con-jectures) because no word could be found signifying we enough to express the deepness of the charge.

Some may think that I have dilated too much upon this verse: but they may be pleased to consider how useful, if not necessary, it is at this time, when men begin again to plead the lawfulness of resistance. Which is so plainly condemned in this place, that the most honest and true of the old cause were extremely puzzled to make it agree with their principles in the late times of rebellion. There is one who (in his book called Nature’s Dowry, ch. 21) calls in the assistance of a great many Hebrew doctors to help him to another translation of the words; and yet, after all, is forced to acknowledge that our English is right enough: and as to admit it, with this proviso, that the king manage well the affairs of the commonwealth. As much as to say, do what they would have him.

[c] Ver. 3. The first word in this verse is capable of several senses, which I have endeavoured to express in the paraphrase. For it originally signifies such a passion and perturbation (particularly that of excessive terror), as makes a man precipitate in his motions: tumors, which are sometimes by εὐπτρήσας, and sometimes by τροχαιος, in the LXX. and the meaning of the wise man is, that, in persuasion of the foregoing counsel (ver. 2), we must take care, if we desire to live happily, to suppress our passions, and not to show the least discontent with the government: especially, not hastily and rashly to fling ourselves (as we speak) in a flame, out of the king’s presence, on any occasion: much less receive his commands with impatience; or, which is worst of all, incur his just displeasure by sullen disobedience.

For though we may think to escape the effects of it, we shall find ourselves deceived: princes having long armes, as the phrase is) to reach those that offend them; though they fire never so far from them. This is the sense of verse 3.

[d] Ver. 4. And it is further enlarged in this verse: where Symmachus translates the first words thus: δια των λόγων βασιλείως έπισκόπων είναι, “for the command of the king is authoritative;” carries such authority with it, that it will be executed. For the word skilion, (from whence learned men have not unfily derived the titles of sultan and selden) denotes such a power as of emperors, and cannot be resisted: like that of death (ver. 5), to which all must submit.

And so it follows, in the end of this verse, “Who may say unto him, What doest thou?” i.e. first, Who hath any authority to call him to an account? as much as say, No monarch, but God alone. according to that of an eminent rabbi (quoted by the forenamed prince in the entrance of his book about Obedience, “No creature may judge the king, but the holy and blessed God alone.” To allow the people (either collective or representative) to have power to do it, is to make them accusers, judges, and executors of the commands and laws of their sovereign. Nor, secondly, can any man safely attempt it; but he shall meet with punishment either here or hereafter. Which is no new doctrine, but the same with that of St. Paul (as Luther here honestly notes), “they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation:” which none shall be able to avoid. Therefore it is safe simply to obey magistrates. Which he repeats again upon verse 7.

“A man cannot do better than simply to obey.” So preachers, saith he, should exhort the tumultuous and sedition. For judgment, vengeance, or punishment, is ordained and decreed by God, to all the disobedient, which none shall escape. And thus much the author of Nature’s Dowry is forced to acknowledge from the evident light he has in this place: “that the scope of the words is, that, as we tender our own safety, we ought not to withstand the magistrate in his edicts, which are consonant to the word of God.” “And it is wisdom,” saith he (out of Elisha Gallico, a Hebrew interpreter), “in a private man, when the magistrate enjoins what is repugnant to God, to be silent, and submit out of his dominions, rather than contest with him.” Which some conceive to be imported by the word τηλειος (go out, or go away), in the foregoing verse.

[e] Ver. 5. From whence he again concludes it is the most prudent course, as well as most honest, to comply with those that have authority over us, in a dutiful obedience, or humble submission. So I have expounded the word commandment, for the commands and laws of the king before mentioned. Which, if we do not oppose, it is the way to preserve us from knowing sorrow, as we speak, very agreeably to the Hebrew phrase in this place: if by evil thing we understand the evil of punishment, rather than of sin. Many indeed, by commandments, understand the precepts of God; which if we keep, we shall not fall into any evil practices; particularly not into rebellion. Which is a good sense, and the reader may follow which he pleases: for the latter part of the verse will agree with either. Wherein he suggests that the wisest thing we can do, when princes require any thing grievous unto us, is, not to rebel, but to watch the fittest opportunities to petition for redress; and that after a manner as may not give offence; so I have expounded time and judgment, in this and in the next verse.

[f] Ver. 6. For the truth is, a great part of the happiness of our life depends upon our discretion in observing and choosing the fittest opportunity for every thing, and the right manner of doing it. Especially when we have to do with kings, and great persons: concerning whom the wise man may still be thought to speak; both in this and the following verse.

[g] Ver. 7. If the Hebrew reading would bear it, the Vulgar translation (which the Syriac follows) of this verse, hath given an excellent reason, why a man is at such a loss to discern what is fit for him to do upon all occasions (especially how to direct his behaviour toward kings), “Because he knows little of what is past: and less, or rather nothing, of what is future." For prudence consists in the remembrance of things past, consideration of things present, and foresight of things likely to come hereafter.

Luther refers it wholly to the miserable condition of a rebel, in this manner: "He may then hope for mighty matters by his disobedience, but is lamentably deceived. For, of the very impunity which he promised himself, he cannot be secure; but in an hour when he thinks not of it, judgment overtakes him, and he perishes in his disobedience. In short, the wicked contends present obduracy, and mind not future; God, as he sees quite otherwise; and, remembering what mischiefs attend upon the rebellious, is studious therefore to be obedient."

[6] Ver. 10.] This verse I have taken wholly to belong to wicked rulers: because all the ancient translations do so, as well as our English. Though most of the modern interpreters will have the first part of the verse to refer unto wicked governors, and the latter part unto good: whose memory is abolished, when the other (so bad is mankind) are extolled and honoured: for which I see no reason, but look upon it as contrary to the design of the wise man, in this place, and therefore I have rejected it.

The place of the holy.] May be expounded divers ways; but it seems to me most natural to take it for a paraphrase of the place of judgment (mentioned 11. 16), in which the judges sustained themselves, who was a king; and so, as a king, and the painter of that place, to the place of judgment, and judged in the midst of them (Ps. Lxxxi. 1). Whence the judgment-seat was called the "place of the holy," i. e. of God, the Holy One of Israel: whom the Jews now constantly call by the name of the holy, that most blessed One. St. Jerome understands it of the temple (but then it must be translated, not the "place of judgment," but the "holy place," which is not agreeable to the Hebrew), and expounds the words thus, "The wicked buried, who were esteemed saints in the earth; and while they were thought worthy princes in the church, and in the temple of God." I have sometimes thought that the words might, according to this sense of the holy place, be thus word for word rendered out of the Hebrew (if the grammarians will permit holy here not to be a substantive), "I saw the wicked buried and they (that is, such as attend their funeral) came, and even out of the holy place followed," that is, the very priests waited on the hearse to do them the greater honour. Or thus, "The funereal pomp reached from the holy place to the place of burial."

[7] Ver. 11.] From hence he takes occasion to show what is the very root of men's malicious and incurable wickedness. And the first thing to which he ascribes it, is their thriving a long time in evil courses, which makes them hope their prosperity will continue to the end of their days. And if they can but live splendidly, they care not what becomes of them when they die. Now though there be a pith-gam, a decree, a definitive sentence (as the word signifies), passed against them; yet nothing being done upon it, so soon as we expect, it both hardens the heart of those sinners, and mightily discourages better men; who hereupon grow angry, or flag in their duty: and it is the very root of the pride of Luther's rendering, that this state of the prince is supposed to be safe from the touch of death, and from the hand of God.

[8] Ver. 12, 13.] Yet this is not to be understood, he here shows, without exception; but sometimes the divine justice proceeds to quick execution. Which is a thing noted by the heathens themselves, that God cuts tyrants short; and suffers them not to ra-
CHAPTER IX

1 For all this I considered in my heart, even to declare all this, that the righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God: no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before them.

2 All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that feareth, as he that feareth an oath.

3 This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter begins where the foregoing ends; the wise man proceeding still to justify what he had observed, about the most puzzling question in the world: Why the good and bad fare all alike, without any constant visible distinction? His resolution, caution, remedies, about this matter, appear so plainly in the paraphrase and annotations which I shall annex to it, that I will give no large account here of this chapter; but only note that the sum of it is this: that the confusion of things here below should not move us to discontent, much less incline us to irreligion; but rather dispose us with thankfulness and sobriety, to enjoy freely that portion of good things, while we have them, which God hath given us. Neither slack our diligence, nor trust to it alone: but depending on God’s word, we may cleave to the true; and by variety of observing confusion, governs all events: disappointing many times the most likely and applauded means: and again, succeeding the most unlikely and contemptible. Which should move us to commend ourselves and concerns unto God: and then, above all things, to value and study true wisdom and prudence in the multitude of all things: as far exceeding more power, of which we are foolishly ambitious.

Ver. 1.] This is no rash assertion, for I, Solomon, affirm again (viii. 16). I have deeply considered all that belongs to this matter with earnest desire and endeavour to give a clearer account and resolution of it, than this, which is all I can say: that able to give a reason, why virtuous men suffer very much, when the wicked are at the same time escape. Which I take to be the meaning of the last two verses; which I have referred to our ignorance of this particular matter; as St. Jerome also doth, whose words are these: "He that seeks the causes and reasons of things, why this or that is done, and why the world is governed by various events; why one man is blind and lame, and another is born with eyes and sound; one is poor, and another is rich: this man is noble, that inglorious: he gets nothing by his inquiry but only this; to be tormented in his own questions, and to have his disputations instead of a rack, and yet not find what he sought." That which he observes, in the Hebrew which we translate "because though" is found only in this place: but from Josh. i. 7 (where it is found in composition), the doctors conclude it signifies, for that, or because of; and so the meaning here is, that a man shall not be able by all the labour and pains he can take, not though he be a wise man that is thus laborious, to discover the reasons of things, and give an account of the difference which he observes in the divine dispensations.

though good and prudent men are under the care of God (which must satisfy them in all events), by whose special providence, both they and their undertakings and affairs are approved, directed, governed, and defended; yet (such a secret there is in this) they prove sometimes so unsuccessful, that no man can know by any thing that befalls him, or others, how God stands affected towards them: but will conclude very falsely, if he judge that God loves him who hath all that his heart desires; or that he hates him who is sorely afflicted. See Annot. [2].

Ver. 2.] For there is no certain and constant distinction made between one man and another, in the distribution of things in this world; but they all fare alike, especially in public calamities: a righteous man, for instance, perishes in a battle as well as the wicked; he that keeps himself pure and undefiled dies in a pestilence, as well as the filthy and uncleane: he that lieth in the midst of sin, is as well as he that dreads the holy name of God, and dares not rashly, much less falsely, take it into his mouth. See Annot. [2].

Ver. 3.] This (it must be acknowledged) is one of the most grievous things in this lower world, that all things being thus blended together without any distinction, some draw from thence this heuld and wild conclusion, that there is no difference between virtue and wickedness: and therefore take the greatest licence to do evil confidently and boldly all their life long: pursuing their own lusts and passions so fur-
CHAPTER IX.

4 ¶ For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope; for a living dog is better than a dead lion.

5 For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten.

6 Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun.

7 ¶ Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works.

8 Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment.

9 Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun.

10 Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might: for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.

11 ¶ I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill: but time and chance happeneth to them all.

12 For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the

the greatest God hath provided for mankind in this troublesome life; and therefore both seek for such a one as thou canst love; and, when thou hast her, delight thyself in her company, with such unalterable kindness, as may help to sweeten the afflictions to which we are subject in this world: for thou canst reap no other fruit of all thy toil in this life, but to take an innocent pleasure, with tranquillity of mind, respected to the things of this world, which the presence of God bestows upon wise. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 10.] In which, that thou mayest take the sincerest pleasure, let it not make thee slothful, much less dissolute; but dispose thee rather to be vigorously industrious, in doing all the good that is in thy power: for which end, lay hold on every occasion that presents itself, and improve it with the utmost diligence; because now is the time of action, both in the employments of the body and of the mind; now is the season of studying either arts or sciences, or wisdom and virtue; for which thou wilt have no opportunities in the place whither thou art going in the other world: which is designed for rest from our present labours, and for the reward of them. See Annot. [g].

Ver. 11.] But do not presume to attempt anything by thy own industry, though never so great, for good success in thy undertakings, nor fancy that nothing shall interrupt thy pleasures, but look up into God, and leave all to his providence: for (to return to what I said about events, ver. 1,) I have observed that they do not depend upon our will and pleasure, but upon his; we being apt to think, that he who, for instance, can run swiftly, will certainly carry away the prize; and that he who hath the greatest forces will win the victory in a battle; when it falls out quite otherwise, that both of them lose the day: and more than that, the wise and the learned in their profession cannot sometimes get their head, but men of greatest reach are poor, and ingenious artists not at all regarded, or acknowledged, according to their deserts; for there are certain seasons wherein, by various accidents which unexpectedly start up, all men's nimbleness, strength, valour, wit, cunning, and dexterity, prove ineffectual. See Annot. [h].

Ver. 12.] For no man can foresee many evils that befall him, no, not the time of his death, which surprises him unawares, when he thinks no more of it; then the silly fish or birds do of the net or the snare, wherein they are caught to their destruction: nay, as they are entangled, when they swim or fly securely in hope to catch their prey; so do men perish by those counsels and actions, from whence they expected the greatest advantages: and are undone by some sudden and unavoidable mischief that seizes them, when they thought themselves at the top of their hopes. See Annot. [1].

Ver. 16.] But though events be not in our power, being overruled by a higher providence, we ought not therefore to imagine there is no use of prudent counsel and foresight; for that sort of wisdom, which we call political, how mean soever it may seem in some men’s eyes, is with me of greater price than wealth and riches. And this single observation shows that I have reason for it: See Annot. [2].

Ver. 17.] The city of China is a great circuit, ill fortified, and manned by a very small garrison; against which a mighty king, with numerous forces, made his approaches: and, having intrenched his army, and drawn a strong line about it, and raised his batteries, doubted not to take it speedily, or to have it surrendered into his hands.

Ver. 18.] When, by a strange providence of God, there unexpectedly appeared a wise man, but he so poor that nobody minded him, who saved the city from this imminent danger; and that not by money, for he had none; nor by arms, for the besiegers were far superior in strength; but merely by his wise counsels, contrivances, stratagems, and conduct, wherein he was assisted by weakness: for, say yet, O fool ingratitude! his citizens, who ought to have regarded his fame, and preserved it to all posterity, soon forgot their deliverer; and, because he was poor, regarded him after this memorable service he had done them, no more than they had done before. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 19.] Which notwithstanding ought not to discourage worthy men from serving their country; for wisdom and counsel, from such examples as this, will be preferred by all judicious and virtuous persons, as well as by me, before mere power and strength: because ungodly forces destroy themselves, when a little force, under skilful conduct, achieveth the greatest ends; and therefore it ought to be highly valued in a Christian soldier, to be forward in his multiplicity of means (as if wisdom borrowed all its credit from him that possesseth it) despite the counsel of a poor man, and oftentimes suffer this punishment of their folly and ingratitude, that, shutting their ears to his wholesome advice, they fall into many and great calamities. See Annot. [m].

Ver. 20.] An intolerable fault this. For the modest speeches of the meanest wise men delivered gently, and without noise, are far more worthy to be heard; and, if they meet with a patient ear, and a serene mind, free from the tumult of pride and passion, will be more regarded, and prove more effectual, than the most clamorous and imperious language of a powerful fool: as appears by what the poor man propounded for the saving of the city, which was overruled more in their distress, than the furious outcries of the greatest commander, swaggering among his troops of ignorant soldiers. See Annot. [n].

Ver. 21.] I cannot therefore but again commend counsel and wise conduct, and prefer it before the greatest force, and all manner of warlike preparation; for it sometimes saves whole armies, and cities, from destruction which have been utterly ruined by falls the house, must necessarily befal all the inhabitants who cannot be, when the common air wherein they all breathe is infected; nor have a good crop, when there wants rain to make the earth fruitful. "Only herein (saith he to the pagans) we are not comparis es at equales vobis, ‘alike and undistinguished from you: that we do not grieve as you do, in these common calamities; we are not so impatient;
nor make such outcries and complaints: but a courageous and religious patience quiete our mind, and makes us thankful to God. Viget apud nos spei rubor, &c. “the strength of faith is vigorous among us; and the firmness of hope;” and a mind crect in the midst of the ruins of a decaying world; together with an immovable virtue; a constantly joyful patience; and a soul always secure of her God.
So that she may say with the prophet (Isab. iii. 17, 18).
"Although the fig-tree should not blossom, neither should fruit be in the vine, &c. yet will I rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." The difference of the several expressions used here in this verse, for good men and bad, I have explained, as well as I could in the paraphrase. And that they would see examples of the same event to every one of the opposite persons, may look into the Hebrew commentators, or into Mercer, and there find them.

[c] Ver. 3.] In this and the following verses, he should show how the Hebrews make of the former observation; and their folly therein. For, imagining God loves all men alike, because they find the same things happen to them all, they run into such an excess of wickedness with such a frantic liberty, as brings them speedily to their graves: whereby they lose what they would have kept, and what they desire. And he will shew them how often the interpreters verse 4, in which there is exceeding great difficulty; both because of the various readings of one word, which we translate joined to; and the uncertayness whether Solomon here delivers his own opinion, or the opinion of the epicures; whom some think he here introduces, and making a speech which reaches to verse 11 which in the sense of Greg, Thaumaturgus among the Greeks; of several Latin writers, who herein follow some of the Hebrews: whose wise men say (as we read in Maimonides’s More Nevechim, par. ii. cap. 29) "that some sought to smother the book of Ecclesiastes, because its words savour of heresy," From which impressions he will hide our fathers, and make them think such words as they thought looked that way, to be the sayings of carnal men. But there is no need to have recourse to this way of exposition (as St. Jerome acknowledges) which I have not followed, because there seems to me to be an easy and plain sense of the words, in coherence with the foregoing. And in expressing of that sense, I have neglected neither the writing, nor the reading, as the Hebrews speak; but taken notice of the sense of the word we translate joined to, as it is in the text, and as it is in the margin of the Hebrew Bibles. There are many other ways of explaining it, and the whole verse;
but I shall not trouble the reader with any of them, save only with Melanthon’s (which I do not find taken notice of by any of the latter Interpreters), who translates these words thus: "What therefore is to be chosen? in one that is alive there is hope; and a living dog," &c. In answer, saith he, to those who, being disturbed at the confusion of things, asked,
"Is it then better to live, when we meet with, nothing but reproaches?" Solomon replies, "By all means follow your calling, and commend events to God."
"There is hope while a man lives, that he may come to something; and, although thou canst not be a lion, yet be content to be a mesier creature, though it be but a little dog. Thou art not able to be such a captain as Scipio; yet thou mayest be like to Fabius.
Why do we seek for lions, such heroical captains and governors as Gideon, Samson, and David? Let us use such as we have, who, though they be not like those lions, yet may be like small dogs. And let them do something in the place of God, that they may be vessels of mercy. In which consideration (saith he) Solomon stays long; saying, in the following verses, that the dead are gone from the government of this world; and therefore we must use those that are present. follow our calling, rest in God by faith and a good conscience, whatsoever the events be." As for those that think wise men would here contradict himself in what he said, iv. 2, 3, unless we take these words for the opinion of other men, they may be easily answered; that both are true in different respects. There he speaks with respect to the troubles of life; and here with respect to the advantages et it: to several of which is, hope of bettering our condition, which it is never so miserable. Which may be extended to the minds, as well as our outward concerns: there is hope men may live to see their follies, correct their mistakes, amend their lives, and recover the favour of God; which is irre-coverably lost when they are gone from hence. In short, he seems to say the same, as the Aesop of Pandora’s box: in which hope alone remained, after every thing else that was good was flown away. And there are the like sayings in Theocritus and Euripides: which may be found in Brassus’s Adages, chil. ii. cent. iv. sabg. 12.

[d] There is little difficulty in the following verses; where there are several passages which not representing the sense of those who believe nothing after this life: but hath respect only to the state of men here in this world, as he saith expressly in the conclusion of verse 6.
And in the seventh verse plainly supposes the man to whom he directs his discourse to be religiously affected, and to govern himself in his pleasures with a regard to God, and the assurance that he will pass upon his actions in another place: and thereupon advises him to a cheerful use of all manner of good things in this life.

[e] For I take white garments not to denote a magnificent and splendid way of living; but only a neat, clean, and pure state of life, (being opposite to the habits of mourners, which were sad and sordid), in which there can be no danger, if it do not hinder serious business; but rather be a refreshment after it, and a preparation to renew it, as it follows, verse 10. The Essenes, as Josephus tells (lib. ii. cap. 7, 12), were in white, though they would not use any ointments, which seemed to him too voluptuous. The pleasure, indeed, of them was great (as I shall show upon Cant. i. 2), and was by many abused, and made too expensive and costly: but not therefore to be restrained altogether by sober people: who forbare them in times of mourning (2 Sam. xiv. 2) and fasting (Matt. vi.
17), but used them in feasts and in times of joy,
(1 Pet. xlv. 7: xcvii. 10: Luke vii. 37, &c.)

[f] Ver. 9.] Here is a new proof, that this is not the speech of voluptuaries; for they love not to be confined to a wife: as Solomon here advises this happy man to be: making her his partner in all the joys and comforts he hath; as she will with his grief the House of God, and the life of life, or life in the plural number, is well translated by us “live joyfully” (or very joyfully), for chajim includes in it ali the conveniences and pleasures of life (Ps. xxxiv.
13), and to see is to enjoy, as was noted before.
ECCLESIASTES.

[3] Ver. 10.] Here Gregory Thaumaturgus imagines the speech of the profane, atheistical crew, concludes, and glosses in this manner upon it: Torra πάντα ἡμών ἡγάδε. κ.κ. "Thus vain men talk, but I say unto you," &c. (as it follows in the rest of the chapter). Which is not at all agreeable, in my opinion, to the words of this verse; whereas there is a very serious advice to be diligent in all that we have to do in this world: which is not the way of sensual men, who love not to think of work, contrivance (or thought) knowledge, and wisdom. The difference between which words, I have expressed in the paraphrase; and shall only add, that they seem to comprehend our whole business here in this world. For action is employed in some work or other; to which we must be continually attentive and devising of an end; and for that end learn sciences, but especially study wisdom (unto which sciences are an entrance), that we may both accomplish what we design, and know how to use the fruit of our labour.

[6] Ver. 11.] But after all that we can do, he advises to a faithful dependence upon God and his good providence. Every man observes upon his own fortune or providence. By which advice he reproves that old saying, “Faber quisque fortuna sua;” “Every man makes his own fortune;” Which (as the lord Bacon speaks in a discourse touching helps to the intellectual powers) we ought to look upon as an insolent and unlucky saying: except it be uttered as a hortative or spur to courage, and especially be employed to excite us to watchfulness, in laying hold of all opportunities, and neglecting no occasions, of doing ourselves good. “For otherwise, if it be believed as it sounds, and a man enters into a high imagination that he can compass and fathom all accidents, and ascribes all successes to his own drift and reach, and the contrary to his errors and slips, it is a profane speech: and it is commonly seen that they who are oppressed with want, are not so prosperous, as of him that, without slacking his industry, attributed much to felicity and providence above him.”

Yet this is not the same doctrine with that neither which saith, Vitum fortunae regit, non sapientia: “Fortune, not wisdom, governs the life of a man.” For, as Milton observes, upon the title of this book, there is much difference between philosophical and ecclesiastical sayings. The church, in such sayings as this, confirms providence, admonishes us to have God in our thoughts; whether events be answerable to our desires or not. But profane writers, in such sayings as that now mentioned, leave out divine intervention, and make no notice of it; but only of a blind power, which troubles all things that are wisely designed. It is no imperient inference which Corr anus makes from these words, that all the things which the swift, the valiant, and the rest of the persons here mentioned seek, being their end, of which they frequently speak, and of which they are conscious, the providence of man consists not either in fame, or victory, or eating and drinking, or riches or the favour of others: but in contentment with such things as we have, and God shall think good for us, in his wise providence.

[f] Ver. 15.] Which hath given us many examples of men, who, incited by false persuasions and foolish hopes, dreamt of good events; when, in the midst of their course, they were oppressed with great calamities. Thus Melancthon glosses upon these words in ver. 13, and instances in Marius, Pompeins, and Julius Caesar. Which he explains more largely in his review of the first chapter of this book, a little before he died. "Where he observes how Cato and Marius were disappointed when they hoped for victory in a good cause: and Brutus and Cassius, when they hoped by the treacherous slaughter of Caesar, to have restored the form of the old republic; and Antony, when he thought by opposing Augustus to make himself monarch of the world. All which verifies the old saying (which he remembers in his notes upon the Proverbs), Мακαριστό μάκαρις μονος, ει'tουσαν. "Vain men are abused by their own desires, which lead them to make false accounts, and fill them with vain expectations." And it teaches us the truth of those divine sayings, "The way of man is not in himself. Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it," &c. Examples of which we have in Saul, who hoped to have left the kingdom to his posterity: and in David himself, who thought they not having Absalom for his successor. But Solomon here teaches us to consider how infinitely the wise providence of God excels our greatest wit and cunning, and can more easily overreach all our counsels, and overturn all our well-laid designs, than we can outwit the silly birds and fishes."
away care for the future. For, as Phaedrus saith in Terence, "It is better my benefits should be lost, than I should be lost together with them." And not to be moved from our duty by the world's ingratitude, is an advice he often repeats, very profitable in this chapter: that we may be like our heavenly Father, who "doth good to the evil and to the unthankful."

[tr. Ver. 16.] The beginning of this verse may be illustrated out of Dion Panuus (Omitt. it. De Regn. ii., who observes, that Agamenon wished rather for ten such grave counsellors as Nestor, than so many valiant youths as Ajax and Achilles, εις Σατέρων αποστάνεις τίς Τήνως. Where he shews also how great the power of oratory is to subdue men's minds.

[tr. Ver. 17.] Yet it must be added, that the best and safest counsellors cannot be so much as heard or regarded, though never so wise, till people's straits have made them humble, sad, and serious; as Aben Ezra expounds this seventeenth verse: "The words of the wise are despised by the people, when they are in prosperity; but when they are in distress (almost famished by such a siege as is before mentioned), and silenced by fear and grief, then they listen greedily and diligently." Which Melancthon expresses better: "The words of the wise are heard by the silent" i.e. by such as do not rage with any desire; but seek the truth, and what is wholesome for them. This, and another obvious sense of the words, I have expressed in the paraphrase; but have taken little notice of this, which seems not so near the meaning, that it is better to hear from wise men, who persuade to peace, than to tumultuous spirits, who incite silly people unto war. "He that rules among fools," is a Hebraism for a great fool: or we may understand it of one whose authority sways much among fools, or of a foolish commander. And St. Jerome expounds it of a bantering orator or preacher. "Whatsoever a declarer (saith he) then saeth in the church, by the incitement and elegance of words exciting applauses, moving laughter, or stirring up the people to affections of joy: that it is a sign of folly both in him that speaks, and in them that hear him: for the words of the wise are heard in quiet and moderate silence," &c.

[tr. Ver. 18.] All authors furnish us with abundance of examples of the truth of the last clause of the last verse: but I shall only briefly mention a little of Melancthon's gloss upon the place. There are vessels of wrath, and vessels of mercy: the vessels of wrath are unhappy men, who bring destruction upon themselves and others, though sometimes they be great and wise persons: according to that of Solomon, "Commonwealths are overturned by great and excellent wits." Such were Ahaz, Zedekiah, Catiline, Antony, and others. And in the church, Saint Andrew, Arius, Manicheus, and many other pernicious doctors. Of all which Solomon says, "One sinner destroys much good." Πολλής πονηρίας τοιν εν ένι οἰκίας ἀνάλογα. The vessels of mercy are such men, whose course is salutary to themselves and others: such a poor man in the city was Jeremias; by whose counsels, if they had been followed, Jerusalem might have been saved from destruction. Let us therefore pray to God, with continual prayers, that we may be vessels of mercy; and that he would preserve us from being the pests and furies (ἀδιστορεόντα) of mankind: driving a violent course to our own and others' ruin.

CHAPTER X.

1 Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour.

CHAPTER XII.

1 Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour.

3 Yea also, when he that is a fool walketh by the way, his wisdom faileth him, and he saith to every one that he is a fool.

4 If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, leave not thy place; for yielding pacificeth great offences.

composition, which the apothecary hath made with excellent art; so that it turns the perfume into a stink: in like manner doth a small error, or miscarriage, blemish him, who was highly valued for his discretion and virtue: and the least sordid action destroys his reputation, who was honoured for his noble way of living. See Anot. [c].

Ver. 2.] It is hard indeed to be thus circumspect; but herein a truly wise man's worth is discovered, that his judgment never fails him in the greatest difficulties: wherein he not only resolves aright, and takes things by the right handle, but is ready also in the execution of what he designs, and manages his affairs with exactness, and with dexterity; whereas a fool both mistakes in his aim, and fumbles also in the easiest business, which he handles so awkwardly and untowardly, that it commonly miscarries. See Anot. [b].

Ver. 3.] And though he would dissemble his folly, and endeavour to seem wise, he is so far from his aim, that in every thing he doth, whether great or small, he openly betrays his want of judgment: ay, by his very gait and behaviour, as well as by his words and actions, he tells every body (as plainly as if he said it in so many words) that he is a fool: which appears in nothing more than in his holding all for fools in comparison with himself. See Anot. [c].
5 There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as an error which proceedeth from the ruler:
6 Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low place.
7 I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth.
8 He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whose breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him.
9 Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endanger'd thereby.
10 If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength; but wisdom is profitable to direct.

Ver. 4.] But a man's wisdom hath seldom a greater trial than when his prince is angry with him, and perhaps treats him harshly; which incenses a fool, and makes him leave the court, if not grow factious and rebellious: but it is better and safer advice to keep the station wherein thou art, and to do thy duty faithfully, with a patient, but yet pensive spirit: for nothing so appeases a prince's offended mind, as to give way to his fury by mild and gentle words, and by modest, humble, and submissive behaviour; whereby a man also prevents a world of sins, into which he throws himself, if he yield unto disloyal thoughts. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 5.] And there are worse evils than this, that a wise and good man must patiently bear withal; particularly that great error which princes, it must be acknowledged, either through ignorance, imprudence, surprise, easiness, and being imposed upon by other men's false representations, subtleties, or illusions, are too frequently guilty of: whereby they deride many mischiefs upon all their people: for which they must answer, as if they were committed by themselves. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 6.] In advancing, I mean (which I have too often observed), the most witless, careless men, and of base condition; or suffering such who are noted for nothing but their folly, and their vices, to enter into the most eminent dignities and offices; and in the mean time depressing noble persons, or making no account of them, though endowed no less with all excellent qualities, than with riches and honour. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 7.] By the like senseless folly, I have observed more slaves, that they do not the least office in a private family (being fitter to be kept under by every body, than to be intrusted with the smallest power), appear in the greatest state, by reason of their high preferment; and men of great families, or of singular worth and merit, altogether slighted: nay, forced to wait upon them, as if they had been their lackeys. See Annot. [8].

Ver. 8.] Which foul indignities, notwithstanding, a wise and virtuous person should choose rather to wink at, and patiently endure, than think of moving any public disturbance; for such counsels are extremely hazardous, and commonly end in the ruin of those that give them: according to that known proverb among us, which admonish us how dangerous it is to pursue our own desires and passions violently (especially against kings and princes), whereby men in heat, forgetting their own contrivances, have run themselves into that very ruin, as hunters do into the pit, which they prepared for others: and that other common saying, which warns us not to overthrow the well-settled laws and customs of church or state: for that is like the breaking down a hedge: wherein as a serpent many time lurks, which gives him that attempts it a deadly bite; so they frequently draw upon themselves their own destruction, who pull down the ancient government. See Annot. [9].

Ver. 9.] We abound with proverbs to this purpose: which teach us that the giving public disturbance, or invading the rights of others (especially of kings) and endeavouring to change the form of government, is like removing the boundaries of lands, which raises great troubles; or like the taking much pains to pull down a building without judgment, some of the stones of which fall upon him that needles with it, and crush him in pieces. Such is his folly, also, that he fancies he can mend every thing that is amiss, and form and square the people exactly according to his rule: which proves just like an unskilful workman's cutting a knotty piece of wood; who only makes clefts and chips (as the other doth fractions and roots), and, in the issue, gives a grievous gash to himself. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 10.] This is sufficient to show, how unprofitable all our endeavours are without true judgment. For as a rusty tool, though managed by the strongest man, is so far from effecting his desires, that it only tires his arm, unless he file and whet it to recover its edge: so is the ignorant and careless man, who, though using the best parts than advantages him that hath it, unless it be guided and directed by wisdom and prudence; which can do far more, than violence and force, to correct the errors of kings, and mend the faults of their government. See Annot. [8].

Ver. 11.] But of all other men he is the most dangerous, who spits his venom secretly against his governours: slandering and traducung all their actions in his private discourses, and thereby engraving people's minds against them; and giving them a more grievous wound than if they were stabbed with a weapon: for that may be prevented, or healed afterward: but this, like the biting of the most deadly serpent, is not only burying its tooth to all external poison, both inevitably and incurably. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 12.] See here again the wide difference between a wise man and a fool. The former of which, by his virtuous discourse, wins every one's (especially his prince's) favour; and doth good to those with whom he converses; but the other, by his ill tongue, not only burieth his neighbour, but plumes himself into endless troubles; out of which he cannot deliver himself, nor can any body him. See Annot. [9].

Ver. 13.] And the more he talks, in the greater danger he is: for, though he begins only with senseless and impertinent stuff, he heats himself before he hath done into a rage: and then towards either his discourses is unto others, or how mischievous unto himself.
and through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through.

19. A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry: but money answereth all things.

20. Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bedchamber: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

Ver. 11. No, though he be admonished of it, he cannot desist. For he abounds with words, and while he thinks to mend the matter, he makes it worse; adventuring to talk not only of things civil, but of things sacred; and not only of things present, but of things past also, nay, of things to come; in which wiser men than he hath little or no skill; and yet the less he knows, the more confident and bold he is; when he doth not so much as foresee the evil he is bringing upon himself, by his foolish prating. See Annot. [2].

Ver. 15. Which is the more intolerable, because he torments himself and others with fruitless pains about the abstrusest matter; when he knows not the most trivial, that is as plain as the highway; for if he be engaged in any common business, he only tires himself with toil and labour, but is never the nearer: like a silly traveller, who, being ignorant of the road, generally goes through troublesome paths, and the farther he goes, perhaps, is the farther off from the place he intends. See Annot. [4].

Ver. 16. What a miserable condition then is that poor country in which abounds (as most places do) with a great many of these fools! And, besides, hath the unhappy people to suffer all the time that government, which is the child: whose tutors, counsellors, guardians, and protectors, who have the management of all affairs in his minority, are so given to their pleasure, that they can find no time to mind seriously the public business: nor take any care to infuse principles of wisdom and goodness into their young prince's mind, but let him remain a child as long as he lives. See Annot. [3].

Ver. 17. And, on the contrary, the happiness of that nation is inexpressible, whose king is not only of an illustrious family, descended from the most ancient nobility, but, having had ingenious and liberal education, doth not degenerate from their hereditary virtue, which teaches him to place such officers under him, as are capable of their several stations, as make pleasure wait upon business; which they first despach, and then refresh themselves, not to excess, but to fit themselves to return to their business again. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 18. Being sensible, that as, through the negligence and gross carelessness of the master of a family, the house falls into decay; and for want of timely repair, the rain gets in and rots the roof, and then the supports, and at last the very foundation of it: so, by that laziness and sloth, which is the effect of luxury and vice, kingdoms themselves go to wreck; and seasonable remedies not being applied to public disorders, the whole government by degrees grows out of frame, and is in the end dissolved. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 19. For these idle and dissolute persons, among other mischiefs, consume the public treasure, by their vast expenses in feasts, and all manner of merriment; which serves indeed for their present pleasure, but not that which should be, yet through and is of most universal use to support the prince's crown and dignity: and therefore, when the exchequer is exhausted, these men are tempted to fill it by the most grievous oppressions; may, law and justice, their idolatry:" which was a great reproach to their famed wisdom; and made them vile, even in the opinion of pagan people.

I cannot here omit the reflection which the lord Bacon hath made upon these words (lib. viii. De Augm. Scient. cap. 2 parab. 11), "That the case of men eminent for virtue, is very hard and miserable; because their errors, though never so small, are by no means pardoned. But as in a pure diamond, of great value, the very least speck or smallest cloud strikes the eye, and affects it with a kind of trouble; which in a grosser stone would scarce be observed: so in men's singular abilities, the least infirmities are presently visible; and the matter of men's discourse, and are perverted with a heavier censure; which in men of meaner parts or rank would either pass without notice, or easily procure pardon. Therefore a little folly in a very wise man, a small sin in a very honest man, and a slight indecency of manner in a man of courtly and elegant behaviour, much derogates from their fame and reputation.

So that it would not be the worst course for excellent persons, if they would mingle some absurdities (so it may be done without guilt) with these actions: that they may maintain a kind of liberty to themselves, and confound the notes and characters of smaller defects."

[c] Ver. 3. And agrees with what follows in this verse: the first words of which signify as much as moreover, a fool is so silly that he cannot hide it. For though the rest of the diseases of the mind may cover the face of folly, yet as to the breath of our bodies are with our garments; only folly cannot be dissembled, but will appear to all, in every motion of him whose weakness it is.

There is another sense of the last words of the verse, besides that in which we have translated it: which I have not neglected; because the words will bear the sense of the Vulgar vizz: "He saith every body is a fool." Which St. Jerome interprets thus: "He judges all men by himself." Symmachus thus: "He fancies himself the only wise man." The LXX. (as St. Jerome observes) seem wide from the sense, who translate it thus: "All that he thinks is very vain." Maldonate understands it differently from them all, in this manner: "which they, wherein he himself offends, he reprehends others."
them. " Which arises partly out of an impatience of disgrace; partly lest they should make the wound bleed afresh, by coming into the presence; partly that their prince may see how sorrowful and humble they are: which makes them think fit to withdraw themselves from their employments; nay, to resign, perhaps, the offices and dignities themselves into the prince's hands.

But Solomon disallows this way of cure, as hurtful and prejudicial; and that upon very good grounds. For, first, this course doth too much publish the disgrace itself: from whence both enemies and envious grow more bold to hurt; and friends more timorous to help. Secondly, this course doth reverse the order of things; that the wrath of the prince, which, if it had not been made public, would have died perhaps of itself, becomes now more fixed; and having begun to overthrow the man, is carried on to his utter ruin. And lastly, this retiring savours something of a malignant humour; that is, fallen out with the times: which beaps the mischief of indignation upon the mischief of suspicion.

"The proper precepts, therefore, for a cure are these, which he thinks are contained in the last words: 'Plant demeanour pacifies great offences.' First, above all things not to seem insensible to, or not so affected as in duty he ought to be by, the prince's displeasure, but to account it a necessary, and pride of spirit. That is, let his countenance be composed, not to a sullen and contumacious, but to a grave and modest pensiveness; and in all manner of employments let him show himself less pleasant and cheerful than he was wont to be: which may be expedient, also, that some friend or other shall be sent to the prince and instate sensibly, with what sensible grief he is inwardly afflicted. Secondly, let him carefully avoid all, even the least occasion, whereby either the thing itself, which was the first cause of the indignation, may be revived: or the prince apprehend a new occasion to be displeased with him again, or, upon any account whatsoever, to chide him before others. Thirdly, let him with all diligence seek, on the other side, all manner of occasions, wherein his service may be acceptable to his prince; that both he may show a prompt and forward affection to redeem his past offence; and his prince may understand what a good sense he has of his interest. Fourthly, let him sagaciously either lay the fault upon others; or instate, that it was committed with no ill intention, in himself; or represent their malice who accused him to the king, or aggravated his fault, more than it deserved. To conclude, let him be diligent and watchful in all things, and intent upon the cure."

There is another great man of our own, who seems to take this for an admonition not to be false-hearted, by fleeing from our station, when mighty men from over upon us. "In an upright course (saith Bishop Sanderson, in his sermon upon 1 Cor. vii. 21, sect. 46) fear not the face of man, neither leave thy place, though the spirit of a ruler rise up against thee: patience will conjure down again that spirit in time, only if thou keep thyself within thy circle." But I look upon this, which agrees not with the latter part of this verse, as an accommodation only of these words to his present purpose; and not as intended for the proper sense of them.

[Footnote {f}: Ver. 6.] I mentioned verses in the foregoing annotation [c] because fully, in the holy language, comprehends that, as well as stillness, or incapacity to manage affairs, and mindlessness, negligence, and sloth: which are both denoted in the Hebrew word בְּמַעְטָה in this place: where the abstract (as they speak) being put for the concrete, we are to understand idle, ignorant, and senseless men; and that in the highest degree; and, being opposed to the rich, they are also supposed to be men of mean extractions, or condition. For which reason the rich also are to be understood, not simply men of estates, or great birth, but of excellent education, noble endowments of mind, and attentive unto business, &c.

[Footnote {g}: Ver. 7.] The sense of this verse is not different from that of the former; but the same thing is set forth in another way. Here it is, that riches bring upon them their place and dignity; the other from their equipage (as we now speak), wherein they appear upon their advancement. For to ride belonged unto great persons; as to go on foot, unto inferiors. And to ride on horses, in Solomon's time, was much more stately than to ride on mules, which were used by great men in David's time (2 Sam. xiii. 29; 1 Kings i. 33,) or on asses, in former ages (Judg. x. 4).

[Footnote {k}: Ver. 8.] Yet it is senseless to be enraged, by this prerogative of senseless and unworthy men, into rebellion, as the wise man here shews by several provoking sayings. In the application of which to this purpose, I have the approbation of Melanthon; who expounds the last words of ver. 8 and the last of ver. 9, concerning the punishment of those who go about to change the ancient laws, and the form of government. And it is more agreeable to the phrases of breaking hedges and removing landmarks, or such like things, than to apply it unto the mischiefs that princes bring upon themselves and their countries, by such improper and unlawful actions as are here mentioned; though that be true also, that such disorders give great disgust and are the occasion of dangerous commotions.

Which commonly are most fatal, notwithstanding, to those that are so foolish as to advise, contrive, and excite them. Who bring that mischief on themselves which they in vain will! should wholly have fallen upon others: as Solomon here shows by two similitudes: one taken from the pits dugged for the entrapping foxes, wolves, and such like creatures; or, as others will have it, from those that undermine the walls of towns, and often perish in the mines wherein they themselves have long wrought. Agreeable to the law which Aristotle mentions (in his third book of Rhetorics, cap. 9) out of DEMOCRITUS. Chius, σατανάς κακός τιτᾶν ήσυχ, ὡσαπό κακά τιτᾶν. The other from a breaker of a hedge, or fence, or wall (for so we translate this word, NUMB. xxii. 21); or any partition (so the LXX. translate it by the word φράγματος) whereby men's grounds were separated, and kept in several: in which enterprise he meets with his death's wound from a serpent. Which were wont to lurk in rocks (PROV. xxx. 19) and in holes of the earth (ISA. xi. 8) as well as in the bottom of hedges, or old walls (as the wise man here intimates), and in other dry places where there was no water (DEUT. viii. 15). There were water-serpents also (AMOS. x. 2) in the man-made canals: [2] Ver. 9. There is great variety of judgments concerning the sense of this verse: but that which I have given I am sure is not improper; which, in short, is this: that they who, out of love with novelty, will not let things alone in their place, but be altering and changing, though thereby they make great rents and distractions; and, thus only giving themselves a great deal of trouble, and disturb the quiet of their own mind, but ran the hazard of ruining themselves, together with whole kingdoms and churches. Therefore that saying of Pindar, quoted by Melancthon, should always be in people's minds: "It is easy to disturb a government, but God alone can settle it again." [4] Ver. 10. The phrases are sufficiently explained in the paraphrase: only I think fit to note, that the word which (following the LXX.) we translate endangered, is by FERSTERUS translated aspergetur, that is, hurt by the shivers of it.

[2] Ver. 11.] In the exposition of this also there is much variety; according to the Hebrew phrase, master of the tongue is expounded either of a mere babbler, and mere talker; or of a backbiter and slanderer. I have taken it in the latter sense; as St. Jerome, in the Vulgar edition, doth. And the former part of the verse may either signify a serpent that is not enchanted, or that cannot be enchanted by any means. For some such sort of serpents there were, as Boethius observes (LIB. iii. de Sist. Animal. cap. c. paritius enim inopiae, &c.) and we shall see appear of Jer. vii. 19; and other places of holy scripture. Unto which, I think, the backbiter and detractor may be best compared: for nothing will restrain his violent humour, nor defend one from the mischief which he doth in secret. I have connected this verse also with the precedent matter; as it may be, though we should take the words in the sense here given. If that a serpent will bite if he be not charmed; so will he do mischief that talks much if he govern not his tongue with great wisdom. Or, as others interpret the latter part of the verse, a man's words, though never so eloquent (for so the word lachash is used, ISA. iii. 2) will do no good, to pacify a prince's mind, if he be not charmed at the very first, before he has fixed his anger. Others take this verse separate from the rest, and understand no more by it than this: that a calumniator is like a serpent, that bites secretly: without so much as giving warning by its hissing. So Melancthon: who truly observes that calumny is a most grievous pestilence; which rages and destroys whole countries. For it first kindles dissensions; and thence arise confusion of religion, wars, and desolations. Or, according to our translation, "A babbler can no more refrain from blustering out his own or others' secrets, than a serpent, if he be not charmed, can do from biting." Which may be applied also to the better form of calumny: He that gives himself a liberty of talking of everything, blurs out even the secrets and the vices of princes; whereby he not only makes himself odious, but procures his own destruction.

[ag Ver. 12, 13.] The three following verses may be also referred to the same matter; and the latter part of this is capable of another sense, that in our translation add this to this: "that a fool's lips subvert all that a wiser man hath said." So St. Jerome explains it. There would be less harm in folly, saith he, if it would be content with its own rustic ignorance; but it affects to contradict the dictates of wisdom, and to altront prudent persons; yea, to subvert and overthrow them: whereby it becomes exceeding wicked.

[ag Ver. 14.] And it is in vain to hope to amend this; because, as Solomon here observes, a fool thinks himself in this very thing to be wise and learned; that he is able to multiply words, though they be never so confused, without head or foot (as we speak) and he say the same thing over and over again, in a round; as the LXX. seem to understand the word ἀλατοθ, madness (in the foregoing verse), which they translate προσεψίαν, as if it were from the Hebrew word, which signifies a dance. Melanthon understands these three verses, as if they expressed the difference between wise counsellors or teachers, and such as are foolish, or perverted doctrine, and himself; that they all do very wise: though they direct their counsels and instructions merely by their own or others' blind affections. So Mardonius persuaded Xerxes unto his unhappy war; and Pompey had such-like instigators: but they were ignorant men, or considered not what had been before. So he expounds this fourteenth verse: "They who by foolish counsel or perverted doctrine, undo themselves and others, regard not former examples; nor have any prospect of future judgment."

[ag Ver. 15.] He refers all to this verse (where I have put two senses together) unto the same thing. These perverse wise men, saith he, make a great busie to no purpose; and, endeavouring to reform many things, bring lamentable events upon themselves and others; because they are ignorant of the sense of mankind; and consider not the weight of business; nor discern what is fit to be done. Which is comprehended in these words, "They know not the way to the city, or to the court;" but are like the shepherds, who are unable to be useful. And the looking-glass bestowed on him; in which contemplating himself, he fell into admiration of his own beauty: and thereby grew so insolent, that he was not only thrown out with disgrace, but broke his neck.

[ag Ver. 16.] From hence Solomon takes occasion to admonish us, that the misery or welfare of a people depends very much upon the king that governs them. Who, if he be a child, must be governed by others; and if they prove bad, as commonly they are, all things go to wreck. This seems to be the sense of this verse; where by a child I understand a prince to whom the sceptre falls in his minority: though it may be taken as (Jo. Porcius expounds it for one that is unskilful in business; Isa. li. 6, 7; Jer. i. 6, 7; Isa. iii. 4) and I have not omitted the common interpretation, which understands it of such a weak prince, as is wholly governed by his passions, and lets the worst of men govern him. Who, like children, think all is well, if they may but play, and follow their pleasure: Which they take so greedily, that they are drinking when they should be at counsel; dancing when they should be judging causes. So Jo. Drusius, I remember, expounds them "eating in the morning," in his annotations on Numb. xvi. 5, where he applies that place of Jeremiah, xxxii. 19, to illustrate this: and observes, that the morning is the time of judgment. Such a morning is for wrath or computations. According to that of Socrates, "in the morning counsel, in the evening conversation." And that of the Hebrews, Non judicant in hora ebrietatis; "They do not sit to judge in the hour of drinking;" i. e. in the evening. Which is so prejudicial to government, that there was an edict delivered by the Carthaginians, that no magistrate whatsoever should drink any wine at all, τοιον τω ἐνομω εὶς ὁμοιον, "that year in which they bear any office," &c. as we read in Plato, lib. ii. De Legibus, p. 674, edit. Serrani. And he admirably represents what the mischief of it is, when a mere youth governs, who is not able to undergo so weighty a change, in the next book, p. 601.

[ag Ver. 17.] And, on the other side, the felicity of a nation is unspoken, when it is under the care of a gallant prince; whom he calls βασιλικαρια. Which may either signify his descent, or the excellent qualities of his own person: or rather both, one who inherites the virtue of his ancestors. Who, though they should chance to leave him but a child, yet intrust him with such wise and faithful persons, that they intise him into the spirit of his heroic predecessors: which makes the people willingly submit unto him. For, as Plato observes, that parents everywhere have the power of governing their children: so next to this it is consonant γνωριμοι προγνωριμοι, "that generous persons, who observe the things that their fathers and ancestors do," should govern those that are mean and base" (lib. iii. De Legibus, p. 690).

Wherefore the Babylonian princes are called by this name, Isa. xxxvi. 14, where the Chaldee hath bene hert, the sons of ignoings and free men; or the sons of heroic persons. For hence comes the name of Herod: and hence Rabbath is reiled by the name of Liber, i.e. a prince or noblemann, as Bochartus rightly observes in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 18. And so the LXX. translate βασιλικαρια in this place, νος ἰδούμω: which word they elsewhere translate ονοματον, "nobles" (Neh. v. 7; vi. 17); and ἀρχοται (Isa. xxxiv. 12). It is violently derived from the white garments, or robes of fine linen, wherein such great persons appeared: but it is more likely to be of some foreign original; and may be best translated illustrious persons.

[ag Ver. 18.] I have referred this and the next verse unto the same matter. And this represents, that so the prince, though he should make up the smallest breaches, and correct the beginning of disorders; by showing what ruin attends upon supine sloth, remissness, and negligence. Which is expressed in two most significant words: the first (stolleftness) implying such a sluggish temper, that a man will move neither hand to any work; the other (tendleness) such a remissness and listlessness, as that is in a man that is sleslep; when his hands hang down (as the phrase is, Heb. xii. 12), which seems to be the import of skipluth in this place; coming from a word that signifies humble and depressed.

[ag Ver. 19.] The next verse represents the vast power of money: which therefore a prince should be sure to have a due regard to; because it commands all other things. As he finds, when he is in want of it; and is thereby tempted to squeeze his people unjustly; or to set all things to sale: which is another way of expounding that phrase, "money answers all things." I cannot omit here to note, that it would not be absurd, if this verse should be connected with ver. 17, to signify the happiness of a nation, whose princes takes care that his people want not provision (bread and wine in the language of the Hebrews signifying all that is necessary for human life); but especially that the money of the nation, whereby all things are purchased, be not exported.

[ag Ver. 20.] So we see, that whatsoever negligence, or profligacy and waste there be, it should not provoke any wise and good man to speak contemptuously of his sovereign, or of his ministers: if he consider merely how unsafe it is to make such reflections on him. For there are no ears so faithful, no place so secret, as the ears of kings, according to the old saying, being as long as their arms. That is, they can as easily discover crimes, as punish them: they have spies on purpose every where; or men to ingratiate themselves will turn accusers; or loyal persons may, some way or other, come by the knowledge of it, and think themselves bound to let their sovereign know who are his enemies. Thus most interpreters and the most learned understand this verse; and therefore I have followed no other interpretation in my paraphrase. For thus that admirable person, S. Bochartus, glosses upon these words (Epist. qua respond. ad. iii. quest. p. 57): The true mind of Solomon is, that kings do not want their prophetic ear, and his advice; "emissaries and errand observers;" by whom they learn what is most secret. Which was the reason that Midas was represented by the poets with asses' ears; because he had those that listened and hearkened in all parts of his kingdom: and brought him news of every thing, that was done and by his enemies.

And thus St. Jerome: the simple sense is, that we take care we be not overcome by anger and fury, to speak evil of our prince, or detract from him: for he may, some way or other, hear it, contrary to our expectation, and make us suffer for our unguarded tongue. That is the meaning, saith he, of the last part of this verse, which is a real expression, like that in common speech when we say, "The walls that are conscious to what you speak will discover it." Nay, this very proverbial hyperbole is used in good authors, for a thing very secret, "Unless some bird saw it." So Aristophanes, in his comedy which hath its name from birds:

Οὐδὲς ἦτο τοι ἀκούσας τον θησαυρόν, πέτον τετετέκτων ὁμοίως.

"None ever set eye upon my treasure, unless perhaps some bird."

And Sidus cites this verse out of the same poet (which more illustrates the sense I have given of this phrase in the paraphrase):

Οὐδεὶς με οὐκ ἤκουσεν πέτον ὁ περιστρώμενος ὁμοίως.

"None sees me unless the bird that passeth by."}

But I am not satisfied whether Solomon had not respect to something else; and intimated that some prophet might make the discovery: as Elisha did of many things spoken in the king's own bedchamber, (2 Kings vi. 9.) The Chaldee paraphrase, by "that which hath wings," understands the heavenly ministers; and so many of the Hebrews: about which, though they talk many fabulous things, yet the meaning may be, the angels shall, one way or other, bring it to light, and give occasion to the discovery. For as a great man of our own observers (Op. Tayler, lib. iii. Duct. Dub. chap. iii. rule 3, a. 3), "the government of the other world reaches strangely even unto us; and we speak not a word in vain, but, by the divine providence, it is disposed to purposes that we understand not. And therefore it is not safe to speak evil of magistrates in our private houses; lest the angel that attends us order it so, that it pass into public notice, and can for the king (who is above the rich or mighty), call him not accused in thy heart: which being a thing that can only be perceived by God, who is the searcher of the heart; it shows that, as angels take care of the rich, the wise, the mighty, and noble; so kings are the peculiar care of God," &c.

And, indeed, as the same Bochartus adds, it appears from hence, that Solomon doth not deter us from this sin by the mere fear of dangers; for he lays a restraint not only on our words, but on our thoughts: which are known only unto God. And if we may not in thought detract from him, how much less speak a reproachful word of him; or move rebellion against him.

I shall only add two things more, and conclude this chapter with a notable discourse of Martin Luther: first, that some of the Hebrews who take the angels to be here meant, thereby understand the devil: as our Savour, by the "fowls of the heaven," understands a "dissembler, deceitful evil one" (Matt. xiii. 4); but especially night-birds, they say (who may seem here to be meant, where he speaks of the bed-chamber), denote the devil and his angels. Whence that proverb among the Arabsians, "Speak where there is no night-bird:" that is, where no creature hears.

Secondly, the last words of the verse are capable of this sense (if we distinguish between bird of the air, and that which hath wings): taking the one for angels, and the other for men; who minister to kings (as angels do to God), that the angels will report our blasphemy in heaven; and some or other will be found to reveal it, and carry the news of it to the king upon the earth. Gregory Nesoracensis suggests the former part of this: who thus expounds the words, "Swift and winged messengers carry all to the only rich and great king, discharged both a spiritual and rational ministry." It will not be unuseful, much less unseasonable, in such an unerry age as this, to let the reader understand how deeply the first reformers of religion laid this precept to heart; by transcribing some of Luther's admonitions, in his annotations on this verse.

"The worse and the more malignant (saith he) the world is, the more studious and laborious Solomon teaches us to be, in the doing our duty. Particularly, in honou ring magistracy; because it is a divine ordinance, and the better part of the world: by which God manages all things under the sun. But the ungodly begin their wickedness chiefly in the contempt of magistrates; when they hear how God blames and reproves them in the holy scriptures. But it belongs to the divine office to find fault with magistrates, and to rebuke them, therefore, in order to correct it, yet do not imitate it. For thou art not God; nor the ordinance, no, nor the reformer and restorer of the divine ordinance. But as God reproves them, so thee also, in the holy scriptures; that thou mayest do thy duty, and not meddle with what belongs to them. Whereas thou forgetting the beam in thy own eye, beginnest to spy the mote in another man's; correcting thy superiors, by whom thou rather art to be corrected. And if thou shouldst sustain their office, wouldest offend more than they do, and not do so much good as is performed by them. The meaning therefore of Solomon is this: I have spoken much of princes, how they walk the world; but do thou reverence them, notwithstanding that; for they are not a human ordinance, but a divine. St. Peter, indeed, calls the king a human creature; because he is assumed from among men, but his authority is divine: and though princes be bad, they are to be honoured because of this ordinance of God. Why then wilt thou speak evil of those who are vexed with so many and such great sins, as their own ordinance might not have suffered them to be?—'tis good! And if they be bad and foolish, their own impiety is mischief enough to them, and brings them into sufficient danger. Bear with them, then, and compassionate them; rather than rail upon them, and revile them," &c.
CHAPTER XI.

1 Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days.
2 Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.
3 If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be.
4 He that observeth the wind shall not sow:

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.—As obedience to governors, and patience under ill government, are the means (he shows in the foregoing chapters) to preserve peace and quietness; which are the great blessings of human life; so in peaceable, quiet, and easy times nothing contributes more to our happy living, than the constant exercise of charity, in works of mercy which make us beloved of God and man. Upon which, therefore, the wise man here insists largely; in the first six verses of this chapter; and then presses men to it by the consideration, that there is no pleasure like this, while they live; and that as they cannot keep what they have long, but death will rob them of all: so they must give an account of what they have enjoyed, and therefore had best make such an use of it, as will stand them in stead at that time. This I take to be the sum of this chapter.

Ver. 1.] Now, having shown how thou oughtest to behave thyself towards those above thee, look down a little upon those below thee; and believe that nothing is more profitable (though the world think otherwise), as well as obliging, than to be kind and charitable unto all men; but especially to the poor, miserable people, though they be not so good, perhaps, as they ought to be; but will ungratefully forget all thy benefits, and never think of them more, or, at least, never likely to make thee any return, no more than if thou didst sow thy seed on the sand, or in the sea; lest not that discourage thee; for when thou thinkest not of it, God will requite thee, either in this world or in the next: may, there may come a time, when some of those who have been relieved by thee, may do thee service. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 2.] Give therefore unto others some part of the good things which God hath given thee; and give very liberally, and be not weary neither of well-doing: but though there be a great many suitors that solicit thy charity, extend thy bounty to them, rather above than beneath thy ability: for thou knowest not how calamitous the times may shortly be, and then the good thou hast done will stand thee in greater stead than all the goods thou enjoyest: which perhaps may be taken from thee, and leave thee nothing to do good withal; but make thee an object of other men's charity; which no person hath greater reason to expect, than he who, when he had where-7 ¶ Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun; 8 But if a man live many years, and rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days of darkness; for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity.

9 ¶ Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and early and late; when thou art young, and when the sun and light, and the moon and stars, return upon thee, and thy days be in a declining condition; for thou knowest not, which will hit to do the most good unto others, and to bring the greatest blessing back upon thyself: or whether all may prove alike beneficial unto both. See Annot. [1].

Ver. 7.] Let not love of thy own pleasure make thee forget to advise the young and becomes of other men: for though it is true, life is full of delight when we are in a prosperous estate, and we are entertained with great variety of pleasure when we look about us and behold all the good things, the sun shows the bounty of heaven hath provided for us; yet, believe it, there is no satisfaction comparable to that of having done abundance of good with which that he bestows upon us. See Annot. [2].

Ver. 8.] If God therefore should bless a man with a healthful body and a very long life, I do not forbid him to take the comfort of it; but advise him rather (as I have often done), with a mind free from solicitude and carefulness, to enjoy all the innocent pleasures it can afford him: only let them be tempered with these two reflections: first, that as the fairest sun that ever shone, will set, and the night follow it; so the most merry life will have an end, and then we must lie down in our graves longer than we have lived, without the least glimpse of these joys. Secondly, that while we live, nothing which we expect hereafter, can give us more contentment than what we enjoy now; and will slide away also us fast, and leave us altogether unsatisfied, unless we have done some good with it. See Annot. [3].

Ver. 9.] And there is one thing, above all other, which if the most childish youth would consider, and always carry in mind, I might give him full liberty to be as joyous and merry as he would. I incline him rather to think of this; and, while he hath the daintiest taste of them, to invent all manner of pleasures for his entertainment; denying himself nothing that he desires, and gratifying all his senses; it is this, that he must give a strict account of all his actions unto God; who will deal well with him, if he have kept himself within his bounds, and enjoyed only lawful pleasures, with thankful acknowledgments unto him: but will punish him for all his extravagances and forgetfulness of pleasure, with torments infinitely greater than all his sinful delights. And this, be it known to thee, whatsoever thou art that readest this, is a certain truth. See Annot. [4].

Ver. 10.] And therefore, by the thoughts of this, I advise thee, also, to suppress and banish that fierce- ness, rage, sadness, fretting, and vexation, with all such like perturbations of mind, unto which, in the heat of thy blood, thou art subject, when any thing cross thee (suppose when thou art only reproved for thy faults); and let no ill thy desires, which then are strong, and would plunge thee in all wickedness, stay with thee; for, if such care as this be not taken to lay restraints upon him, there is nothing more senseless, foolish, rash, inconstant, and froward to ruin itself, than man in his childish youth; when he is in the dawning, as we call it, of his days, and comes first acquainted with the unctions of this world. See Annot. [5].

let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

10 Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh: for childhood and youth are vanity.

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] Charity being the subject of his discourse in the first six verses of this chapter (as was observed in the argument), he begins with the proper object of it: those who, as our Saviour speaks, Luke xiv. 14, are not likely to recompense us again. Thus this first verse (about which there are various conceptions), I think, may be most naturally expounded. And it is a very ancient exposition, as appears by the words of Gregory Thaumaturgus, which are these in English: "It is just to communicate unto others, &c. for, though for the present it may seem to be lost (and thrown away, as we speak), like the bread that is cast upon the water; yet, in process of time, thy love and charity will find it, and be profitable to them and without fruit." And, after the same manner, Greg. Nazianzen in aftertimes (Orat. xix. p. 298), speaking of the liberality of his father to the poor, saith, he proceeded upon this maxim: that it is much better, for the sake of those who may be worthy, to give to those who are unworthy, than for fear of bestowing our charity upon the unworthy, let worthy people want it. To which that seems, saith he, to belong, which we read in Solomon ("Cast thy bread upon the water,") which is not thrown away and quite lost, in the account of him that justly estimates things; but is sent thither where all that we do is laid up: and shall in due season meet us again, though we think not of it."

And, to strengthen this, it is observed by some, that waters in scripture signify great affliction and misery (Ps. xviii. 17; lxiv. 12.) And therefore the sense of the proverb is, not of sowing in a fertile ground, by the rivers; or in a soil well watered, from whence men naturally expect a fruitful crop (as some expound it); but of the same place, wherefrom we expect no fruit; no more than if we threw the seed in a rapid river; in which it is carried away, nobody knows whither, and seems utterly lost.

And so it may be applied also to ungrateful people; as I have touched in the paraphrase: and I shall not trouble the reader with other expositions, which may be found in most commentators; only naming this of Maldonate (which agrees well enough with that which I have followed), "Give to the poor, whose miseries are so great that their faces are all wet and besmeared with tears." And though there be many of them, be not sparing, if thou art able to receive them; for waters signify sometimes a multitude of people in the scripture of the ancient writers. But that is the sense of the next verse and therefore, upon the face of the waters, is as much as upon those, who will be gone presently, like the waters of a river: and never bring any thing back to us to reward us; if they do, is more than could be expected.

As for the word bread, it signifies any benefit whereby the poor may be supported; especially all sorts of food (1 Sam. xiv. 24, where it comprehends honey, and every thing that was edible), more particularly that food which is made of corn (Gen. iii. 19), and from thence signifies corn itself, of which bread is made (Isa. xxviii. 26). And so St. Jerome here explains it, agreeable to what I said above of sowing seed in the water.
CHAPTER XI.

[6] Ver. 2.] And as in the first verse he has respect to the quality of the persons, unto whom we are to give; so here to the number of them, and the quantity of our alms; which is expected, perhaps, by a great multitude, in what is sent from our estates; and in these words, saven, yea eight. Seven is a complete number; eight added to it denotes something above that which we account perfection. His words are these, that "his father gave not only, τας πτωτς, out of his superfluity; but τας διαγωνιως, out of his necessaries; according to the prescription of Solomon. Give a portion not only to seven: but if an eighth came, he was not here sparing; but much more ready to give than others are to get." In short, he means, give most liberally, φιλαδελφον, as Greg. Thaumaturgus here expresses it, not sparingly, but profusely. I omit other glosses upon the verse, and the criticism which some make upon the word portion; which, they think, would exclude what was sent from foot to foot, to those that were absent; of which there is no certainty. I will only note, that here again Solomon contradicts the vulgar principle, upon which covetous wretches move; and directs the quite contrary. They think all is lost that is given away in charity; no such matter, saith the preacher (ver. 1); the fruit of it will be found hereafter, beyond what was expected. And saith the prelate, I know not what will be hereafter: now I have enough, but in the latter end of my life I may want; and therefore it is best to save whilst I may. No, saith the preacher: for that very reason, give; because thou knowest not what may be hereafter; when that may be taken away from thee, which now thou wilt not bestow upon needy people. So it is, he was not here sparing; but much more ready to give than others are to get.

[c] Ver. 3.] In this verse he illustrates both the duty and the reason of it. The former by the clouds, which are a fit emblem of charity: the second, by the trees, which can bring forth fruit no longer than they continue joined to their root: from which being separated, they bear no more, nor can be fixed to their root, as the clouds may be filled with water again; nor the trees be used of this verse; which Gregorius understands as if it meant no more than the foregoing: "Do good to men without distinction; like him who, when he cuts down a tree, regards not which way it falls." I omit other interpretations, and shall only mention Maldonatus's gloss upon this verse, which is ingenious enough. He urges us, saith he, to do good while we live, by two reasons: first, from the profit of it, because we shall receive more than we give; like the clouds, which receive from the earth but a thin vapour; which they return to it in the most copious showers. The second, from the impossibility of being in a capacity to do good when we are dead: for then, like a tree, we must continue as we were, always sent from roots unto roots, never restored to our former condition again. Corranus alone (as far as I can find) expounds the latter part thus, in his annotations: "A tree, in what place seeyer it is planted, there abides, and brings forth fruit; and so ought we to help others by all manner of means; in whatsoever place or time we live," and the like. As to what was sent from foot to foot, if any think fit to apply this, the words are tolerable condition wherein we must remain in the other (like a tree cut down, which, if it fall towards the north, cannot change its posture, and turn to the south), they cannot follow a fitter gloss upon the words than this of Luther's: "If the Lord finds thee in the south, that is, fruitful and rich in good works, that will be well but if in the north that is, barren of good works, it will be ill with thee. Howsoever thou art found, so shalt thou be judged; and so thou shalt likewise receive.

[d] Ver. 4.] And then follows here an admonition to take the first opportunity of being good; and not to defer it, because now it may seem unseasonable, and the present business thou wilt weigh every thing alike, thou shalt never be able to do any thing." And thus Melanchthon understands this place, "As events are not in our power (which he takes to be the meaning of ver. 3), so he that will have certain and circumscribed events (that is, such and such things come to pass), before he act, will never attempt any thing;"

And so a great divine of our own expounds it: "If we will suspend our resolutions till we can bethink ourselves of something free from all inconveniences; in most of our deliberations we shall never resolve upon any thing at all: God having so tempered things, that every commodity hath its incommodiousness, every convenience some inconvenience attending it; which, many times, all the wit and industry of man are not able to serve." (Bishop Sanderson's Sermon upon 1 Cor. x. 24, p. 215)

"St. Jerome also elegantly accommodates these words to negligent pastors; who will not preach, but when the people are very desirous to hear; and there is a fair gale breathing to favour their design. And gives this advice to us: Do not say, "This is a fit time, that is, a seasonable; for we are ignorant what is the way, and what is the will of the Spirit, which dispenseth all things;"

[e] Ver. 5.] In this verse he seems to pursue the same metaphor of the wind, which blows uncertainly; and nobody knows whence, nor from what causes. And therefore from our ignorance of that, and indeed of all other things, which we are here conversant withal; of our own soul, for instance (which our translators understand by the word ρυαχ, "spirit"), and of our body, or of that vis formatix, how it goes about its work, to make this body of ours in the womb, which may possibly be meant by spirit (Job xxiii. 4; Ps. civ. 30). Solomon persuades us not too to presume to know; for it is said to be the work of the grace of God in the course of this world, in his overruling providence; and therefore to do our duty, and leave events to him.

[f] Ver. 6.] Imitating the husbandman (with which metaphor he began this discourse, and now concludes it), who, not knowing which will prosper, sows both early and late; he says, at this very verse to be an allusion to those that saw some very forward seed; which perhaps may hit, when that which is sown at the ordinary time doth not: or, per-
I REMEMBER how thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them:

Ver. 1. The best counsel, therefore, that I can give every man is this: that he would awaken, and prove his heart, and consider well all the works of God, unto whom he is so deeply indebted, that he received his very being from him; and, therefore, let him apply himself faithfully and affectionately to his service, in his most vigorous age, as soon as ever he can consider that he is not his own, but God's, who formed him in his mother's womb, told him when, and brought him out of his mother's bowels. And he must not defer this weighty business till thou art sick, or all thy faculties so broken by the infirmities of old age, that though it last several years, yet they shall prove flat and dull, irksome and tedious, to thee; and no pleasure at all

CHAPTER XII.

ARGUMENT. — He continues his advice to young men, (begun in the last two chapters of the foregoing chapter,) wishing the thing of all which is expedient two ways by interpreters. Some taking these words as a permission, under such restraints as he mentions in the end of the verse; others, as ironically and sarcastically (as the Greek phrase is spoken, by way of mockage and bitter scoff.) The first two phrases ("rejoice, and let thy heart cheer thee") incline to the former way, being commonly used in a good sense, and in the sight of thy eyes) unto the other way, being commonly used in a bad. Therefore the scope of the place, and the coherence, must determine it. And as the LXX. and St. Jerome go the first way, so it agrees best in my opinion with what went before; and therefore so I have paraphrased him in translating that they are two different words in the beginning of the verse, which we translate as if they were the same (viz. "young man" and "youth") I have not done amiss, I think, but expressed them more significantly by these words; "childish youth." And as they are distinguished in the last verse; where that word which here we translate "youth," we more truly translate "childhood," which yet goes before youth.
left in them, but only the remembrance of a well spent life; without which, instead of thanking God, thou wilt be apt to do nothing but complain, or groan, under the weight of one evil or other that falls upon thee. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 2.] For what joy can a man have, or what mirth can be derived (as therefore what folly is it not to think of God before that time), when the natural heat and vigour are quite spent, and all the powers and faculties of soul and body in such a languishing condition, that he is altogether unfit for the offices of piet; particularly for the acknowledgment of God's benefits, the very remembrance of which is slipped out of his mind, or he hath but a dull perception of them; being no more sensible of the benefit of the sun itself, when it gives the brightest light, than he is of the moon or stars: but the day is as sad, and as full of pains and heaviness to him as the night; and there is no end of them, no intermission: but they succeed one another, as the clouds do in a rainy season, when one is no sooner emptied, but another is gathered, and ready to discharge itself in showers. See Annot. [b].

Ver. 3.] Is this a proper time to be allotted to the service of God, when a man cannot serve himself? his hands being struck with a palsy, and made unable either to feed or defend his body; his feet bending under the weight of it, having lost their power to support him: his teeth likewise, so rotten, or worn away, or fallen out, that they cannot chew his meat; and the sight of his eyes, which were wont to show him things at a great distance, now so failing him that he cannot know one man from another, though they stand hard by him. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 4.] Is this the time to gain acceptance with God, when he is despised by men; and excluded the public assemblies, because his voice is so low, that nobody can hear him? Nay, his lips look as if they were closed, and fall so inward, that he can but mumble; by reason of the loss of his teeth, the weakness of his lungs, and the defect of other instruments of speaking: for can he recruit himself as he was wont, by rest; for some sleep departs from his eyes, and he awakes early as the birds, but is not pleased at all with their songs: his hearing being so dull and flat, that he is not moved by the best music in the world; though he listen and incline his ears unto it with never so much diligence. See Annot. [d].

Ver. 5.] For joy and all such pleasant passions being fled away, melancholy fear alone remains; which makes him scarce dare to tread in the highway, much less (his head is so giddy) to go up a pair of stairs; any, he thinks himself unsafe in the strongest fortress, such is the feebleness of old age, which looks venerable by its grey hairs, but they are an early sign of approaching death, and are made contemptible by his almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail: because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets:

6 Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern.

7 Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

8 ¶ Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity.

9 And moreover, because the Preacher was crumpled shoulders, hips, and back: which, as they are of themselves a sufficient load, so are relieved and supported by no bodily pleasures, the very desires of which now fail him: for there is but a very short step between him and his grave; unto which if he be carried with the usual solemnities, it is all his friends can do to prevent. See Annot. [e].

Ver. 6.] Remember therefore thy Creator, while the noble faculties of sense and motion remain entire, and strong and lively; for the time will come (and that will be very unfit for this, or indeed any other business) when they will be totally disabled: the nerves, for instance, will shrink up and be dispersed; the brain itself, and all those precious vessels wherein it is contained, be of no use at all unto thee: for the very fountain of life,—the heart, will fail, and the veins and arteries no longer carry the blood round the body, but the motion will cease, by the decay of that power, which now thrusts it forward in a continual circulation. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 7.] And then what remains, but that the soul and body being parted, they go to their several original? The body, though now so fair a fabric, to the earth out of which it was taken (according to that ancient doom passed upon it, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return") but the soul unto God, to be judged by him, according to what it hath done in the body, and to be rewarded or punished accordingly. See Annot. [g].

Ver. 8.] And if this be the conclusion of all our labours, I have reason to conclude this book as I began it; and listen, I beseech you again, to him who proclaims nothing to you but what he hath proved in this discourse; that there is no solid satisfaction to be found in any thing here below, where all things are both full of care and trouble, as well as uncertainty and perishing; and therefore it is the height of folly to take great thought for this present life, and to lay up nothing for the life to come. See Annot. [h].

Ver. 9.] Perhaps you may still think otherwise; and therefore, I have this now to add (and so shall sum up all I have said), that I am as likely to judge a right judgment of another man; being endowed with wisdom and understanding from above, by an extraordinary gift of God (1 Kings. i. 12, iv. 30, &c.), whose goodness also I have imitated, in communicating my knowledge freely unto others: nay (knowing that by sloth or envy the greatest wisdom may be lost), the more I understood, the more diligent I was in informing others; nor did divine illuminations make me either neglect my own studies, or other men's inventions, but I listened unto all from whom I might hope to learn any thing; and both weighed what they said, and also made an exact search into things myself: of which, that not only the present age, but posterity also, might reap the benefit, I have gathered together, and aptly disposed and fitted to all capacities, abundance of excellent wise, he still taught the people knowledge; yea, he gave good heed, and sought out, and set in order many proverbs.

10 The Preacher sought to find out acceptable words: and that which was written was upright, even words of truth.

11 The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd.

12 And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh.

13 ¶ Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man.

14 For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil.

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] From the consideration of what he had said in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, that youth is attended with folly, and folly attended with destruction, (as Greg. Thaumaturgus excellently explains those words) he begins this with the most weighty lesson; which ought to be perpetually inculcated, and beaten into the mind and memory of young men; viz. that they would reflect so far as to consider who gave them their being: and what, upon that account, they owe unto him: who, as he is the sole author of all things that give us any delight; so he is of all the abilities and faculties which make us capable to take pleasure in them: and the sole disposer, likewise, of all the opportunities that bring us and those delights together.

All this may well be comprehended in the word creator (if this place be compared with Isa. xi. 28, [Jer. ii. 5, 10, &c.] which is as a word of the plural number, some from thence draw the mystery of the holy trinity, which I cannot certainly say is here intended, because it is very ordinary in the scripture to put the plural for the singular; especially when God is spoken of. Thus when the Israelites had made the golden calf, they say, "These nations have a golden calf, and the Israelites have an idol, and the God of the children of the Philistines--" (1 Sam. xxviii. 9), where the woman says, she saw gods ascending out of the earth; and Saul thereupon asks her, "What form is he of?" understanding she saw a single person.

But whatever becomes of this, we Christians (to whom this mystery is now plainly revealed) ought, when we read such places as these, to think of the obligations we have unto God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, into whose name we are baptized. And not only to consider such things as are above mentioned; but to be moved and affected with them (for that is here included in the word remember), according to their weight and importance.

And to do this betime, the first thing we do; because "the days of our youth" are most of the choicest days (as the word in the Hebrew signifies; whence in 2 Sam. vi. 8, where David is said to gather all the chosen men, the LXX. hath "Carolus," a good idea in which we make the greatest delight in ourselves, or in any thing truly delightful: our spirits being then most fresh, lively, and vigorous. So that the measure of our delight, whether in ourselves or in any thing without us, being then truly taken, it would constrain us unto an equal delight in him, and make us unwilling to countenance gratulation for them. Whereas, if we defer this remembrance till old age come upon us, when life grows a burden, and the woned delights of it are either irksome or insipid (unpleasant, or without all taste or relish), our thankfulness for them will be but faint; our gratulation worthless; our devotion cold and lumpish: as Dr. Jackson excellently glosses upon these words (book xi. upon the Creed, ch. 32). Which he had expressed long before, more briefly, in his treatise of faith, ch. 8, p. 125, thus: "The inventory, of what we have received from God in our creation, should be taken in those days wherein we most delight: because then the characters of his blessings bestowed upon us, and their true worth, are most evident to us, and, the more we know that, if we defer this survey till old age, in which life itself becomes a burden, our return of thanks for fruition of it, and the unpleasant appears, will be but evanesch." And plainer still in his second book upon God's attributes, ch. 11, p. 95, "Then the prints of God's creative power are most fresh in our nature; and might transmit a fairer copy, and truest estimate of the creator's goodness unto old age, than old age can take any," &c. Which I have repeated the oftener, in several forms of speech, in hope that one or other of them may touch the heart of young men, and excite them, by frequent recollection upon the present comforts of health and strength, upon the activity of their body, the quickness of their sense and spirits, to engross the deeply in their memory, "before the evil days come." So Solomon calls our decrepit old age hath: both because they are void of all pleasure, as he saith in the following words; and because they are attended likewise with so many inconveniences and miseries, that it is hard for any man to face them, but he gives us some account of them, in his admirable description of old age (ver. 2-6), which abundantly confirms that speech of Cicero in his book De Senectute, that old age proves so odious unto most men, ut omnes so Etena gravitus dicant sustinere, "that they complain of a load that lies heavier than mount Etna upon them."

[Ch. Ver. 2.] These intimacies he demonstrates to be very great, because decrepit age consists in the universal decay of the whole frame of nature: which I take to be the meaning of the sun, the light, the moon, and stars, being darkened. For as, in a body politic, the extinction or falling down of these signifies, in the prophetical language, the subversion of that frame of government (as it to us, that all the other faculties may be seen in what Isaiah saith concerning Babylon, xiii. 10, and Ezekiel concerning Egypt, xxiii, 7, 8); so the darkening of these in the natural body of man signifies, in my judgment, its total decay and nearness to a dissolution: the tumbling (as we speak) of an old man into his grave; like a ruinous old house which can stand no longer: for so the metaphor is carried on (ver. 3).

And then the return of clouds after the rain, refers to the disanal condition a man is in at that time: when one trouble treads upon the heels of another; which is no sooner gone, but the like, or a new one, comes in its room. And so the words may be translated, "The clouds return, and after that the rain:" that is, there is a succession of misery, of grief, pain, or weakness, drawing this sad picture. There are none who apply the darkening of sun, moon, and stars, to the mind of man (as one would think, indeed, he should say something of that; and all the following description belonging wholly to the body, we must find it here or not at all); but still I conceive that he intends only, in general, to signify the failing and decay of the faculties and powers, without a respect to some particular distinct faculty in each of these words. But they who think the inward powers are here intended, are not content to rest in such a general meaning; but will have something in particular signified, by every one of them. And then they do but guess, which gives me the liberty to interpret the mind as long life, the spirit as health. As he may he the soul itself; by the light, its understanding; by the moon, the will; by the stars, all the notions in the mind and memory, with all the affections and passions in the will; just as sun, moon, and stars, in Joseph's dream, signified his father, and mother, and brethren. And so the sense of this verse is, the mind of man grows feeble in all its powers; the understanding line the faculties and powers, if it grows feeble reason weak and childish (giving such a feeble light, that it can neither direct ourselves nor others); the will listless in all its desires, dull about our greatest concerns, wavering and inconsistent in all its resolutions, &c.

But I judge it more reasonable, as I said, to rest in the interpretation first mentioned (which I am sure is agreeable to the holy language in other places): that hereby it is only represented, in general, the universal decay of the faculties of the upper part of man, his soul. Which sense I have comprehended together with the other in my paraphrase; and not neglected this, in which others acquiesce, that these words signify the mind, &c. As for those who hereby understand the dimness of the eyes, it being expressed afterward (ver. 3), I have taken notice of their sense: but another there is, which is worth mentioning. For the meaning may be, there is nothing but darkness, I. e. a most uncomfortable condition; like that, when the heavens are clouded over with darkness (as this is, the voyage, Acts xxvii, 29), and when one cloud hath spent itself in the tempest, another immediately succeeds it.

[Ch. Ver. 3.] As in the foregoing verse he gave a general description of the decay of the whole body (and of the internal faculties of the mind together therewith), so here he enterst into the particulars. And conceiving the body to be like a house or tabernacle (unto which it is frequently compared, not only in the scripture, but all other authors), he resembles the shoulders, arms, and hands, to the "keepers of the house:" because by them we defend ourselves from dangers; administer both food and physic; execute all manner of arts and manufactures (as we call them), as long as they have any strength remaining in them. Which old age takes away, the nerves, tendons, and ligaments so flagging, and these "keepers" quiver and shake ("trouble" we render it), and grow so useless, that we can no way help ourselves or others with them. And then he compares the thighs, legs, and feet, to "strong men:" they being the supports and pillars, as it were, of the whole fabric, which hold it up; till old age quite disables them for this office, and makes the knees bend under the burden of the body alone.

The reason of which follows; in that the grinders fail, &c, in which metaphor he compares the teeth in the jaws, above and below, to the upper and - millstone. For they, by cutting, breaking, and chewing of the meat, prepare it to be dissolved in the stomach, and turned into nourishment (as the corn is ground between those stones into meal, and so prepared for making bread, and other sublike uses); but in time drop out of their sockets, or are broken so that they can grind no longer.

And the like decay we find in the sight of the eyes; which he means by "those that look out of the windows." All those coats, humours, and nerves, that make up the eyes: which are set in two holes (as the word is), or hollow places in the forehead (like the windows in the house), and have a round hole also in the midst of them, called the pupil of the eye (like a casement), through which all things are transmitted to the inward sense of seeing. Until the skins, and the humours also, grow too thick; and the very figure of the eye, as some have observed, he changed, by the dryness of the crystalline humour; and then the house is darkened. Aristotle, in his Problems (sect. 51, quest. 14), expresses it thus, in short, or rather interprets it; δόοε ἀπορρέε, περίπατε, &c., "when men grow into years, their sight grows dull; because, in the eyes of old men, the skin is both hard and also rugged, so that their sight is obscured." [2]

Ver. 4.] This verse hath a greater difficulty in it, especially in the beginning: "And the doors shall be shut, and the sound of the grinding is low." But the LXX. suggest an unexceptionable sense of this passage, in my opinion, which is, that they are shut out of all public meetings, because of the lowness of their voice, which formerly was as loud as a mill. And there is little reason to doubt, but by "doors" are meant the lips (it being a frequent expression in Scripture of the sound of grinding, of the lowness of the voice, from the loss of teeth, or the weakness of respiration; in short, from the defect there is in the organs of speech.

Nor do I see why Maldonatus's translation may not be allowed, which is still more simple (and therefore I have taken notice of it in my paraphrase): "The lips are shut without" (so πρεπεῖ may be translated fors, extrinsice), that is, they sink and are compressed; "when the voice grows weak and tremulous, because of those that grind:" that is, by the failing of the teeth. Thus he. But it may more exactly be translated thus by the falling low of the voice, of which the tongue is the guide, and the whole. And the whole have sometimes thought may not incongruously be translated in this manner: "His lips are shut in his mouth" (for the mouth is the streed or highway into this house of which Solomon is speaking) "by the falling down of the voice of grinding:" i.e. the voice that is made by grinding the air, as it were, between the teeth and the roof of the mouth, &c.

It might be referred to the eating meal, seldom, because of his bad digestion (the meat being ground in the stomach as in a mill); if the word voice or sound would agree to this. Which renders Dr. Smith's interpretation very difficult, in my judgment: who by doors understands all the inlets and outlets of the body; and by streets, the open ways and passages in the body; in which the matter of nourishment is conveyed, and passeth, without let or molestation: and by shutting these doors, the ceasing from their use: and by grinding, the digestions and conceptions in the stomach, bowels, mesentery, glandulae, &c. (all which is well enough, though, perhaps, too philosophically by the voice of these conceptions, the natural symptoms, significative of digestions, all those indications which demonstrate the work of nature is to proceed aright. Which seems to me very far fetched, and too great a straining of the word voice or sound: however, I have here mentioned it, that they who are pleased with it may follow that interpretation, which is very ingenious.

The next passage in this verse is easier; though it is uncertain whether he mean that the chirping of the least bird wakes him; or that he wakes early, when the birds do. For ἀσπίδωρ signifies all kinds of birds, great and small; and may be interpreted of the cock, as well as any other: and the meaning be, he gets up at the cock-crowing. This last seems the most probable, because, being thick of hearing (as the next passage signifies), it cannot be supposed that the least noise disturbs him. Though I confess the meaning may be, that a small noise wakes him sooner, than thunder would have done in his young days.

"The daughters of music," if it refer to the parts of the body, I take not to be those organs of it which made music; but which receive it, being made. For the Hebrews call that the son of a thing, which is fitted for the design of it: as פָּסָקָה, אָמָה, פָּסְקָה, &c. Thus an arrow is called the son of the bow, or quiver (Isa. xlii. 19, Lam. iii. 13), and wheel called the son of the thrashing-floor (Isa. xxxi. 18), and so the daughters of music may be those parts where music is entertained. Yet there is one objection against this, which lies in the word all: which cannot properly be applied to the ears, or to any instrument, but to the two last of them; and we never say all the ears, but both the ears. Which makes some think, that hereby we are rather to understand all sorts of music, which are made either by instruments or voice. But to those it may be answered, that the word all refers to the several parts of the ear, in which the sound is formed: both the inside wire of the ear, which is called the tympanum, and the three cavities, and as many little bones in the inward part, together with the auditory nerve itself. All which are manifestly contrived on purpose to receive sounds: which are born here, and so may be called their daughters; which in youth are brisk and sprightly; but are humbled (as the LXX. translate it) and old in age.

There is no necessity, I acknowledge, of interpreting this passage thus (though it seem most agreeable to the rest of the description), because it may be translated, "the daughters of a song:" that is, singing-women are not valued at all by old men: they account them nothing worth; and would not give, as we say, a farthing for one. But the ancients use the word perfection, 2 Sam. xix. 55, which place, St. Jerome thinks, may very well explain this. [c] Ver. 5.] And it is attended with a greater, which is the passion of fear; unto which old age is very subject, from defect of spirits, weakness of imagination, as well as of bodily organs; which are unable to resist any dangers; which old men also are apt to apprehend greater than they really are. For as their heeds turn giddy, if they ascend to any high place, so they tremble, in the plain way; for fear of a stone, a clod, a hole, any unevenness, by the rising or depression of the earth (for so Grotius thinks the words may be expounded, though the ancient interpreters do not favour it, "He is afraid to stumble at the rising or falling of the earth"); or, he fears he may be pushed down by others, if he do not fall of himself; in a word, he knows not what he may meet withal, and therefore fears.

Or it may be expounded, as Maldonatus takes it, he never thinks himself safe, though he be in a high fortress: in which case, though never so firm, lest it should fall upon him. There are some that expound the first words of this verse thus, "He which seems to me not all constrained, but apt enough (only it doth not make all relate to the parts of the body, as the rest do), which is that of De Dieu; from whom Junius before him did not much differ.

It is this, "Though the almond-tree flourish, and the locust be laden with fat (i.e. though the pleasures of the spring appear and come on apace, making all things else to swell with joy), it doth not improve his blood or make it rise, to stir up his desire," &c.

The reason is, he is just upon the point of leaving all things here, and going to his long home. Which signifies either the place to which all men go (domum seculii, "the house of the whole world," whither all mankind have ever gone, and must go), or the place from whence he came; as Forsterus expounds domum seculii, "his old house," out of which he first came forth (thus we translate the word οἶνος, Jer. vi. 16); or that where they must long abide, even till the resurrection of the dead.

For their friends there leave them; and can do nothing more but mourn for them; as it follows here, "the mourning of the streets." That is, preparing for the funeral, ready to accompany the hearse; or, they already bewail him as a dead corpse rather than a living man; or when he is dead, can only give him a solemn funeral, and openly bewail him; not only at home, but in the streets. For which purport he sometimes says, And women, who are the miniatures we read of, Matt. xv. 23. For Josephus saith (lib. iii. cap. 15. of the Wars of the Jews), that when Joppa was taken, and he reported to be slain, Μακρόκολήξαντος αὐτάκις ὡς "there were many minstrels hired at Jerusalem," who began to make lamentations in a delightful tone. But for Forsterus, in his treatise of the mourning of the Hebrews (p. 299), thinks Solomon doth not here mean the mourning of those that accompanied the corpse to the grave, nor their walking about in mourning apparel; but the sad lamentations which their grief sometimes moved them to make in the very streets: when they were weary with mourning at home, or put thereby into an extravagant passion: like that which the Jews supposed Mary the sister of Lazarus to fall into, when she rose up hastily and went out of the house (John xii. 31).

[175] Ver. 6.] Now we are come to the most difficult verse of all; in which the wise man describes this house as falling down: that is, enumerates the evils which immediately forego death; of which he is afraid, and hath no fear of it; for he is in good condition; for those words, "Remember thy Creator," St. Jerome thinks, are here again to be repeated; or ever, that is, before death seize on thee, and pull down this earthly tabernacle, and lay it in the dust.

First, "by loosening the silver cord." Which some fancy signifies all the humour of the body, which are, as it were, the thread of life; which the destinies were said to spin out, for a certain time, and then cut off: others understand by it, the string of the tongue: and Gasper Sanctus (upon Cant. vii. 5), the urina: whose stream, he fancies, resembles a silver thread, which is then broken, when it distils by drops as it frequently does in old men. But the best of the Hebrew writers by this cord understand the spinal marrow (that is, the pith of the backbone); others, the nerves: others, the outward coats of the nerves, &c. And there is little reason to doubt but the marrow down the back continued from the brain as it were in a string or cord, unto the very bottom of it; together with the nerves arising from it: and the filaments, fibres, and tendons, that proceed from them, are the thing here intended. Which Melanthon saw long ago; "the nerves (saith he) and ligaments are here meant;" which have literally the power of The third step is, the "breaking of the pitcher at the fountain." Which is variously interpreted; some understand the breaking of the pitcher or vase to retain the urine; others by fountain understand the liver: and by the pitcher, the bladder of gall; or the veins; which is the most common opinion. But Dr. Smith rather takes it for the heart: which is indeed the fountain of life; and hath two distinct cavitie, the right and the left; out of which proceed these veins and these arteries which carry the blood through the whole body, and bring it back again to the heart, in a perpetual circulation.

And if by pitcher we understand the veins, which are the receptacle of the blood (and the Hebrew word signifies any containing vessel, particularly the widow's barrel in which was her meal, 1 Kings xvii. 14, 16, as well as a barrel of amber in the next chapter, xviii. 33), when by the fountain must be peculiarly understood the right ventricle of the heart, which is the original from whence the veins have their rise. For so the Hebrew word signifies, not only a fountain but a spring; from which waters bubble up and burst forth (as we translate it, Isa. xxx. 7, xlix. 10) in a running current; and other for the right ventricle of the heart are specked in chapter xviii. 33, when by the fountain must be peculiarly understood the right ventricle of the heart, which is the original from whence the veins have their rise.

Now the breaking of this pitcher into shivers (as the Hebrew word signifies) is the utter falling of the veins; their ceasing quite from their natural action and use. When they can no longer carry back, nor conveniently convey unto the heart that liquor which they properly contain: but the little blood which remains in the cold body of man near his end is congealed, and stagnates in his veins.

And so I proceed to the last thing, the wheel broken at the cistern. Where by the wheel some understand the wheel of the gardens, viz. the chariot; by the cistern, do thrust out the breath from them, and draw it again to them; resembling the wheel of a well, now drawing up the bucket to itself, anon letting it down again into the well. Melanchton, by cistern understanding the stomach (the word signifying, saith he, a profound cavity), takes the wheel for the guts adjoining thenceunto, which are wrapped about one another in a kind of circular form; and make the necrcntery look like a wheel. Which Grothus seems also to have had in his mind. But, taking it for granted, that a wheel, being an instrument of circulation, is the hieroglyphic of something that goes, and makes a round in us, I think Dr. Smith's conjecture is most probable; that hereby is meant the great artery with all its branches: which is the great instrument of rotation or circulation in the body of man; and so evidently thrusts the blood forward, that we perceive its pulses forcing the blood along its cavity, in the wrisis, the temples, and other parts of the body. Without which instrument to compell it, the blood that naturally tends home to the heart would go no farther.

And then the cistern from whence this wheel forces the liquor, and conveys it through all the parts, is the left ventricle of the heart; to which this great artery is annexed, and from whence it ariseth. For a cistern is a vessel made on purpose to receive and retain a due proportion of water, and to keep it till the time of use, and then conveniently to pass it into vessels that are prepared to receive it from thence. And such is the left ventricle of the heart; which in its diastole, as they call it, receives the blood that is brought into it from the lungs; and then, keeping it there a little, doth in its systole pass due proportions thereof for the sustenance of its own tissues. I suppose it to be so said before. And, for this end, there are little valves, or falling doors, placed at the entrance and at the going out of this cistern, which are like cocks, to let in and to let out; and, by their opening or shutting, give convenient passage or stoppage to the liquor, which continually runs that way.

And so the breaking or shattering in pieces (as Forster's translates the word) of this wheel, is the ceasing of the pulse; so he in another place translates it, trodden down, i.e. suppressed by the decay of the instruments of pulsation, which can no longer perform that work. Which being absolutely necessary for the preservation of life, the ceasing of it is death.

[2] Ver. 7. And so the body, made of a mouldering substance, being no longer a fit habitation for the spirit (and therefore deserted by it), which held the parts of it together, shall crumble again into the earth, out of which it originally came, according to that sentence passed upon Adam in the beginning; "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. iii. 19). It may be said, that this is his first principles: and though now we are very fond of it, as if it were some goodly thing, yet, when the spirit leaves it, it will appear to be indeed dust.

But the spirit, the nobler part of man, being of a higher original, shall return to God, who sent it into the body, to be disposed of by him, according to the sentence passed upon Adam; viz. For the Chaldee paraphrase's explanation of the latter part of this verse is very apposite: "It shall return, that it may stand in judgment before God." For Elokhi (the word here for God), in the Hebrew language signifies a judge. As in the place above mentioned, I Sam. xxviii. 9. There is a sentence not much unlike to this, I have observed in Plutarch's Consolatory Discourse to Apollonius upon the death of his son; where he alleges, amongst a great many others, this saying of Epicharmus, Συνερωτήσω καὶ διεκβάσω, καὶ ἀπέμνησα ὄνομα ἐφιάλτω, γα μεν εἰς τὸν πάντως διά τὸν θάνατον."

[4] Ver. 8. And now having thus demonstrated his first proposition, he elegantly repeats the exordium, or entrance of his book, as is here observed by St. Jerome, whose words are so significant, that I cannot but translate them, as an excellent gloss upon this verse: "For since all the labour of mortal man (of which Solomon hath disputed in this whole book) amounts to this, that the dust returns to its earth, and the soul returns thither from whence it was taken: it is an excess of vanity to labour for this world; and to gather nothing for the future;" where he is to live for ever, and to be judged according to his behaviour here.

This only may be added, that here he enters upon the conclusion of his discourse; and divides it into two parts, as he had done the foregoing book. First, he sums up what he had said in the first six chapters, concerning the false ways men take to happiness, in this verse: which he backs by several serious considerations, in those that follow, unto ver. 13. Where, successively, he sums up what he had said from ch. vii. to the conclusion, concerning the true way to happiness; which lies only in a due regard to God and his commandments.

[7] Ver. 9. The first word of this verse is variously translated; and the whole verse applied by interpreters, either to confirm what was said before concerning the false methods men take to happiness (as if he had said, I have done when I have told you, that you may believe me; who am sufficiently able to inform you, and not think to meet with better information, from other men's writings, or from your own experience), or as an introduction to what he intends to say in the latter part of this verse. He therefore, after that right method to be happy. Which he prepares the reader to attend unto, and receive into his mind: first, by asserting his own great authority in this verse (who the wiser he was, the more desirous he was both to teach and to learn). And then the weighty doctrine which he taught (ver. 10), and the great usefulness of it (ver. 11); the like to which they would find nowhere else (ver. 12). It is not very material which of these ways we take; but I have had respect to both, in my paraphrase; where I have expressed the sense so fully, that I cannot think fit to enlarge any further upon this verse. But only note, that Luther, and he alone, I think, expounds the first words thus (not absurdly, nor disagreeing with the Hebrew text): "There remained nothing to the Preacher, but that he was wise," &c. He understood and taught aright, and took a great deal of pains; which was a great satisfaction to himself, but he saw little or no success of it in others, who would not be governed by his advice, &c.

[6] Ver. 10. This word, word for word, in the Hebrew, "The Preacher carefully sought to meet with desirable words; and the writing of uprightness; and the words of truth." Where writing may refer both to what he read in others, whether divine or human authors; and to what he wrote himself (and so I have expounded it in the paraphrase), who being the beautiful in his head, pleasures, or delight, usefulness and certainty.

Some fancy that Solomon wrote a book called Catub Jascher ("the writing of uprightness"), or Jascher dibre emech ("the upright words of truth"): of which, as there is no certainty, so I see no probable grounds to assert it. Only we know he wrote a great many more books than we have (1 Kings iv. 32, 33; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4); and see Josephus, lib. viii. Amiq. cap. 2).

[7] Ver. 11. Some connect this with the foregoing verse in this manner, "The Preacher sought to find out the words of the wise." &c. And so the words run exactly in the Hebrew. But we may take this verse by itself, as a direction for us in our translation; and look upon it as a commendation of these wise words: which doth not in the least alter the sense. I have had respect to both; and comprehended also, in my paraphrase, two of the interpretations which one difficult phrase is capable of; viz. "masters of the assemblies." Which may be translated divers ways, more literally out of the Hebrew than we do; who add the word by before them, which is not in the original. For the last words, which we translate "masters of assemblies," may be attributed to nails, in this manner: "As nails fastened, whereby things are joined together" (nails being the instruments of gathering or bringing those things together, which were separate); or thus, retaining the words of our translation, "the masters of assemblies are as fixed nails:" or the "masters of collections," such judicious authors as make excellent collections of apophthegms and smart sayings, stick in the mind as nails do in corners. Or the principal, the choicest collections, viz. the words of wise men (mentioned in the beginning of the verse), are as, &c.; or it may, in the same sense, be connected (not with nails, but) with the words following; the "masters, or authors, that collect wise and pithy sayings, have their gifts from one and the same snappero.

Vol. III.—23
ECCLESIASTES.

So I take it in short, "Content thyself with this book, and suchlike; and do not turn over many authors, to learn how to be happy." For goodness and truth are included in certain bounds; but wickedness and lies, sine finum sunt, "are without end," as St. Jerome here notes. Who observes also, that, perhaps he adviseth us to study brevity be and ume the sense more than the words; directly contrary to the philosophers and doctors of the world, who, to assert their false opinions, used abundance and great variety of words; but the divine scripture brevi circulo coarctata est, "is confined to a small circle;" and as much contracted in words as it is dilated in matter.

The Hebrew word bahag, which we translate study, Aben Ezra says, in the neighbouring languages, signifies reading; and so we translate it in the margin.

[n] Ver. 13.] To teach us to contract our labours into so small a compass as we can, he sums up, in a few words, the sense of his whole discourse in this book; to compare the conclusion or end of the matter; of all that can be said on this subject: the whole sense of the sermon succinctly delivered; unto which, therefore, every one should confine his endeavours. It is this,—to work his soul unto such a due regard of the divine majesty (standing in awe of him as his Lord, overseer, and judge), that he take care to perform his whole duty, in so wise as we now mention, without which all religion is vain and fruitless.

And these two things (the fear of God, or devotion and obedience) he commends from two arguments: the first of which is in this verse; that they are things which concern all mankind, one as well as another; of which if they be careful, they have done enough to make themselves immortal happiness.

For those words, this is the whole, or the duty of man, may be expounded four several ways: either, this is all the duty of man; or the duty of all men; or the whole happiness of all men; or their whole business: unto which therefore they should devote their whole selves; that is, all their strength. For, according as St. Jerome understands it, "to this man was born: that he should have the fear, or devotion, and obedience of God, is his creator, should worship him with fear and honour, and observance of his commands."

And the fear of God being implanted in our minds, we shall not fail to worship him, and call upon him, and expect all good things from him, and give him thanks for them: and, as the best expression of our thankfulness, keep his commandments, and be obedient to all his precepts: both in subduing our sinful appetites and passions, and in exercising charity towards our neighbours. Which will make us true in word and deed; faithful in all our contracts; liberal to the poor; observant of our governors; in short, make us observe all the directions of this book, in order to our happiness.

[6] Ver. 21.] Here is the second argument, why we should seriously intend these things; because the Lord and judge of the world will one day call us to an account for what we do here; and pass an impar- tial sentence upon every action of our life, even aenst every secret (as some expound these words, at est ulter), or upon all secret as well as open actions. Which are all known to him, though now he seem to take no notice of them; and shall then not only be brought to light, but with an apparent dis- tinction between good and evil: the difference of which shall be certainly and notoriously manifested; by the severe punishment of the one, and the bountiful reward of the other. I will imitate therefore (saith Molemon) the example of Solomon; and, in the conclusion, recite the. sum of this book. "He intended to assert divine providence, and to refute the objections against it; which are these: There are great confusions in human life; a vast multitude of ungodly men, and but few that acknowledge and fear God: and, which is worse, the wicked flourish in honour and riches: but the pious are afflicted, and ofttimes killed by the worst of men, &c.; therefore all things seem to be carried by chance. Unto which Solomon answers: Though, for the most part, such be the confusion of things, yet be thou ruled by God's word, and hold the opinion of his providence with a firm faith. Do not fall from God, because of these scandals; nor cast away his fear, or thy confidence in him, nor desert thy

PREFACE.

I. That this book was composed by Solomon is no more doubted than that he was the author of the two foregoing.

And that it was always looked upon as a holy book, treating of some spiritual and divine matter, appears from its being placed among the rest of that kind. Nor hath it been doubted of by any considerable number of men, either among Jews or Christians, but only by a few singular persons; who ought (as Theodoret speaks in his preface to this book) to have looked upon those blessed fathers who, placing this Song among the divine writings, took it to be fit for the uses of the church, as men of greater judgment, and more spiritual than themselves. And they ought likewise to have considered (as he adds) that we have, in effect, the testimony of the Holy Ghost itself for its divine authority: Ezra, a man excelling, in effect, and full of the Holy Spirit, having thought this worthy of a room among those sacred volumes which he gathered together after their return from the captivity of Babylon.

And, accordingly, a great many holy men have illustrated it (as he farther notes) with their commentaries and interpretations, or have adorned their writings with its sentences: such as Eusebius, Origen, Cyriacan (who wore the crown of martyrdom), and ol oτων καλαίς καὶ τοῦ ἀστατίαν πληρεῖται, "and others that were more ancient than these, and nearer to the times of the apostles."

It is unnecessary to mention those that fol-loved after in future times, who all took this for a spiritual book: let us only consider whether, if these things being so, it be reasonable for us to despise so many and such great persons, nay, the Holy Spirit itself, and to follow our own private opinions; nor heartening to him that said, "The thoughts of mortal man are vain, and our devices are but uncertain" (Wisd. ix. 14), or rather of St. Paul (Rom. i. 21), "They became vain in their imagination, and their foolish heart was darkened."

II. Nor doth it seem hard, either to find out what that spiritual manner is of which the wise man here treats (especially since all Christian writers have from the beginning applied this Song to Christ and the church), or to give an account of the rise and original of such sublime contemplations, which I take to be this.

The great prophet David having plainly foretold that a far more glorious king than his son Solomon should one day arise (as we read in the song he made at his marriage, Ps. lxxiv.), and likewise more expressly prophesied of his divinity, royal majesty, priesthood, &c. (Ps. cxiv.), and again resumed this argument just before his death, when he caused his son Solomon to be crowned and to sit upon his throne (Ps. lxxix.), it stirred up the longing desires of Solomon after the coming of this most illustrious prince; and made him study to have at least as clear a sight of him as was possible to be attained after off. And that he might stir up the same desire in the whole nation, after his appearing, he cast his meditations on this subject into a song, in the form of a pastoral ecolgue:
in which several persons being introduced, who speak their parts, it may be called a dramatia poem. And so it is styled by St. Greg, Nazianzen, in his thirty-first oration; where he quotes a passage, εκ των νυμφων δραματος τι και δραματος (as his words are, p. 503, edit. Paris), "out of this bridal interlude and song." For a drama, as the Greeks teach us, consists in the change of persons, some of which enter, others come to them, others withdraw, till the whole work be completed by this shifting and alteration of the persons.

Now the persons which compose this song are, the bridegroom, the bride, the virgins attending on her, and the youths attending on him; to whom some add the sister of the spouse, mentioned ch. vii., and the watchmen and daughters of Jerusalem, who are introduced in their turns. For example, first, the bride (and her companions) comes in and saith, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth," &c. Then the bridegroom appears, and saith (ver. 8), "If thou knowest not, O thou fairest," &c. After which he seems to withdraw himself, leaving the bride and her companions alone upon the stage (where he sits at his repast, ver. 13), who thus speak to her, "We will make thee borders of gold," &c. And then she speaks again, ver. 13, and he returns and speaks, ver. 15.

How many parts there are in this drama is not agreed. Some make ten; others make but seven colloquies, or interlocutory passages, in this sacred dialogue, as they call it. About which I do not think fit to dispute; but shall take notice of as many as I can observe in the argument or annotations upon each chapter.

As for the phrase, it is wholly allegorical, in expressions borrowed chiefly from the fields, and woods, and gardens; as I shall show in their proper places, when we meet with them. And such were the fittest that could be found, supposing he would use poetical words, to set forth the ardent desire he had, and would excite in others (as I said before), to have a sight of that great Shepherd of the sheep, who would make all the world happy.

III. And none need wonder that he speaks wholly of this glorious king; for so doth his father David in the hundred and fifth Psalm, which can be applied to no other person whatsoever; and so doth the prophet Isaiah in afterwards, in his fifty-third chapter. Which, though some have endeavoured to accommodate first to another person, yet they have failed in their attempt; and never could find any in whom it was so literally fulfilled as in our blessed Saviour. Who alone was there intended; as he seems to me to be here also in this present Song of Solomon's.

Where it need not seem strange neither to any one, that he is compared to a bridegroom, and the church to a bride, who doth but reflect upon the forty-fifth psalm; and observe how Solomon doth only follow the metaphor, wherein his father David had represented this mystery: and observe withal, that it is the common language of the prophets, who compare Jerusalem and Zion (under which name is comprehended the whole church of the Jews) to a virgin, called frequently "the virgin-daughter of Zion," &c., whom God had espoused unto himself.

IV. But, for the fuller explication of this, it may be fit to note, that the profoundest of the Hebrew divines, whom they now call cabalists, having such a notion as this among them, that sensible things are but an imitation of things above, conceived from thence that there was, for instance, an original pattern of that love and union which is between a man and his wife here in this world. This they expressed by the kindliness of Tiphereth to Malweth: which are the names they give unto the invisible bridegroom and bride in the upper world. And this Tiphereth (i. e. beauty or ornament) they call also by the name of the Adam on high, and the great Adam, in opposition to the terrestrial or little Adam here below. As Malweth (i. e. kingdom) they call also by the name of Cheneseth Israel (i. e. congregation of Israel); who is united, they say, to that celestial Adam as Eve was to the terrestrial. Which heavenly Adam or Tiphereth, they call likewise the sun, and Malweth the moon: and make the former an active principle, the latter a passive; or, as their phrase is, Tiphereth is but the masculine power which influences Malweth: who is but the recipient of those influences. So that, in sum, they seem to say the same that the apostle St. Paul doth, when he tells us that "marriage is a great mystery: but he speaks concerning Christ and his church" (Eph. v. 32). For the marriage of Tiphereth and Malweth (or Cheneseth Israel) is the marriage of Christ, the Lord from heaven, with his spouse the church, which is the whole congregation of Christian people. Which was represented in the conjunction of Adam and Eve, and of all other men and women descended from them, when they are joined together in holy matrimony; inasmuch that those divines called cabalists have formed this maxim about this matter, that wheresoever in the holy scripture we read the love of man and wife, there is mystically designed the conjunction of Tiphereth and Cheneseth Israel.

Now this notion (of which the learned Dr. Cudworth hath long ago written a peculiar discourse) was so ancient among those doctors, that they had it before the times of Christ; it gives the plainest account why John the Baptist uses the word Christ and bridegroom, as if they were in a manner synonymous, and of the same import (John iii. 28, 29); and why Christ himself compares the whole business of his heavenly kingdom (called by the people in St. Mark xii. 10, "the kingdom of our father David") to a marriage, or marriage-feast, which a king made for his son (Matt. xxii. 2, &c.).

V. And this is one argument of its being a very ancient notion among them, that idolatory and false worship in the church is constantly expressed in the scriptures under the name of spiritual fornication and going a whoring from God: whom therefore the church was to look upon as her husband. And so he taught the children of Israel to do, by using this form of speech throughout the whole prophetic writings (Isa. lv. 5, lix. 4, 5; Jer. iii. 4, 20, xxxi. 32; Hos. ii. 2, 7, and many other places). Nay, the very words of the apostle to the Ephesians seem to suppose some such mystical sense, which was current in that nation, of those words of Adam the first man (Gen. ii. 23, 24), "This now is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh, &c., therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they shall be one flesh." Which the apostle takes as if they had been spoken of Christ and his love to his church, as any one may see that will read Eph. v. 29—32. For these are not, in the account of the cabalists, two distinct senses; but one and the same sense, different only as the matter and the form of the same thing: which form, say they, lies latent under the matter, whereby we are led unto it, as the main thing comprehended in it.

Thus Archangelus Burgozovensis speaks, in his preface to the explication of some select aphorisms of those divines, gathered by Mirandula, who observes also (p. 91 of his book), that as immediately after the fabric of the world was reared, matrimony followed, as the emblem of God's great love to those that should believe on him; so this world shall end in the sacrament of marriage: St. John shutting up all the mysteries of the holy scripture in the Revelation with these words, "Let us be glad and rejoice: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready" (Rev. xix. 7). Which if it be the voice of the heavenly host, agrees with what the Hebrew doctors say (in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 12) of the marriage of Adam and Eve: that "the angels rejoiced at it, and with music and dancing attended upon the wedding."

VI. All which things put together, show how naturally the thoughts of David were led, at Solomon's marriage, to sing concerning Christ and his church: and the thoughts of Solomon afterward to sing more largely of the wonderful love of the same heavenly bridgroom, in this Song of songs; that is, most excellent song. For so it may be truly called, both in regard of its subject-matter, and in regard of the manner of its composure; this parabolical way of writing, by figures and similitudes, being in many regards (as the forenamed cabalistical doctors discourse) the best of all others. First, because it is taken from things sensible, by which both learned men and ignorant can be instructed. Secondly, because such narrations very easily imprint themselves on the mind; a parable (say they) being instead of an artificial memory. And thirdly, because all our knowledge hath its rise from sense, and therefore symbolizes much with sensible parables. And fourthly, it is very delightful to contemplate how the parable agrees with the spiritual things which are thereby figured. Unto which (saith that Archangelus before mentioned) the doctrine of St. Paul is conformable, when he saith, "the invisible things of God from the creation of the world, are seen by those that are made." And lastly, what is there more evident, than that all visible things declare God to be love? whose praise Solomon celebrates in this Song. For by love (as the same author discourses of Boetius and others) the heavens are joined together, and the elements agree in composition, animals cohabit, cities are preserved, and all kingdoms supported and replenished. Which made Pherecydes Syrus say, that God was transformed into love before he made the world. And because God created all things in love, he also embraces all things with the same love; and would have us to love, which is the sum of all that he exacts of us: that being knit together by mutual love, we may, in conclusion be united with him in love; that so all things may be one, as they were in the beginning.

Of this love, Solomon, say they, treats throughout this whole Song; nay, it is the subject of all the book of God. According to that of David (Ps. lixi. 11, 12), "God hath spoken once," viz., to the whole people of Israel, when he gave the law at Mount Sinai; yea, "twice have I heard this," from the prophets, that is, who say the same with the law, "that power belongeth to God, also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy: for thou rentest to every man according to his work." Which they expound in this manner, Thou canst send good or evil influences upon us: by the union of Tipheret and Maleuth, a good influence; by their separation, a bad. For when Israel doth well, then it receives good influences from above; that is, from Tipheret: for such is the order (says one of their aphorisms) which is constituted in the archetypal world, that all good influences proceed from Tipheret. And then these two principles are animated, when we observe God's precepts; but when we transgress the law, the one is separated from the other; that is, Tipheret doth not send influences upon Maleuth for our good; but another principle interposes, and sends anxiety and trouble. Now love is the union of these two principles: the love of man and wife signifying in scripture the union of Israel and Tipheret; which union Hoses speaks of, when he saith (ii. 19, 20), "I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercy; I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness, and thou shalt know the Lord."

Thus that sort of divine discourse; very agreeable to the sense of this book. Which represents the heavenly bridgroom appearing in the greatest beauty, and sometimes in most familiar communication with his spouse, the church; but at other times withdrawing his glorious presence, and absenting himself from her. Who is represented, therefore, after the same manner, like to the moon (unto which they compare Maleuth); sometimes full of his heavenly light, sometimes illuminated, only in part, and sometimes obscure and dark. Which will appear more at large in the explication of the several parts of this book.

VII. The time of whose writing cannot be certainly known; but it is very probable that it was not long after Solomon was seated on his throne.
SOLOMON'S SONG.

and had both the prophecy of his father David fresh in his mind, and was also strongly afficted with the wonderful love of God to himself. He being filled then, likewise, with incomparable wisdom from above: such wisdom, that it brought the queen of Sheba to discourse with him, hav- ing "heard the fame of Solomon, because of the name of the Lord" (1 Kings x. 1): that is, as some of the Hebrews expound it, because she understood that the wisdom which was in him was not merely natural, like that of the philosophers and eastern sages, but divine and heavenly, by a special inspiration from above, whereby he was enabled to answer the hardest questions.

At that time, when these celestial gifts were newly poured into him (which the cabalists call the "unction of the Holy Ghost:" or the "sacred name," of which Solomon speaks, say they, when he says, in the beginning of this Song, "Thy name is as an ointment poured out"), we may well conceive his mind shone in its greatest purity and clearness; and enjoying the sweetest and most perfect peace and tranquillity, was the fitter for such divine meditations as these, which are the subject of this holy book.

The sense of which seems to be expressed in 2 Cor. xi. 2, where St. Paul (who was not "rude in knowledge:" ver. 6, but mightily versed, as that word knowledge signifies, in the mysteries of the Old Testament) puts the church of Corinth in mind of his solicitous concern for them in these words, "I have espoused you to a husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin unto Christ." For of that one husband alone, and of that pure virgin, and no other, and of their espousals, love, and union, is this incomparable Song of Solomon's to be understood and expounded.

CHAPTER I.

1 The song of songs, which is Solomon's.
2 Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth: for thy love is better than wine.
3 Because of the savour of thy good ointments thy name is as ointment poured forth, therefore do the virgins love thee.
4 Draw me, we will run after thee: the king hath brought me into his chambers: we will be glad and rejoice in thee, we will remember thy love more than wine: the upright love thee.

1 Ver. 1.] The most excellent of all the songs that Solomon (or any other person) ever composed: representing the ardent desire which was in him, and which he endeavoured to excite in all the people, to enjoy that great blessing of the Messiah. See Annot. [a].

Sponsa.

2 Ver. 2.] With the thoughts of whom his mind being wholly possessed, he burst forth into this most passionate strain of affection to him, saying, in the name of them all, O that he would come and speak to us by himself, and not merely by his prophets: who have told us so much of him, that I cannot but wish to converse familiarly with him, and receive the words of his own mouth (those words of grace, Ps. xlv. 2, which will ravish all men's hearts), and all other expressions of his incomparable love; which is to be preferred infinitely before the most delicious pleasures that this good land wherein we live afford: yea, before the very sacrifices, and the wine that is poured out upon the altar unto God. See Annot. [b].

Ver. 5.] Whose love, in thy power, majesty, and glory, and by thy mighty grace and love attract me and all my people to thee: which will make the whole world most readily and cheerfully devote themselves unto thy service. And, methinks, I behold this king in his royal splendour, as if he were already come: nay, he hath made me understand the secret mysteries of his kingdom: which give me a taste of that great joy, wherewith we have been told (Ps. xlv. 15) all mankind shall enter into thy society; and it is but reason that we should all resolve with the highest satisfaction of mind, to rejoice and triumph in thee, and never to think of thy love, and the blessings we expect from thence, but with a pleasure beyond all other: and the better judgment any men have, and the more white-hearted they are, the more perfectly will they love thee and thy unsprinkled righteousness. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 5.] And do not take offence, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, at his kind reception of all nations into his kingdom; but hear this answer to you, when you upbraid them with idolatry, and all manner of im- purity: which is the same, in that which is a lovely sheep- herdess, when tanned by lying much abroad in the fields. My complexion, indeed, is dark and swarthy; but my features and proportions are comely and beauti- ful: though I seem as rustic as the skins of the tents, wherein the wild Arabs dwell; yet I am as amiable

5 I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon.

6 Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother's children were angry with me; they made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept.

7 Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy fold to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?

8 If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed: thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.

9 I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots.

10 Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold.

as the fine linen, which makes the curtains of the apartment of king Solomon. See Annot. [e].

Ver. 6.] Do not despise me, therefore, by considering only my outward hue, though it be exceeding black; since it is not naturally so, but contracted by being exposed to the sun: for my brethren and sisters, who should have been more kind, did me the greatest injury, and made me a slave to the meanest employments, in which I could not preserve my beauty; because I was of such a one that he beheld another man's vineyard, could not look after his own.

Which is a lively emblem of the gentiles, who are descended from the same parents with yourselves, and though by worshipping the sun, and by other idolatries, they are become odiously polluted; yet, shall be cleansed by becoming the subjects of Christ, who will pity them, as seduced by false teachers, and neglected by you; which made them embrace any religion rather than the true. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 7.] But let us all join together, professing our most hearty affection to him, and beseech him with one voice, saying, O thou whom I love above all things, instruct me in thy heavenly doctrine, and make me to understand, not only where we may learn thy will, but also enjoy thy true religion in quiet peace: for we are weary of wandering uncertainly after those who pretend to thy spirit, but mislead such as are guided by them. See Annot. [g].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 8.] Unto which his answer is, Thy desire of true knowledge hath already made thee most amiable in my eyes (Psal. xlv. 11), and therefore what thou understandest not, I will teach thee. Forsake those vain religions (ver. 10), by which thou hast been deflected, and enter into the holy assemblies of those pious souls that worship me: and bring thy young converts to be instructed by those pastors, whom I will authorize in my church. See Annot. [h].

Ver. 9.] Where they shall grow in strength, and increase in number; and under the conduct of those great men, who shall guide and lead them, speedily subdue all mankind unto my obedience (Psal. xlv. 4): for I have likened thee, whom I love, to those victorious armies of a mighty king, which trample all opposition triumphantly under their feet. See Annot. [i].

Ver. 10.] And then will the very outward face of the church look most beautiful, by those various orders of spiritual gifts, wherewith I will enrich her: which shall make her appear like a lovely bride, when she is decked with her jewels and ornaments, that add lustre to her beauty. See Annot. [k].

Chorus of Virgins.

Ver. 11.] Unto which all her members shall contribute, by their unanimous resolution, to lead such a life as may adorn their religion; and make the church shine in such splendour and glory, that she shall not come short of royal majesty (Psal. xlv. 13). See Annot. [l].

Spouse.

Ver. 12.] Whereby she shall become fit for the affections of her great Lord, when he sits upon the throne of his glory; acknowledging his bounty in all the benefits and ornaments he hath bestowed upon her (Phil. iv. 18), and making manifest the sweet and fragrant odour of his knowledge in every place: (2 Cor. ii. 11, compared with Ps. xlv. 8). See Annot. [m].

Ver. 13.] From which knowledge every pious soul shall derive the greatest refreshment, comfort, and strength: and therefore love him above all things, and resolve never to let him slip out of their minds: but to preserve the remembrance of him most carefully, night and day, in their very hearts; as the most precious cordial, in all conditions, unto their spirits. See Annot. [n].

Ver. 14.] And, indeed, there is nothing of such price, nothing so delicious among us for our bodily pleasure, but ought to put us in mind how much more inestimable that knowledge is, which thou, O Lord, who deservest all our love, vouchsafrst for the comfort and satisfaction of our souls. See Annot. [o].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 15.] Such shall be the language of those who are acquainted with his worth, which shall increase their mutual affection unto each other: and move him to give his church more sensible testimonies of his love, and repeated assurances how amiable her purity and modesty, her innocence and simplicity, as well as her decent order and comely government, are in his sight. See Annot. [p].

Spouse.

Ver. 16.] And what can this love of his produce, but new admiration in her, of him and of his love, bursting forth into such expressions as these; Yes, rather, thou art most amiable and lovely (Ps. xlv. 2), not 1: whose beauty and goodness are but a weak reflection of thy incomparable perfections, which move thee to communicate thyself in the most delectable graces unto all those that love thee: who, making one body with thee, may say, we feast together most sumptuously, and are entertained every day with those delights, which grow there only, where thou vouchsaft thy gracious presence. See Annot. [q].

Ver. 17.] Who hast promised to dwell with us, in the several churches of thy saints; which are so many living temples dedicated to thy service: and, being protected and defended by thee, shall remain
SOLOMON'S SONG.

Of which matter I have noted something elsewhere (Menæa Mystica); and therefore shall only add here, that, in the mystical divinity of the cabalists, these are the words of Malecuth the spouse, speaking to her Splicer, the bridegroom: beseeching him to influence her, not by the Ghost, or with witch, as they speak; that is, understanding and intelligence, which is called by them the mouth of the spirit, or emanations of light.

Better than wine. Wine was the highest entertainment for those guests before mentioned; and therefore used by the Hebrews to express the greatest pleasure or approbation. It also was poured out on the altar, in their offers and sacrifice, and so may comprehend their sacrifices, which were the principal part of their religion. Unto both of which I have had respect in the paraphrase.

Of which ointments there were exceeding great variety; four he mentions in that place, which were in common use; but a vast number more in his fifteenth book, ch. 11, out of Apollonius Hierophilius. Who shows, in a book on purpose about it, that several countries afforded unguents that were most excellent in their kind. As the best of roses were made at Tarsus, where the rose was one of the most noted flowers. One came from Soli, in Cilicia: that of spikenard from Tarsus, &c., διὰ Σωρία τοῦ σωρίου ἕνωσαν πάντα παρασκευάζοντα, &c. " Syria anciently (though not in his time) afforded excellent of all sorts, especially of one," which he there names.

Now to this use of ointment some think Solomon here alludes; but I rather think he hath respect to his father's words (Ps. xlv. 8), and intended hereby to signify the glorious offices of the Messiah, whose very name (signifying anointed) carried in it all that could be desired: he being anointed by God to be the great deliverer and saviour of his people. And these first words of the verse, the LXX. seem to me to have the same design, namely, "Thou hast, hast, hast,"followed), who translate them thus: "The smell of thy ointments is above all spices;" taking toinian, which we translate ointment, for the best of ointments.

Therefore do the virgin bear thee. The attractive power of sweet ointments (to which Solomon here alludes) is notably declared in that which Basil (Epist. ad Julia) saith, of the manner of catching doves. Which was by breeding up one tame, and then, μικρός τα πετυματα ἐντελεῖς ὑποκείμενοι, "anointing her wings with ointment," they let her fly away, καὶ ἐφ' τού μούνον τινὲς, &c., "and the sweet odour of the ointment drew abundance of pigeons after her;" which she brought to the cot of her owner. See this farther explained in the next note [d].

Kisses of his mouth. As a kiss given to another, was a token of love and kindness, friendship and familiarity, in those countries (it being their manner to salute their guests whom they invited to their house, Luke vii. 45), so many kisses were a token of abundant love, and excessive affection; as appears from what is there said by our Saviour of the woman who had "not ceased to kiss his feet." And therefore, the beginning of this verse may be thus paraphrased, "Let him declare his love unto me, in the most familiar and most ample manner."

so stable and firm, that they shall last for ever. See Annot.[7].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1. Song of songs. Every one knows is a Hebraism for the most excellent song; as holy of holies is the most holy; and king of kings the greatest king. And though the natural meaning seems to be, that this is the most excellent of all songs that Solomon made (which were very many, 1 Kings iv. 33), both in its structure and copiousness, and in regard of the subject whereof it treats: yet, since the Chaldee paraphrase, and abundance of Christian writers, think it called the most excellent song, with respect likewise to all the songs that had been formerly made by any prophetic person, as those, Exod. xxv. Judg. v. 1 Sam. ii. &c. (because they celebrated only some particular benefits, this the immense love of God, not only towards that nation, but towards all mankind), I have not neglected that in my paraphrase.

Which is Solomon's. The Hebrew words are so contrived, that they may either signify concerning Solomon (i.e. Christ), or of which Solomon was the author. Which, I doubt not, is the first and literal meaning: because so the LXX. expound it; and so the same phrase is understood by all, in the titles of those psalms, which are called Psalmus David, but it may be furthered farther, that the name of any usual titles added, as there are in the Proverbs and Ecclesiastes; where he is called "son of David, king of Israel," and "king in Jerusalem." Of which, if any reason is to be assigned, this seems the most probable, that those titles, which have respect only to his temporal estate, greatness, and dignity, he who may be a poet, when he was wrapt up in contemplation of that celestial prince, the Prince of peace; in comparison with whom all others are not worth the naming; and whose character was best expressed by the name of Solomon alone; he being the great peace-maker and reconciler of God and man.

Let him kiss me. Solomon speaks this in the person of the "virgin daughter of Zion;" that is, the church. Whom he here introduces in the most passionate strain, wishing for some token of love, which is expressed under the metaphor of a kiss. But there is no mention at all made of the name, condition, or beauty of the person whose love is desired; nor any account given of the beginning or progress of this love; but it is as if he were wrapt up in contemplation of that celestial prince, the Prince of peace; and abruptly into these words, "Let him kiss me," &c., that he might the more artificially describe the nature and force of divine love; which, when it possesses the mind, snatches it so from itself, that it is wholly in him that it loves. It thinks of nothing else, seeks nothing, wishes nothing, speaks of nothing, but this alone: and imagines that everybody else thinks of the same, and knows of whom it speaks.

It is just such a beginning as that of the eighty-seventh psalm: where the psalmist enters upon the description of the loveliness of mount Zion and mount Moriah, in this manner, "His foundation is in the holy mountains."
the people of God. And, indeed, wonderful ardor was the love of those, who came from gentiles unto Christ; such as the woman of Samaria (John iv.); the centurion (Matt. viii.); the Canaanitish woman (Matt. xv.), who had such faith as was not found in Israel.

The king hath brought me, &c. [1] Here now he seems on a sudden to have had a glance of the Messiah, the great king of Israel: and in the spirit of prophecy to have beheld a glimpse of those things, "which eye had not seen, nor ear heard, neither did they enter into the heart of man." Which I understand here by the word children, which we translate "chambers" wherein he alludes to the chambers of the temple (1 Chron. xxviii. 11), but especially to the most secret place of it; into which no man might enter, but the highpriest alone; till Christ came and made way for us into the holiest of all, which was typified by it.

The upright love thee.) The last two words of this verse being capable of various translations, I have expressed the sense so largely as to comprehend them all in my paraphrase. And shall only add, that the whole verse may be understood after this manner, that the first words, "draw me," are the voice of the spouse; the next, "we will run after thee," the words of the chorus of virgins. And then she speaks again "the king hath brought me into his chambers," and there she utters with exceeding joy her answer, words, "we will be glad and rejoise," &c. This came into my mind since I wrote the paraphrase, and seems to be the plainest account of this verse.

[1] Ver. 5. I am black, &c. [2] The principal mystery of the kingdom of Christ, being the calling of the gentiles into fellowship with him (which is often called a mystery in Scripture, which signifies something beyond what any one thing whatsoever), Solomon seems to speak of that in this verse: having beheld, in the rapture wherein he was, the gentiles flocking to him, not without the great displeasure of the Jews, who condemned, and would have excluded them, as people incapable of his love: unto which the gentiles are here introduced making their answer to the exceptions of the Jews, in these words: "I am black, but comely," &c. The literal sense of which, and of the next verse, I have expressed so fully in the paraphrase, annexing the spiritual sense to the end, that I do not think fit to enlarge upon it here. But desire the reader to take notice that the word sechora, which we translate black, described the Jewesses, and the gentiles (called sechar in the Hebrew) when some little light begins to appear, and the darkness to fly away. Which aptly represents the condition of the gentle world, when they were upon the point of receiving the knowledge of Christ. Which wise king Solomon might well foresee would be imparted to them: by observing a type of it in his own marriage, as well as in the marriages of other great men in former times. Which plainly showed the Jews, if they would have learnt it, that there was no reason they should except against the conjunction of the gentiles with themselves in the spiritual marriage of both, in one body, unto Christ. For Isaac married Rebecca, a gentile, and the daughter of an idolater, as appears from her brother Laban, who was no better (Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, &c.). And this man's daughter Jacob married; whose son Judah, the prince of their tribes, took to wife a Canaanit (Gen. xxxvii. 2), as Joseph did an Egyptian (Gen. xii. 15), nay, Moses himself, that great deliverer and lawgiver of his people, took an Ethiopian (or Arabian) woman (Numb. xii. 1): and, notwithstanding the anger of his brother and sister, at this marriage, would not be divorced from her. Nahshon, also, a great man of the house of Judah, married Rahab of Jericho, and had by her Beza, who took Ruth the Moabitess to wife, by whom he had Obed the grandfather of David. And, indeed, the very first institution of marriage having (as I have proved in the preface) a mystical intention in it, which St. Paul unfolds in Eph. v., these marriages may well be looked upon as emblems of the uniting all sorts of people with Christ, in one body of the church.

[2] Ver. 6. Here they seem to give an account how they came to degenerate, and lose their original beauty; by false prophets and prophetesses, in the gentile world, who led them to idolatry; particularly to the worship into the sun, which was the mark of the most ancient of all other (Deut. vi. 19, Job xxxi. 25), and spread itself as far as the sun shineth. For it was the sun whom one country worshipped under the name of Baal; another under the name of Moloch; another of Chemosh; and others of Mithras and Osiris. Which last was the name given to it by the Egyptians; and, in the sun's name was worshipped in the famous city of Heliopolis (which took its name from thence), not far from the land of Rameses; where the children of Israel dwelt whilst they lived there (Gen. xlvii. 11), and so were more easily infected with that idolatry.

[3] Ver. 7. This verse I take to be the voice of the whole church, longing to be united with his doctrine; and press their jaws together, as the disciples are to sheep, whom shepherds were wont in those countries to lead into cool shades at noon, that they might not suffer by the heat. Unto which Solomon here alludes; representing all pious souls as afraid also of wandering from the true shepherd, and falling like sheep that go astray, into the hands of strangers. All which metaphors are largely pursued by our blessed Saviour, in one of his parables (John x.), as comparisons familiarly known to his disciples, who found them here first used in this holy book.

[4] Ver. 8. To the foregoing petition, he here returns this answer. Which needs no other explanation than what I have given of it in the paraphrase; unless the expression of an uxor viri, that is between father and kids. The latter of which signifies the gentle young ones; and so may represent the new converts of the gentiles who formerly lay under an ill character, and did male olece, as they speak, smell rank of many foul superstitions. But I am not willing to meddle with such niceties.

[5] Ver. 9. Company of horses, &c. This comparison may convince us, that Solomon doth not aim at any single person in this song (either Pharaoh's daughter, or a beautiful Shunammite, or any other woman or virgin, who would very absurdly be compared to a "troop of horses"), but as a great many united in a body: i. e. the whole company of believers in the Messiah; who may very fitly be resembled to the "horses in the chariots of Pharaoh." Whose kingdom in those days abounded with the most excellent horses which were famous for their strength, and fitness for service: as may be seen by the provision of them Solomon made for himself from thence (1 Kings ii. 29, 30), and the great number which came from thence against Jerusalem, in his son's days (2 Chron. xii. 3). Long after which we read of their great force (1 Sam. xxxi. 1, Jer. xlv. 4, 9), and consequently, the body of Christian people, that is, the church, being compared to a company of them, is set forth thereby as very powerful, and prevailing over all opposers.

[6] Ver. 10. The metaphor of the wind which is represented to be by the power of the Spirit: wherewith Christ had endeared his church. For the manner of bridegoings being to present their future bride with jewels, or some other rich gifts (suitable to their quality and ability), Solomon alludes to them, as I take it in this verse: and points at the gifts which his father foretold (Ps. lxvii. 18), Christ would dispense, when he ascended up on high to his throne of glory: whereby several orders of admirable men were consecrated in the church (1 Cor. xii. 28, &c.).

[7] Ver. 11.] And the design of all those gifts was to make men truly virtuous, which seems to be intended in this verse (for love and good works are compared to gold, in the language of Christ himself, Rev. iii. 18), which is the voice of all those that attended upon the bride.

[u] Ver. 12.] This which makes the greatest difficulty in this book, is the change of the persons that speak: and it is doubted here, whose language this is. I take it to be the bride herself, that here again gratefully acknowledges his benefits, and endeavours to make all the world sensible of them.

Sitteth at his table.] The king sitting at his table, signifying his rest and joy after all his labours; I have therefore expounded it of the throne of his glory; unto which our blessed Saviour being advanced, he received power to prefer others; whose honour and dignity are expressed by these two things, "eating at his table," and "sitting by him upon thrones:" which were the same thing in our Saviour's own language (Matt. xix. 28, compared with Luke xvii. 29, 30).

Solomon.] I have observed by Pliny that the most fragrant nard comes from the spikes of a very small, contemptible shrub: which may well be looked upon as an emblem of the sweet odour of the gospel; wherewith such mean and desppicable persons, as the apostles were of themselves, filled all the world by their preaching; together with the extraordinary holiness of their lives, which recommended their preaching very much to all observing men. So the exhalers expound this fragrance, in the ancient book Zohar: where R. Judah said, When good works are multiplied in the world, then the cheneceta Israel (i.e. the congregation of Israel, the same with Malcheth, in their language) exhales rich in lexiv, good odours, i.e. most sweet and fragrant odours, being blessed by the holy king, &c.

Which words the scholar expounds thus, "she exhales sweet odours to her husband Tipheret," and is most acceptable to him: the lower world (as his words are) being by this means married to the higher.

[n] Ver. 13.] A bundle of myrrh, &c.] The church, as it had the greatest comfort and satisfaction in sitting on the throne of his glory, resolves here to keep him perpetually in mind, and in her most hearty affections: which is expressed by myrrh tied up in a little bag, and put into the bosom, as the manner was in those countries, to corroborate the heart, and exhilarate the spirits.

The bosom of all chaste women is inaccessible to any hand but that of their husband: and therefore here signifies the careful preservation of his memory, and of the doctrine he hath deposited in his church.

[o] Ver. 14. Cluster of camphire.] Nothing more puzzles interpreters than these words, which we translate "cluster of camphire." For our camphire was unknown to the ancients, and does not grow in clusters, but in the resinous substance of a tree in Borneo, and in China: and therefore is far better translated in the margin of our bibles, cypress. But by cypress is not to be understood the tree which bears that name among us; but a far more aromatic plant in the east, which was a kind of ligustrum or alcharma, called by Pliny cyperus, and sometimes cypruss: which produced a most sweet bush of flowers, and also berries, not much different from the fragrans of spikenard.

Whence it is likely the famous island Cypruss took its name; because here (as at Asemum in Juda, and on the banks of the Nile) the best, that is, the most odorous cypress grows. Thus both Stephanus and Eustathius: The island Cypruss hath its name, ρυς του φυσινων ως των κυπρων, "from the flower of cypruss growing there:" as Bochart shows in his Ca\- naan, lib. i. cap. 3. Of which flowers, or of the seed, was made that incense which Pliny calls the regnum royal.

But there is one that thinks these words may be translated, precious cluster, or cluster of great value: to be bought at any rate: because copher denotes the price of any thing that is purchased or redeemed. Such was the balsam that came from those shrubs; which grew at Engedi (in the plains of Jericho), after the manner of vines; and therefore called, as Bochartus hath shown, the vineyards of Engedi. And thus the ancient Hebrew doctors, by dividing the first word אבב have found out the mystery of the Messiah in these words. Which they understand, as if he had said, "My beloved is unto me as the apple tree among all things."

[p] Ver. 15. Behold.] This and the following verse contain the mutual expressions of their love. First, of Christ to his church, in this verse: and that not only in regard of her inward purity, but of her external order; both which were remarkable: and therefore the word behold is repeated.

Doves' eyes.] The eyes show more than any part else, the inward affection of the mind: and "doves' eyes" are the emblems of simplicity, candour, sincerity, and purity.

[q] Ver. 16.] Here follows the expression of the church's love to Christ: whom she acknowledgeth to be the fountain of all that is in her. Our bed is green.] By bed I understand their table: about which they sat on beds strewed with flowers, or such fragrant greens as were in season.

[r] Ver. 17. Our house, &c.] The last word I take for a description of particular churches: by the roof or covering of which I understand their protection. And it being made of cedar and fir, there seems to be an allusion to the temple; in the description of which these words are employed, as most durable and incorruptible. Others take that word we translate fir to signify cypress: which is still nearer to the sense I have given of this verse. Which sense will not seem at all forced unto those who consider, that not only the whole body of the faithful, which is the church universal, but the parts of it, or single churches, such as that at Ephesus, are represented by the apostle, as a holy temple, a habitation, or dwelling-place of God? which is built upon Christ, and with him makes up one house of God (Cph. ii. 20, 22). Nay, every particular faithful person is not only a living stone, as St. Peter speaks, in that building, but is called also a temple of God; who dwells in holy minds by his Spi- rit (1 Cor. iii. 15, 17, vi. 19). So that the bride and the chorus of virgins, might well, both with respect to Christ, and to one another, use the style of our house in this description of his dwelling-place.
CHAPTER II.

1 I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys.
2 As the lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters.
3 As the apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste.
4 He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love.
5 Stay me with flags, comfort me with apples; for I am sick of love.
6 His left hand is under my head, and his right hand doth embrace me.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—Here begins a new colloquy, which hath two principal parts. In the first of which the bridegroom owns the praises to belong unto him, which has been bestowed upon him, in the conclusion on the foregoing chapter (ver. 1, 2), and the bride again declares her high admiration of him, and satisfaction in him and his love; as infinitely surpassing all other enjoyments, and deserving greater love to him, than could be expressed (ver. 3, 4). With which ecstacy of love he declares himself to be highly pleased (ver. 7), then follows the second part, wherein she sets forth the wonderful power of divine love to enlighten their mind, and to obtain the favour of illuminations from above. For now she speaks (ver. 8, 9, &c.) as if she saw him, and heard his voice, inviting her to partake of the blessings which his appearing brought to mankind. The secure possession of which she also hears his promising to her (ver. 11, 13), and thereupon promises him most faithful obedience (ver. 16, 17).

Bridegroom.

Ver. 1.] I am, indeed, the fountain of all true delight and pleasure; the rose of Sharon being not more grateful to the smell, nor the lily of the valleys to the sight, than the knowledge of me is to the mind of those who are acquainted with me. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 2.] Whereby thou, my dearly beloved, art become not unlike to me; appearing in such lustre and beauty among the nations of the world, as the lily doth among the thorns that grow in desert places. See Annot. [b].

Spouse.

Ver. 3.] And thou art so far greater and more lovely in my eyes, than the greatest princes of this world; who are no more to be compared to thee, than the wild trees that bring forth nothing but leaves, or only harsh and insipid trash, with the godly apple-tree, when it is laden with its beautiful and pleasant fruits. Who can express the satisfaction which his protection affords! Under which I have constantly enjoyed a sweet repose; pleasing myself in the delightful thoughts of the blessed fruits of his coming among us, and of what he hath purchased for us. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 4.] Which administers the highest joys to those who taste of them; and hath entertain'd, or rather feasted me, with such delicious hopes, that I cannot but glory in this, that I am listed under his banner whose motto is love: whereby he hath overcome, shall I say, or overpower'd my heart, to submit myself wholly unto his wonderful love. See Annot. [d].

Ver. 5.] Under the weight of which, who can support himself, when it so sensibly touches his heart? I faint, I languish, I die, when I am deeply affected with that love; which overwhelms my spirit; and makes me call for a greater power than my own to enable me to bear the thoughts of his mighty love. See Annot. [e].

Ver. 6.] And whereas should I have that power but from himself? who then communicates most of the grace of his Holy Spirit to us (which is the greatest token of his love), when he sees our hearts fullest of love to him. See Annot. [f].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 7.] In which he would have us take an uninterrupted pleasure, saying, I beseech, I charge you (all you that are her companions), I conjure you by all that is dear to you, not to discompose, or give the least disturbance to that love; but let it enjoy its satisfaction to the height of its desires. See Annot. [g].

Spouse.

Ver. 8.] Which words of grace can come from none but him, who is worthy of all our love; whom, behold, I see, though he be afar off: I see with what delight he comes, surmounting all difficulties and discouragements, to do the will of God (Ps. xl. 7, 18). See Annot. [h].

Ver. 9.] The swift motion of the roes and wild goats is but a weak emblem of his readiness to come down to us. And, though he do not yet actually show himself among us, I see, notwithstanding, something of him; and behold him approaching nearer and nearer to us; like one that, resolving to be our guest, doth not presently enter, but first stands behind the wall of our house, then looks in at the window, and through the lattices or grates, whereby he is still more fully discovered. See Annot. [i].

Ver. 10.] And I hear his voice (who is worthy of all our love) calling unto us to meet him with our most forward desires, saying, Awake thou, who art most dear unto me, thou who art most beautiful in my eyes; arise, and stay no longer, but come away from these dark representations of me.

Ver. 11.] For now that dismal time is past, where-in ignorance, error, and wickedness, overflowed the world, as floods do the earth in the winter-season; those cloudy and uncomfortable days are over, where-
SOLOMON'S SONG.

12 The flowers appear on the earth: the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land;
13 The fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away.

14 ¶ O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely.
15 Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes.

16 ¶ My beloved is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among the lilies.
17 Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, turn, my beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of Beter.

in thou couldst see and enjoy but little of me. See Annot. [vii].

Ver. 12.] Alltokens of a new world appear, and invite thee to come and partake of those joys and pleasures which the nearer approaches of the sun of righteousness produce: who makes all manner of blessings spring up in such abundance, that it causes the heavenly host to sing for joy; and therefore cannot but fill all mankind with joyful hymns unto him. See Annot. [vii].

Ver. 13.] And for this especially, that their dead hopes are revived, and they receive the earnest and beginnings of that future bliss; the expectation of which is our greatest comfort in this life, and the consummation of it our highest happiness in the next: and therefore I say again, Awake, and stir up thy desires, thou who art most dear unto me, who art most lovely in my eyes; arise, and go, and take possession of those inestimable benefits. See Annot. [vii].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 14.] And he not afraid of those, who, seeking to destroy thee, force thee to flee, like an innocent dove, to hide thyself, and seek for safety in holes of the earth, in caves, and dens, and secret places; but from hence look up unto me, and call upon me, with praises and thanksgivings, and I will save and deliver thee: for I love thee inseparably, who art most amiable in my eyes, whose prayers and praises I delight to hear, and to behold my own image that is formed in thee. See Annot. [vii].

Ver. 15.] And therefore I require all those that act by authority from me, and to whom I have committed the care of my church, to use their diligence also to discover and confute the sophistry of deceivers, who craftily insinuate their false doctrines into weak and incautious souls: and thereby seduce those who are newly converted, or but instrin in the faith. See Annot. [vii].

Sponsor.

Ver. 16.] Unto which I hear the church reply, I will preserve my fidelity to him, who is my only beloved, as I am his; I will have nothing to do with those seducing spirits, but adhere to him alone: whose dwelling is not among subtle and crafty, but with simple and candid souls. See Annot. [vii].

Ver. 17.] Only let him be pleased to crownish his gracious presence with me, and to enlighten me more and more, till we have a full knowledge of him and of his will (Rom. xiii. 11, 12), and the light of it scatter all the shadows of the law: let my beloved also make haste to succour and relieve me in all difficulties and distresses; and show the same readiness for my preservation as did (ver. 9) for my first salvation. See Annot. [vii].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] There is so little ground to apply the parts of this song to the several ages of the church, till the end of all things, that I cannot think fit to follow such interpretations. But shall pursue the method I have begun, and observe, that the Messianic is here introduced, as owning the praises which the church had bestowed upon him in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter. And that in such phrases as are becoming a pastoral, borrowed from flowers and trees (under which shepherds delight to sit and eat the fruit), and from such creatures as frequent the fields and woods, &c.

I am the rose.] And in this verse he first compares himself to a rose: which is still one of the goodliest things to which a great prince can be likened in those eastern countries. As appears from a letter, written by the great Mogul in the Persian tongue, to king James, sent by Sir Tho. Roe: wherein he thus compliments his majesty of Great Britain: "As upon a rose in a garden, so are my eyes fixed upon you: God strengthen, maintain, and prosper your monarchy may prosper, &c." But it was chiefly prized by shepherds and shepherdesses: and accounted by them ἐγραφησαν, as Philostratus speaks, "the plant of love." Insomuch, saith he, that if the great king have the diadem on his head, the soldier his helmet, as the greatest ornament; beautiful youths should have chaplets of roses, &c. [Mr. 558.] For "the rose is the most fragrant, "as near of kin to them both in sweetness and in stinkiness." And Achilles Tatus (Lib. i. ἐπαρ. &c.) thus commends this lovely flower; If Jupiter would set a king over the flowers, it would be the rose that should reign over them: "Being the ornament of the earth, the splendour of plants, the eye of flowers, the blushing beauty of the field, or resplendent brightness, &c.

Of Sharon.] i.e. The most excellent rose: for such were the roses of Sharon: as may be gathered from hence: that the rose, according to Pliny's observation, delights in dry places: and will not thrive in fat and unctuous soils, in rich clays, or grounds well watered, but in thin and stony, full of gravel, where such was the soil about Sharon. as we learn from the Mishna, in the title Sota, ch. 8, where they that built a brick house in Sharon are said to have been deprived of the benefit of the law.

Deut. xx. 5. Upon which passage R. Solomon glosses, that the earth throughout was unfit for making bricks, being so dry and crumbling, that the houses that were built of them had need to be repaired twice in seven years. Insomuch, that the Jerusalem Talmud saith, "This high-priest prayed by name for the Sharonites, upon the day of expiration, that their houses might not be converted into their graves."

Lily of the valleys.] By the lily we are not to understand such as we call Lilium chalcedonicum, or Majul lily; but some more noble and fragrant flower: being joined here with roses: as it is in several poetical fragments (quoted by Athenaeus, lib. xv. cap. 8, 9) with violets, marigaron, and divers other sweet flowers. Insomuch, that he saith the Corinthians called the Lily by the name of ambrosia: and he tells us out of Nicander, that it was esteemed ψιθυρί Ἀνθρωποδίκας, "the joy and delight of Venus," because of its beautiful colour: and smell, also, I suppose: for in the twelfth chapter of the same book, he quotes a passage out of Theophrastus, who, treating of sweet flower.
CHAPTER II. 189.

...omments made of flowers, mentions to is foggren, "that of lilies," as well as that of roses.

But notwithstanding all this, the lily being vulgarly celebrated only for its beautiful colour, I have taken no pains to point out the variations which have been made in her. For the word we translate lathan is wont to be joined together with those which signify nattles and broumbles [Isa. xxxiv. 13, Hosea ix. 6].

[c] Ver. 3. As the apple-tree, &c.] To this the church here replies; and expresses her reciprocal affection in such words as may be applied to signify his pre-eminence over all other gods; when they were wont to worship under trees, as we read in Deut. xii. 2, 1 Kings xiv. 23, Isa. vii. 5, and many other places.

I sat down under, &c.] In the latter part of this verse, and in those that follow, she turns her speech to her companions and attendants; relating the singular events which she had experienced by the hand of him, who was, as she says, the first and only ruler, and to whom she had paid the most profound respect.

[d] Ver. 1. He brought me, &c.] Which is set forth by a banquet, whereby (it is well known) the Hebrews were wont to represent the joys, even of the other world. And what greater joy have we here than to think of the stupendous love of God our Saviour towards us? which cannot but subdue our hearts to love him entirely. So I have paraphrased the latter part of the verse ("his banner over me was love"), taking in two senses of which the words are capable. The most obvious is, that love was the inscrip- tion in his banner: the other, that he conquers only by love: a banner displayed supposing an armed force marching under it. Deherrn, in his Electa, lib. III. cap. 9, hath not unrightly glossed upon the words thus: "The banner of our Lord is his love, which he hath publicly declared to us, that he might draw us to himself; by which, also, when we are come to him, he retains us with him; and strengthen- ens us by the same when we fight with our spiritual enemies. And that we may always lock upon it and never forget it, he hath impressed this rendering his love most familiar to us. He that knows not this banner, can be none of his soldiers; and he that des- erts it is undone, unless he presently return to it. So that as the Roman legions had their several names (one of which was called the pinae, another the faithful, another the thundering, another the victorious, &c.), in like manner the Christian band may be called amoris legio, the legion of love."

[e] Ver. 5. Stay me with flagons, &c.] This verse is a description of one falling into a swoon, by the abundance of her love: in which case corporeal spirits are wont to be called for, to revive such persons, and keep them from fainting quite away. Companions, flagons, smells, also, are wont to be administered to the nose; which is the meaning of calling here for fragrant applen, oranges, citron, &c. (as well as wine), which are all comprehended under the name of tappunach in the Hebrew; which is a word that in its very original imports an exhalation or odor-breathing, from that which is so called. By which the church is repre- sented to be so marvellously affected with the love of Christ, as to be even oppressed under the weight of divine benefits; and at a perfect loss what to think of them; having little or nothing to return for such infinite obligations.

[f] Ver. 6. Adonai, my left hand, &c.] This is a representa- tion of the tenderest affection of a husband to his wife, when he sees her in danger to faint; and being applied to Christ and his church, sets forth his readi- ness to succour us, in all our needs, by the power of his Spirit. I go not about to divine what is distinctly meant by the left hand, and what by the right (which I look upon as too great a curiosity in interpreters), but take them both to express one and the same thing. And the "hand of the Lord," signifying, oftentimes in scripture, the power of the Spirit, I have applied them to that.

[g] Ver. 7. I charge you, &c.] It is dubious whether this verse be the voice of Christ of the church. I take it to be his; who is the good shepherd, represented in this pastoral song. Which, suitable to its nature, is still full of rural similitudes, taken from the roes and hinds; which are most amiable creatures (as hath been observed upon Prov. vi.), with which not only shepherds, but the greatest persons in the world, have delighted themselves. And that word which we well translate "I charge you," I take to be only a solemn form of earnest beseeching and entreaty (which all persons are wont to make by those things that are dearest to them), not an adjuration, which is not lawful for any to make, but only by God. I have contented myself therefore with this simple paraphrase of that passage; and sought for no mystical interpretation, as the matter is, which may be found in most interpreters; who, among other things, by roes and hinds understand the angelical powers: to which the cabalists apply these words, and would have them to signify as much as, "I ad- jure you by the tribunal of justice, whence the wicked are punished."
the "singing of birds:" and the "voice of the turtle." Which as Aristotle observes (Histor. Nat. lib. viii. cap. 3), in winter, and comes forth again when the spring is a little advanced: and therefore is here very properly mentioned in the last place among the notes of the spring. Which being the time of all others most welcome to shepherds, for the feeding of their flocks, and for all manner of pleasures, represents, as the same Theodoret conceives, τον υπερ λαος, "the joyful time after our Saviour's coming." When a new world appeared, and there was a greater abundance of divine blessings, especially of the Spirit, poured forth: which the Chaldee paraphrase takes to be meant by the "voice of a turtle." Which is a kind of dove; in the face of which the Holy Ghost descended at our Saviour's baptism. And then the "singing of birds" may be applied to the songs of the heavenly host, at his birth. Others will have this turtle to have been the figure of John the Baptist: which is also pat enough: but I have only touched upon such things, and do not think fit here to enlarge upon them. But come, in fear of various birds, this also; as Justin Martyr: Tchelensius, in the conclusion of his Itinerarium, expressly applies these words to the coming of the Messiah: saying, that "they cannot be gathered to their own land, till that time of the singing of birds come, and the voice of the turtle; and till they come who preach glad tidings, saying always, The Lord be thus named: and divers of the people to Elias, glauzing thus, "The voice of the turtle also, hath it not been heard in our land, by the means of the prophet! according to that which is said, Behold, I will send to you Elias the prophet" (Mal. iv. 5).

[6] Ver. 13. The fig tree putth forth, &c.] After the spring-time, here follows a description of the entrance of summer: of which the poet expounds forth great figs, and the blowing of the vines, nay, the knotting of the grapes, were a sign. In the end of which the harvest coming, hereby is denoted, saith the same father (Theodoret), τον προδοσιώμενον αιτη, "the world which we expect hereafter:" unto which I have applied this verse. Where it may be observed that in the fear of various birds, the fifty jasper jewels, which were wont to be planted together (Luke xiii. 6, 7).

[7] Ver. 11. O my dove, that art in the clefts, &c.] Some of the Hebrew writers, whose sense the Chaldee paraphrase expresses, refer this to the people of Israel flying from Pharaoh, like a dove before the hawk that is ready to seize her: but may be better referred to the church of Christ, in danger: the city in pieces by her pagan persecutors, and by the Jews themselves; as it was in the beginning of our religion. Which forced Christians to hold their assemblies under ground, in obscure places (where they sung hymns to our blessed Lord before the break of day); and made the church perfectly like a dove, who, being afraid at various birds, flies into crevices of rocks and to secret holes in steep places, to preserve herself.

The church is so often compared by Christ to a dove, in this book, that it is fit to give some account of it. And Bochartus (De Sacr. Animal, lib. i. cap. 4, p. 11) takes this to be the principal, if not the only reason of it; to signify it to be his only beloved: and that he alone also is most dear to her. For in doves there is a wonderful love (observed by many authors) between those that are once paired: who never part, but keep faithful the one to the other. And so are a fit emblem of the church, whom the apostle saith he had espoused to Christ as a chaste virgin (Cor. vii. 16). Let me see thy countenance.] That word which we translate countenance or aspect, may be rendered shape or fashion: denoting all the comely proportions of the church, by her likeness to her Lord Christ.

[a] Ver. 15. Take us the foxes.] Foxes abound in Judea, and are observed, by abundance of authors, to love grapes, and to make great devastations in vineyards. Insomuch, that Aristophanes, in his Equites, compares soldiers to foxes; spelling whole countries as they do vineyards. Now the prophet Ezekiel, comparing false prophets to foxes (xii. 4), it hath led all interpreters (in a manner) to understand by foxes in this place, heretici: who appeared very early in the church, and therefore are compared to young foxes; in regard of their known craft and subtility, finding and turnings, shifts and evasions; whereby the more simple sort especially, and such as were newly converted (compared here to tender grapes, as the church itself is at a vine), were in danger to be undone, unless a timely care was taken to prevent it. And therefore this verse seems to be an answer to the church's prayers, flying to her Lord for refuge. And this verse, says he, is the only passage that is more than from false teachers, calls upon his companions; that is, the apostles, bishops, and pastors of the church, to look after them, and to take them in their craftiness. And that whilst they were young, in the beginning, that is, their appearance in the world; because their "vain babblings were apt to increase with more violence": and instanced among the signs of the prophet Elias (Matthew 17: 2). Especially when the church was but newly planted, and those seducers applied themselves chiefly to such as had but newly received the faith, or to weak and unsettled people, who were easily caught by them, unless great care were taken to discover their frauds, and to confute their sophistry.

Which also, the taking of these foxes, as Theodoret expounds it: and St. Bernard also; who observes that he saith, take us the foxes: that is, Sibi et sponsae, "to himself, and to his spouse." As much as to say, If it be possible, let them be reconciled to the catholic church, and brought back to the true faith. If that could not be, then other methods succeeded; and the church would use such desperate devices, as unto Satan, which was a punishment that included in it bodily affliction, that they might learn not to blaspheme (1 Tim. i. 13).

He feedeth.] To feed, viz. his flock, is to have his abode among them (see vi. 9).

[8] Ver. 17.] Until the day break, &c.] All that she desires farther is only his gracious presence with her; which is now the period in which she would vouchsafe her upon the mountains: that is, those steep places mentioned before, ver. 14 (where the church was fain to worship him in great secret, because of the present danger), especially while any disputes and controversies remained about the Jewish ceremonies, which were a great disturbance to the church, as well as the afflictions and persecutions she endured: which are compared to the night and darkness, as the other to shadows.

Turn, my beloved.] The word turn doth not suppose him absent; but only that he did not immediately attend, or show the regard he had to her prayers in distresses.

Like, &c.] See ch. viii. 14. Mountains of Bethel.] Bethel is the same with CHAPTER III.

Bebek, those two letters, r and j, being easily and often changed, as Bochartus hath observed (in his Geograph. Sacra, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 39), in many instances. As, for example, an island in the Persian Gulf is indifferently called Tyrus and Tylus; and Tavilla in Spain is the same with Tubira; and Caralis in Sardinia the same with Calaris, &c. In another work, indeed, of his (De Sacrificis Animal.), he takes mountains of Bether for mountains full of chiefs. Which would agree well with what went before (ver. 14), and might be handsomely applied to the state of the church, when there were many breaches and rents in it; but the other is plainer and more literal.

CHAPTER III.

1 By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not.

2 I will rise now, and go about the city, and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not.

3 The watchmen that go about the city found me: to whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?

4 It was but a little that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loveth: I held him, and would not let him go, until I had brought him unto my mother's house, and into the chamber of her that conceived me.

5 I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.

6 Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant?

7 Behold his bed, which is Solomon's; threescore valiant men are about it, of the valiant of Israel.

Ver. 3.] But in the midst of these anxious thoughts there was some satisfaction presented to me, from some of those great ministers of God, who watch for the good of others; and employ themselves everywhere to direct his people: of whom I made the same inquiry, if they could tell me any thing of him, who had engaged my affections so much, that I could not often enough profess my love unto him. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 4.] For I received such illuminations from them, that I had not long left their company, before I saw this beloved of my soul, as if he had been actually present with me; which transported me with such joy, that I could not think of parting with such a sight, but took fast hold of him; to keep him with me, till I had shown unto all that wait for him, what I had been so happy as to find myself. See Annot. [d].

Ver. 5.] And here again I heard him graciously renew the charge he had given before (li. 7) to all my companions, saying, I conjure you, by all that is dear to you, not to discompose, or give the least disturbance to this love: but let it enjoy its satisfaction, to the height of its desires. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 6.] And now, what is this that we see? who is this goodly person? or rather this crowd of people coming up out of desolate places in one body to mount Zion; and appearing like the pillars of smoke which arise from the altar of burnt-offering; and no less acceptable to God than the sweet odours that ascend from the altar of incense, in the holy place? See Annot. [f].

Ver. 7.] Behold the love which the great king hath to her, having prepared all things for her reception into society with himself: of whose royal person and happiness Solomon himself, in all his glory, is but a figure. Who is magnificently attended, indeed, and strangely guarded in his palace, by a number of valiant persons that encompass him night and day, in his bed, and in his throne: but are not comparable to the power, and force, and multitude, of that heavenly host, which secure the church in her enjoyments, and take care of her continual safety. See Annot. [g].

ARGUMENT.—Here begins the third of those interlocutory discourses, which compose this famous song; part of which only is contained in this chapter. In which the bride and her companions speak all but one verse, which seems to be spoken by the bridegroom. For whose coming she still longs; and is introduced full of solicitude about it. Which proved not in vain, but was gratified with so much satisfaction in the hope of it, that, as he takes care it should not be disturbed, so all her companions rejoice exceedingly in it. For those are the two parts also of this chapter. In the first of which she testifies her earnest desire to find him; who filled her with joy, when she had got a sight of him (in the first four verses); in the second, they that attended on her after he had renewed his former charge (ver. 5), are transported with joy, to behold the multitude of his followers, and the greatness of his royal glory. Which is the sense of the rest of the chapter.

Spouse.

VER. 1.] Many have been my thoughts about him, who (by what the prophets have foretold of him) is become the beloved of my soul. But, though I have sought him in the greatest retirements, and when my mind was most composed, and that one night after another; though with a diligent search, I have sought him in all the holy books; yet I can find no more than predictions and shadows of him, which assure me he will come, but cannot bring me to the sight and clear knowledge of him. See Annot. [a].

VER. 2.] Whereupon I resolved to leave these private studies, and to go abroad and consult with others: and there is no place which I have not frequented, where I thought I might learn any thing of him. For I have fetched a compass round the whole city of Jerusalem (which is the holy city, the joy of the whole earth), and there is not one street, nor any place of public resort, but I have gone into it, and inquired after him, both in the lesser and greater assemblies; I inquired of all the holy men I could meet withal; but could meet with no more tidings of him, whom my soul longs to see; because I love him above all things. See Annot. [b].

Companions.

VER. 6.] And now, what is this that we see? who is this goodly person? or rather this crowd of people coming up out of desolate places in one body to mount Zion; and appearing like the pillars of smoke which arise from the altar of burnt-offering; and no less acceptable to God than the sweet odours that ascend from the altar of incense, in the holy place? See Annot. [f].
8 They all hold swords, being expert in war: every man hath his sword upon his thigh because of fear in the night.

9 King Solomon made himself a chariot of the wood of Lebanon.

10 He made the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the covering of it of purple, the midst thereof being paved with love, for the daughters of Jerusalem.

11 Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold king Solomon with the crown wherein he was crowned with gold in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart.

Ver. 8.] Who are all unanimously bent, and in a constant readiness (like that guard of valiant men about Solomon, with their swords drawn in their hands), being not less skilful than able to succour and defend his people, from all the assaults of their invisible enemies; who seek to destroy them, by raising terrible persecutions against them. See Annot. [4].

Ver. 9. But all in vain: for, as king Solomon hath caused a chariot of the choicest cedar to be made for him, and for his royal spouse, to appear in publick, when he makes his progress through the kingdom; so do the greater kings ride on prosperously (Is. xlv. 4), by using more than such instruments as he himself hath formed, and enlarges the borders of his church, by the preaching of his everlasting gospel. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 10. Unto which the magnificence and riches of that chariot are not worthy to be compared; though the pillars of it being of silver, the back, the sides, and the seat being of cloth of gold, the curtains and covering of it being of the brightest purple, the carpet also under the feet being curiously wrought with the most lovely figures by the daughters of Jerusalem, they make it very inviting to all spectators; for what is this to the wonderful love of God, and to the riches of his grace, in his great and precious promises (2 Cor. vi. 7)? In all good souls, than thousands of gold and silver, which the gospel calls us not only to behold, but to enjoy! See Annot. [k].

Ver. 11. Make this then a festival day, and let no domestic cares hinder you from bearing a part in the public joy: but as all the daughters of Jerusalem went out to behold the glory wherein king Solomon shone, so let all his people arise in song to the crown which his mother put upon his head on his marriage day, that day which completed all his joys (Ps. xlv. 15); so let all the people of God everywhere admire and extol the surpassing glory of that great king, who shall appear to be crowned with glory, honor, and fullness of joy daily, as he goeth in that city, when he shall publicly own his church, and give her the highest testimony of his endless love (Rev. xix. 6, 7, 12). See Annot. [f].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] The beginning of this chapter might be connected with the foregoing, and applied to the state of the church under affliction: if the following words would suit with that exposition, which they do not, in my opinion; for he had desired to hear her voice, ver. 11, of the second chapter, and now she cannot find him. Therefore, I incline to think, that the very same thing is again represented in other words (after the manner of the prophets; particularly of Isaiah, who over and over again, in several schemes of speech, foreshadows their restoration from the captivity of Babylon, and under that shadow, their greater salvation by Christ): viz. the earnest desire of the church for the coming of Christ; which Solomon expresses by the passionate longings he found in himself to see the bride of the New Covenant.

By night.] And so "by night," may be understood that dark time which was before his appearing; when good men sought for him, and had many dreams and visions about him; but could meet only with the shadows and images of him; which signified him to come, but did not exhibit his very presence to them. Of which neither the temple, nor the sacrifices, nor the sacred books, could discover any thing clearly: but was represented here to Solomon in a vision he had of him, and of the church which was espoused to him after he had sought a long time, and groped everywhere after him, in that dark night wherein they lived. So, as I said, the night may be expounded: for such a dismal condition were they in just when he appeared (Matt. iv. 16; Luke i. 79).

On my bed.] This is expanded with strange variety by interpreters, and understood hereby the "bed of affliction;" others, the "bed of ease and pleasure:" others, of "weakness and infirmity," &c. But I have taken both bed and night, in the most simple sense, to signify the time and place for most composed thoughts: according to the meaning of Ps. iv. 4.

[2] Ver. 2. I will rise now.] To rise up signifies here more active diligence than before had been used. Go about the city.] By the city may be understood Jerusalem; that is, the whole church of the Jews, wherein it was the head; and therefore the figure of the church of Christ in future times (Isa. xxvi. 5—7; Heb. xii. 22).

In this verse and the next, &c.] Schevahim, which we translate streets, are the lesser thoroughfares in the city, or the streets of lesser cities: as rechoboath are the greater, wider streets, or rather the streets of the royal capital city: signifying here his search both in the lesser and the greater assemblies of God's people.

[c] Ver. 3. The watchmen that go about, &c.] By watchmen, I understand the prophets and suchlike excellent persons, who instructed the people (Ezek. iii. 17, xxxiii. 6, 7), of whom he asks, if they saw him whom he sought after. From which word I gather that he speaks of such as were anciently called seers: of whom he saith he was found; that is, they showed him something of the Messiah.

So that.] And this he says here in this verse, that not long after his discourse with them, he found him whom his soul loved, i.e. came to the knowledge, or had a sight and enjoyment of him. In which vision (looking upon him as actually come) he endeavours to retain him, and to bring him into the temple, there to show him to all the pious worshippers of the divine majesty. For that is literally the "house of my mother," as chester carthi, "the chamber of her that conceived me," I take to be the inward part of that house, or the most holy place.

[d] Ver. 5.] And there he expresses his affection to him (that is, to the church, whose passionate desires Solomon here represents in the four foregoing verses), in the same words as he had done before in the foregoing chapter (ver. 7), where this verse is already explained.

[e] Ver. 6. Who is this, &c.] Here begins a new vision, which he had of multitudes of people gathering unto Christ like a cloud of smoke: which fills his companions with great admiration. For it is their voice which this verse, where the word zoth may be translated either what, or who, and by the wilderness, may be understood the forlorn condition wherein men were before, not only in gentility, but even in the Jewish estate. Which made it more wonderful that the church should come thus richly adorned (expressed here by the perfumes of her garments), to be brought in state and pomp to the king's palace; there to be espoused to him. But all that gave up themselves to God, and becoming thereby a holy people, were highly esteemed by him: and therefore compared there to the pillars of smoke (as I take it) that went up every day from the altar of burnt-offering, at the temple, before mentioned; and ascended in a straight line, like a firm pillar, that was not in the least moved from its uprightness, though the wind blow never so boisterously. So the Jews report in Pirke Avoth, cap. 5, and in other books: where these are reckoned among the ten miracles which were seen in the temple: that "the greatest rain never put out the fire; and the most vehement winds never dispersed, or in the least bent, the smoke: but it went steadfastly up to heaven. And how acceptable such persons were to Christ, is farther represented by the sweet perfumes which were burnt upon the altar of incense. For Solomon, I conceive, here alludes (in the last clause of this verse) to that composition which God ordered to be made of sweet spices for his own service at the tabernacle: which none might presume to imitate, or make use of in the other places. (ver. xxx. 54, 55.)

[2] Ver. 7. Behold his bed, &c. And here is farther represented, in the same vision, the happy condition of the church (signified by the bed of Solomon) in society and fellowship with Christ: of whom Solomon was a type, both in his royal state, and marriage, (as appears from Ps. xlv.) whose bed or chamber for the joint slumber of his court was in the form of a bed or couch, wherein more persons than one might sit, Rev. iii. 21) was secured by the most valiant men in the kingdom; who are said to be three-score, a determinate number being named (as the manner is) for an undeterminable. Though some conceive that Solomon doubled the number of that band of mighty men, which was in David's time, which consisted of thirty (2 Sam. xxiii. 13, 23). In the end of which chapter (ver. 39), we read also of thirty and seven persons, who were of great note for their value. To whom, if we add the eleven princes mentioned in 1 Kings iv. beginning; and the twelve great officers, which had the care of making provision for his house, holden the storehouses (ver. 16), we have the just number of sixty. And may be looked upon as a figure of that strong guard, which is about the prosperity and happiness of the church: which is defended by angels, who are mighty ones, indeed, and very numerous (Ps. lxvii. 17), and all ministering spirits for those that are heirs of salvation (Heb. i. ult.); for, the most mighty of the heavenly host, it may be easily proved (if this were a place proper for it), are the guardians and protectors of Christianity.

[4] Ver. 8. Because of fear in the night. And do all of them unanimously oppose the spiritual wickedness, i. e. wicked spirits, in high places; who seek to destroy the church (Eph. vi. 12), and may be meant by the terror of the night, as the Hebrews expounded Ps. xxi. 5, and, being the rulers of the gentle world, stirred them up to persevere Christianity, as destructive to their kingdom of darkness.

[5] Ver. 9. Made himself a chariot. But, in spite of all they could do, Christ is here represented under the type of Solomon's chariot, that was drawn uninterruptedly through the world (for the word appirion, which is never elsewhere used, seems to signify an open chariot, in which Solomon, and, perhaps, his queen, rode, to be exposed to the view of every one in the streets of Jerusalem); who beholding her, and the love of Christ to her, were thereby invited to become members of his church.

Most lexicographers derive this word appirion from a root which signifies to fructify, and therefore will have it to signify a bed. But Averarius, I think, more probably hath derived it from two words, which give it the signification of something carried on wheels: and therefore must denote, at least a chariot having a bed or cushion in it.

The word of Lebanon] Is cedar; denoting the perpetuity of the gospel; the preaching of which is the chariot here mentioned. So Theodoret by the ψαλτήριον (Psalmatikon) represents the holy apostles, who carried the name of the Lord before the gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel, &c. "Let us understand (saith he) the holy apostles, who carried the name of the Lord upon their backs, and the riches of that grace which God vouchsafed to men through them."

The particular parts of this chariot I have described as well as I could in our language; and inserted in my paraphrase another translation of the last word milhamoth; which signifies as well from or by, as for, "the daughters of Jerusalem." The most ingenious of which it is likely were employed in working that feast-day, which lay at the bottom of the chariot, with elegant figures, of shepherds and shepherdesses, perhaps, and all their innocent courtships. So that phrase may be interpreted, paved with love: but I have contented myself in the paraphrase to say only, with lovely figures.

Some think they find in this chariot an imitation of that sent wherein God himself sat between the cherubims; with which they have compared it: but I cannot be persuaded that Solomon would be so audacious.

[7] Ver. 11.] Nor do I see any foundation for the fancy of the Hebrew in Seder Olam Rubba, cap. 15 (which the Chaldee paraphrase touches upon), where they make Solomon to ride in a chariot the next day after the feast which he held seven days, for the consecration of the temple (1 Kings viii. 66). Which was the day of the gladness of his heart, indeed; but cannot be called his espousals. Which was not the day of his coronation neither; for then he did not ride in a chariot, but upon his father's mule: and was not crowned by his mother, but anointed by Zadoc the priest and Nathan the prophet (1 Kings i. 32, 34).

The day of his espousals] Therefore was the day when he took Pharaoh's daughter to wife: at which time, it was the manner to crown married persons: and his father being dead, it was done by his mother. Of this custom mention is made by many authors; which the learned reader may find in Bochart's Geographia Sacra, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 25, where he applies that passage in Ezekiel unto this (xvi. 8, 12). "When I looked upon thee, behold thy time was the time of love (i. e. thou wast fit for marriage), I entered into a covenant with thee, and thou becamest mine: and I put a jewel in thy forehead, &e. and a beautiful crown upon thy head." For the Mischana informs us, that this nuptial crown was in use among the Jews, as well as other nations.

All which I do not see how it is any other way applicable unto Christ, than I have expressed in the paraphrase. The church, indeed, herself may be said to be his crown and joy, in that sense wherein St. Paul snith the Thessalonians were his (1 Thess. ii. 19). But this is not to put a crown upon him; and the church can in no sense be called his mother, especially since she is his bride. And therefore herein interpreters strain too much; who ought, I think, to have ascribed that to God the Father in the mystical sense, which is ascribed unto Bath-sheba in the literal.

CHAPTER IV.

ARGUMENT.—The first seven verses of this chapter take to belong to the foregoing: and are the words of the bridegroom, who, praising the incomparable beauty of his spouse, and assuring her she should still appear more lovely and illustrious, concludes the third scene, as some call it, of this dramatic poem. And then begins a new representation at the eighth verse; which continues to the second verse of the fifth chapter, and composes the fourth part of this song. Wherein the bridegroom expresses his love to his spouse, his esteem of her, and joy in her, in words of greater dearness, and higher kindness, than have been hitherto used. Which she prays may be continued; and he graciously grants, inviting all to partake in their joys.

Bridegroom.

Ver. 1.] Great is thy beauty, O my beloved, admirable is thy beauty, worthy of men's contemplation. Whom I can liken to nothing better than to a pure and chaste virgin (2 Cor. xi. 2), whose modest eyes, fixed only upon him to whom she is espoused, sparkles within her locks, when she is unveiled: and who appears to want none of those comely ornaments, which are wont to set off the natural beauty of the face. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 2.] Part of whose grace lies in the sweetness of the mouth, full of white and even teeth: none of which stand out, or are longer than the rest, but all closely set both above and below in exact order and equality: being firm and sound also, without any breach, or want of so much as one of them. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 3.] To which add fine and delicate lips, of a bright and lily-like crimson colour: with a sweet and charming voice: and cheeks that appear of as pure a white and red, when the veil is off, as the blossoms of pomegranates. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 4.] And all this upon a goodly body, of a proper and tall stature, whose round and well-formed neck resembles that lofty structure of the tower of David, which may be a pattern of other neat and elegant buildings; and is not more adorned with the shields and bucklers of his worthies, which hang there in great abundance, than it is with pendants, and a necklace of pearl, and other jewels, which have been the treasure of mighty princes. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 5.] Below which the two breasts rise up, purely white, exactly round, of a just size and equal bigness: which put me in mind of two young kids, that being formed together, and brought forth at the same time, are so perfectly like, that none can know the one from the other; the tops of whose heads I have seen, at a distance, appear like the teats of these breasts, as they fed in the same field among the lilies. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 6.] Such as this is the beauty of my church, as will be seen more fully, when the night of persecution is gone, which hides it from the eyes of worldly men; and in the mean time, is most lovely in the light of peace; and no less precious than the mountain and the hill from whence are fetched the most excellent perfumes and the richest spices. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 7.] To say all in one word, thou, my love, art the perfection of beauty; there being a most admirable harmony between the several orders, estates, and degrees of men, in the church; and not the least spot or blemish (Eph. v. 27) to be found in its constitution. See Annot. [6].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 8.] And now that all the world may see I have espoused, may married, thee unto myself (Rev. xxi. 2), come from those horrid mountains whither thou hast fled for safety (ii. 11, 17), where, though I was present with thee, yet thou wast not free from danger, but exposed to the rage and cruelty of furious and troublesome men: come, I say, and dwell there no longer; but look down from thence, and behold the goodly heritage, and the pleasant state that I have prepared for thee. See Annot. [6].

Ver. 9.] Thou hast strongly engaged my affection; thou hast endeared thyself unto me, my tenderly-beloved spouse; thou hast entirely possessed thyself of my heart, by that lovely unity which I see between
CHAPTER IV.

11 Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb: honey and milk are under thy tongue: and the smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon.

12 A garden inclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed.

13 Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits: camphire, with spikenard, thy pastors, and between the people that live in holy obedience to them. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 10.] Thy love to me and my commandments, O how amiable is it! how doth it endure thee unto me, my beloved spouse! How much more delicious is that love, which thy members have one for another, and for all men, than the best entertainments the world can give! How much more grateful are the rest of thy virtues, than the odours of the richest spices, even of those that are burnt at the altar? See Annot. [8].

Ver. 14.] Nor are thy words less pleasing than thy deeds, the honey that drops of itself from the comb being not more sweet, sincere, and pure, than thy doctrine, O my beloved spouse: which is the delicious food of young and old, of weak and strong, and most powerfully recommended to their seductions by the famed holiness of thy life; which, like the strong perfumes that come from the aromatic plants of Libanus, fill all places with the delightful scent thereof. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 12.] For, as a garden well planted, watered, and defended, abounds with all sorts of flowers, and with variety of pleasant fruit, so doth my well-beloved spouse, by the singular care and special providence of God over her, with all the fruits of righteousness; admitting none to her mysteries but those who are pure and holy, and washed from all their defilements. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 13.] Which makes the several orders and ranks of thy young novices (such is the exemplary purity of their lives) look like the young sets of pomegranates, or other odoriferous fruits or pleasure, than that rare composition of graces which is visible in the church, makes her members acceptable unto God, and useful unto men. See Annot. [a].

Ver. 15.] Whose virtues are preserved in life and vigour by that heavenly doctrine, which flows from one as plentifully and perpetually as waters do from those springs that break out of the high mountain Libanus: which run continually in a large stream; and, supplying all the gardens in the neighbouring places, keep them fresh and flourishing. See Annot. [p].

Spouse.

Ver. 16.] O let not then the inspirations of the Holy Spirit, and its manifold gifts, be wanting unto me; but breathe perpetually upon me, as the north and the south winds do upon this garden; and then shall I be a paradise indeed; and not only fill the world with the sweet odour of the knowledge of Christ; but take the boldness to invite him, the beloved of my soul, to come and reap the delightful fruits (ver. 13) of his own care and labour. See Annot. [7].

14 Spikenard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices:

15 A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon.

16 Wake, O north wind; and come, thou south: blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits.

ANNOTATIONS.

[5] Ver. 1. Behold, thou art fair. The Lord of the church is here introduced, describing the beautiful estate of it, under the person of a lovely virgin: whose elegant features are particularly represented to raise admiration and love in others, and to give the church the comfort of being so amiable in his eyes, whom no beauty can please but that which is divine. And they are represented, by comparisons borrowed from the country; which was most suitable to a bucolic, or pastoral poem: as I have already said this is.

Thou host thorns' eyes. And, first, her eyes are compared to those of a dove (for such reasons as are suggested in the paraphrase) when they are unveiled, as those words wisheth liisamennach may be translated (of which see ver. 3); unto which I have had respect in my paraphrase as well as to our translation, where this phrase is rendered, within thy locks.

Thy hair, &c. Then the hair of this virgin's head is compared unto that of goats, as the next passage is to be translated, by repeating the word hair in this manner; "Thy hair is like the hair of a flock of goats." Thus the people of Israel are said to have brought forth from the tabernacle, "scarlet, and fine linen, and goats," that is, "goats' hair," as we truly translate it, Exod. xxxv. 23. And in the next chapter (ver. 13), he made "curtains of goats" (where we supply the word hair) for the tent over the tabernacle, according as he had been ordered (xxx. 4, xxxv. 7). Upon which passages Abarbanel observes, that in the Jewish calendar there was no mention of wool, either of lamb or sheep; because that was vile and contemptible in those countries, in comparison with the hair of goats, which was wont to be shorn, not only there, but in other places: for Aristotle observes the same of the goats of Cilicia. And some of them had a wool, as we may call it, so fine, that it was almost as soft as silk; and which was that was translated into cloth of gold, and the use of the tabernacle (Exod. xxxv. 26). To this sort of hair, perhaps, there may be an allusion in this place, in regard of its softness, as well as length and thickness; which is a great commendation of hair in men and women.

But there was a coarser or harder sort, with which they made locks and ornaments for the head, when they were bold, or would appear very fine: as Braunius hath observed, in his book about the priests' garments (lib. i. cap. 9).

And, in general, it may be observed of hair, that it was always accounted a very great ornament: which made Philostratus, in a letter of his to a youth whom he loved, beseech him by no means to cut it off, ζωονόμος, ανθισμα, και αφθονος, οης και μακρος χωριμα, "there being no less beauty in a good head of hair, than in gold, in silver, in pendants, and suchlike ornaments." Which he illustrates by what it contributes to the greatness of several other creatures, as the lion and horse, &c., and was notably expressed by Lycurgus, when he gave this reason why he ordered in his laws that his citizens should take care of the growth of their hair, because it made beautiful persons... more comely, and deformed more terrible; as Plutarch relates in his Apophthegms.

That appear from mount Gilgal.] Gilgal was a mountain fit for goats to browse on, as may be seen in Bochart: which shows these last words of this verse should be rendered: "that descend from mount Gilgal," to the higher parts, that is, of that mountain, or of that country.

I should have ventured to compare the apostles and prophets to these two eyes; who, being illuminated by the Holy Ghost (representing by a dove), and having no other aim, but sincerely to make Christ and his religion known in the world, the eyes of doves (see ii. 14): but I did not know to what the locks and the hair could be handsomely applied; and therefore, I have looked upon these, and the rest that follow, only as parts of those things that make up together a perfect beauty. Theodoret hath made the apos to application, that I can find, which is this: that hair signifies what is superfluous, the meaning may be (if there be any of every particular in this description), that "even in human things, and worldly affairs, wherewith we cannot but sometime perplexed, the church behaves herself laudably and preserves a decorum."

Ver. 2. Thy teeth are as a flock of sheep.] Here follows a description of the teeth: which are a great part of the beauty of the mouth, as that is of the face. And their beauty consists in their whiteness; in their evenness and just proportion; and in their closeness and firmness; so that there be none wanting, nor any gap between them. Which are all here expressed, and said to be like a flock of sheep come from the mountain and are well cared for, as equal as if they had been exactly polished and fitted for their places, in just proportion, by an artificer (so the word we translate "shorn" signifies); that they are below also answering to those above, as if they were twins: and none of them misshappy (so that which we translate "barren should be rendered), i. e. drops out of the mouth; which is as much as to say, there is a perfect number, as well as order of them.

Now the teeth being the instruments whereby we chew our meat, they may be looked upon as an apt emblem of the inferior pastors in the church: who prepare Christian doctrine for the people. Which application, though I have not adventured to make in much, I would not pass over without mentioning it is to mean no more, but only to set forth the loveliness of the church in general, by the figure of a virgin, of a most accomplished beauty, yet I shall here note, for the help of those whose thoughts lead them that way, that the virtues of such pastors are, "candour, purity, order, concord, exact agreement among themselves, one of them not seeking ambitiously to overtop the rest."

Ver. 3. Thy lips, &c.] In the beginning of this verse there is no great difficulty; it being certain that schani (the colour of the lips) signifies some very bright and resplendent colour, which strikes the eyes sharply (as it originally seems to import); viz. either scarlet, as we translate it, or erimôn, or purpure; such as the poets call coral lips. Whose fineness is here compared to a thread; and is another great part of beauty: as a sweet accent of the voice also is: nothing being more ungrateful than a tone that is coarse and clownsish.

In this verse I may apply these particularly to something in the church, the lips may be thought to signify the teachers in the church, who delivered the doctrine they had learned from the higher ministers; who had prepared it for them, and, by them, for the people. And the voice signifies their excellent manner of preaching: insinuating into the hearts of those that heard them, being accompanied with great modesty and humility, though full of authority and power. Unto which only the last clause of this verse can be applied; which is this: "Thy temples are like a piece of a pomegranate within the veil." Where two or three words puzzle interpreters. First, that which we translate temples; which are not reckoned as a part of the beauty of the face, especially being covered by the locks: and why they should be likened to a piece of a pomegranate, is hard to tell. But Grotius, therefore, by the temples understands the cheeks (which the Vulgar doth), which, in regard of their redness, are like to the grains of kernels within a pomegranate. So the Chaldean, indeed, interprets the other word, a piece of a pomegranate: when he thus glosses, "they are replenished" (viz. just and pious men, to whom he applies it) "with precepts, as a pomegranate;" i. e. as a pomegranate is with kernels or grains with which it abounds, and to which that interpreter, no doubt, hath respect.

But our learned Dr. Castell hath, out of the neighbouring languages, more clearly explained both these words, and the last also: and hath made them all easy and natural, by showing that the whole clause thus applied, doth mean, the "flower of the pomegranate, so are thy cheeks without a veil." So he translates the last words, which we met withal before (ver. 1) "nihonoth lesammetoch, not "within thy locks," but "without a veil." That is, when thy veil is laid aside, thy cheeks appear of a most lovely colour; for such is that of the pomegranate flower; the purpest white and red, most exactly mixed (Orat. 5, in Schola Theolog, p. 37).

Ver. 4. Thy neck is like, &c.] The neck, being compared to the tower of that goodly fortress which David made upon mount Zion, which overtopped all the rest of the buildings of the city of Jerusalem, distant among other things, the tallness of the whole body.

Built for an armoury.] This tower is said to be built letalpispith (for an armoury we render it), which the LXX. know not what to make of, and therefore retain the Hebrew word: and others do but guess at its meaning; having no certain rule from whence to fetch its original. Aquila translates it fortifications: but Syriac has translated it, the "flower of the pomegranate," and the LXX. have followed, adding another signification also derived from alph, to teach, or instruct.

Thousand bucklers.] This tower, it seems, was adorned with the shields and bucklers of those mighty men mentioned 1 Sam. xxiii. and suehlike worthies: with which Grotius ingeniously compares those precious stones which are wont to be the ornament of the neck. But what answers to this in the body of the church I know not; unless we admit the opinion of R. Solomon, and others of that nation, who will have this to be the place where the Sanhedrin had a room, called in their language likath zagzallath, "the chamber or parlour of square stones" (which some interpreters have thought to be the meaning of beth letalpispith, with square stones), where judgment was administered, and their discipline preserved; which was the strength and support of the nation, as the general council of the apostles and elders, mentioned Acts xxv, was of the Christian church: who settled all doubts and controversies, as future sacrifices were maintained in the church in order and peace. From which Theodoret doth not much differ, when he saith the church hath many shields, whereby it is defended. "For thou art armed with all the weapons of the Spirit (saith he, paraphrasing upon these words), whereby then easily woundest.
thy enemies, &c., and sometimes doth repel them by the prophets, sometimes by the apostles; and layest open their weakness."

"[7] Ver. 7. Thou art all fair, &c.] And here, to comprehend all that could be said, he enlarges the commendation which he began withal (ver. 1), and concludes in these words, that there was no defect in any part; but altogether they made up a complete beauty without the least speck of deformity. Which is not to be applied to every particular person in the church; but, as I have taken it in the paraphrase, to the admirable constitution of the whole, in which there was no imperfection.

[8] Ver. 8. O lead me from Lebanon, &c.] Here now begins a new representation; as appears by this, that the style wherein the bridegroom speaks is altered; she who hitherto hath been called his love or friend, being now called his spouse, and never before; though very frequently in the following part of the song. Which hath moved interpreters, I suppose, to use this name throughout, rather than the other: as the higher and most excellent title.

Theodoret, therefore, here begins his third book very judiciously: and we may look upon this as a description of the church, coming out of the state of persecution: and receiving greater testimonies of her Saviour's love than ever. For coming from the top of the highest hill, of high mountains, and full of sweet spices, where leopards inhabited, cannot well signify any thing else than coming from places where they were in danger to be devoured by their persecutors, who are compared to lions in many places of scripture.

As for the mountains themselves, they are well known where they were. Only Amasa some have merchandised to be that mountain in Cilicia called Amasaus, which is reckoned among the highest; and joined by 1 Elian with Libanus and Carmel. We read also that there were tigers and panthers, &c. in this mountain; which hath been brought to countenance this opinion. But Judea and the neighbouring places being the scene of this poem, we are not to go so far off as Cilicia to seek for Amasa: for, as Shemir and Hermon were but parts of the same mountains; so Amasa was a part of Libanus, as Bocchartus hath observed in his Canaan (lib. i. cap. 5). And though the lower parts of this mountain Libanus were very pleasant, yet the top of it, which is here spoken of, was horrid, and inhabited with wild beasts. From whence the beholders are desired to proceed from lightful and secure places: for she is compared precisely after to a garden or paradise (ver. 12, 13, &c.). And it is no wonder Solomon should have the state of the Christian church in trouble thus represented to him; it being very suitable to the state of the church of the Jews, when it was first formed; being then pressed by Pharaoh, and many other enemies afterward, before they came to Canaan.
and gentiles; and then one eye must signify one glance, one look, of the eyes: but nothing pleases me better than the old interpretation of Alcinous, who says that, when the soul or the mind, and by the eyes (as ver. 1), the pastors and guides of the church: and by the one wreath of hair about the neck, the pious unity of the people subject unto them.

It may be interpreted also, "the least glance I have of thee and of thy beauty mightily engages my love to thee," for the eyes are the very seat of love, as abundance of authors express it.

[6] Ver. 10. How fair is thy love.] The love, or rather loves (as it is in Hebrew), which is here ex-tolled, may signify our love to God, and unto one another. And ointments be applied to all the graces which flow from hence.

[7] Ver. 11. Thy lips distil, &c.] That which dis-tils from the lips, as honey from the comb, can be nothing but pure and most delicious doctrine; delivered in such a manner as to invite all to taste of it. For this by all sorts of authors is compared to honey; and made Xenophon be called the Alcian, and Sappho the Pianor bee because of the sweetness of honey and bee, while the word is here applied to the sequence of Plato is said to have been predicted by bees, which came and sat in his mouth when he was an infant: which is reported also, by no mean authors, of Pindar, Lucan, and St. Ambrose.

Honey and milk are under thy tongue.] This signi-fies the same thing; for these were anciently the food of infants: and may denote that the church hath instruction for all sorts. So wide from the truth is the exposition of the doctors in Maimonides (Porta Mosis, p. 83), that this milk and honey being said to lie under the tongue, signifies the concealment of such truths as are very sweet, till men be fit to receive them.

The smell of thy garments.] Garments wherewith we are clothed, signify, in the New Testament, our whole conversation; and their perfume therefore denotes not only the excellency of the Christian life; but its being known also everywhere.

Like the smell of Lebanon.] From the trees in the forest of Lebanon came many sweet spices; particular-ly the cedars,柏木 or cedras, which have the name of Lebanon; though others think rather from laban, white, because of the snow that lay perpetually upon the top of this mountain.

Like the smell of Lebanon.] In the forest about this mountain Lebanon, Solomon built himself a house; which we find described, 1 Kings vii. 2, &c. unto which, no doubt, there belonged a garden, with springs, and fountains, or receptacles of water; and all sorts of trees, and plants, and flowers, that might make it delightful. Unto which, I conceive, he hath respect in this and the following verses.

I know that very good authors think he here des-cribes a perfect virgin, "like a garden newly enc-losed." And this is well saved by some doctors, who apply this to the care of the church, to preserve herself pure and undefiled, &c. But it is more agreable to what goes before, and follows after, to expound it as Theodoret doth of the church bringing forth not only the fruits of godli-ness and virtue, but all sorts and variety of fruit; like an excellent garden: and therefore guarded by the singular care and providence of her Lord and owner, from tyrants and heretics; who, like wild beasts or thieves, would destroy or delfower her.

A spring shut up, &c.] The same meaning hath a spring shut up and a fountain sealed; that the waters may be preserved from dirt and filth: which cannot be thrown or fall into them, to trouble them, and make them muddy, when they are so secured; but they flow purely. And, indeed, in the prophetical language, the nourishing garden, which, after it hath been in affliction, is set forth by the plant-ing of a wilderness, with all sorts of the best trees; and by making fountains break forth, and waters flow therein (Isa. xli. 18, 19, li. 2).

The LXX. (according to the Vatican copy, and that which Theodoret follows) and the Vulgar Latin, take the second comparison here to be the same with the first; reading it thus, "A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse, a garden enclosed," &c. (just like ver. 9, 11), reading, it seems, in the Hebrew, gan, "a garden," where we now read, gin, "a spring." But this doth not at all alter the sense, and therefore need not trouble the reader.

It is possible that in the last words of the verse, a fountain sealed, there may be a description of the Christian font, or baptism: to which none were admitted, but such as sincerely renounced all wicked-ness; resolving and promising to lead a holy life. Which sense Theodoret may be thought to have ex-pressed, when he saith, the church is compared to a fountain sealed, in order to live accurately, or purify, "as not lying exposed to all comers, but only to those who are worthy." Though his next words seem to confine this passage to the mysteries, in the other sacrament of Christ's body and blood; which they only that are already initiated in the Christian church can partake of; and not after their initiation shall again in live, but live accurately, or purify themselves by repentance, if they fall into any sin.

St. Cyprian makes use of this verse, to prove the unity of the church, not only in this book upon that subject, but in several of his epistles; saying, "If the church be a garden enclosed, and a fountain sealed; how can any man enter into that garden, or drink of that fountain, who is not in the church," &c. (Epist. 69. 74, 75, edit. Oxon.)

Cotovius, in his Itinerary, says, that there is a fountain three miles from Beth-lehem southward, called by this name of fountain sealed; to which he went, and was told, that water still runs from thence in pipes to the place where Solomon's temple stood. But he does not think that, as his intimates, that herein he follows an uncertain report.

[n] Ver. 13. Thy plants, &c.] By these schelakim, young plants, or shoots and scions (as the word signifies), we may well understand those whom the apostle calls ρύπτοις, who had newly received Chris-tianity; and are here represented as a goodly nursery of pomegranates. A fruit in that country very deli-cious, and no less useful many ways: for it was of a grateful smell, and had a wavy juice, very refreshing; and therefore much desired in those hot places. Theodoret also thinks that hereby is set forth the great variety of Christians in the church; or, as his words are, "the many orders of Christians that shall be saved." as on other orders of virgins; an-other of virgins: another of widows: another of married people: as there are also rich and poor, masters and servants, &c. who all have their several places and stations in one and the same church; as the grains of the pomegranates lie in their several cells, and distinct choas (as they may be called), and yet are all contained in the same shell, and all compose one body.

Campshire.] Of ophel, which we translate "empli-m:" see ch. i. 14, where it is joined with nard, as it is here. Of which (i. e. nard) there were several kinds; and therefore a word of the plural number is here used; as a word of the singular in the beginning of the next verse; which we in English express by the same word spicier in both places.
are the same thing; as Bochart has observed in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 18. Where he shows that beer, which we translate pil or well, signifies a fountain, as much as censer. Libanus abounds with such springs (as all great mountains do), and particularly there is at the foot of it an excellent spring, which grows presently into a river, that waters the whole plain between that and Tripolis, with a good stream, where-by the vineyards, olive-yards, fig-yards, and gardens, which there were very numerous, were all supplied. Unto which Theodoret compares the evangelical doctrine (according to that of our blessed Savour's, John iv. 10, 11), only he adds also the law; making fountain and well in this verse two distinct things; and by the latter imagining the law to be denounced, because things lay there deep and secret, as in a pil.

[7] Ver. 16. Awake, O north wind, &c.] The same great person thinks the north wind is here commanded to arise, merely that it might be gone (as being pernicious to fruit) and give place to the south wind, which is only invited to come and blow upon the garden, with its soft, gentle, and benign breath. But most interpreters take it otherways; and some imagine that these two, being the most vehement winds in those countries, are called upon to blow; that by their strong shaking of the aromatic plants, they might make them send forth their odours the more plentifully. But it seems more reasonable to think, that these two winds were most profitable in their turns, for these two purposes. First, the north wind was useful to close the pores of the trees, and shut up their effluviums; that they might not spend themselves too much, and he exhausted by perpetual evaporation; and then the south wind coming in due season, opened and relaxed them again: making the aromatic gums drop freely, and the sweet odours fly more actively.

And if this garden, to which Solomon here alludes, had the same situation which the maps and charts give to that at Jerusalem (which they place on the east side of the city, having the wall on the west), these two winds here mentioned were those which alone were desirable. The east being biting and blasting, not only in Egypt (Gen. xli. 6), but in Judæa also (Ezek. xix. 12), and in Assyria (Jonah iv. 8); and therefore they defended their fruits against it, that they might not be exposed to it.

Let my beloved come, &c.] There is no doubt that this conclusion of the chapter is the voice of the spouse, praying her beloved to favour and prosper her own plantation, for his sake as well as for hers, that he might not lose what he himself had designed, and so happily began and settled in such beautiful order; but take the pleasure of seeing it grow to perfection.

CHAPTER V.

1 I AM come into my garden, my sister, my spouse: I have gathered my myrrh with my spice: I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey; I have drunk my wine with my milk: eat, best minds sometimes are, and how insensible of God's providence and the exposure is introduced (ver. 2, 3) as in a slumber, and not so readily, as formerly, to comply with his gracious motions. At which the bridge-room takes not such distaste, as to leave her in that dulness; but awakes her out of it, to such a lively sense of her negligence, that she applies herself to seek his favour with greater earnestness than ever (ver. 4—6). The sense of which,
O friends: drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved.

2 If I sleep, but my heart wakeeth: it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled: for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.

3 I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?

4 My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him.

5 I rose up to open to my beloved; and my hands dropt with myrrh, and my fingers with sweet smelling myrrh, upon the handles of the lock.

6 I opened to my beloved; but my beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone: my soul failed when he spake: I sought him, but I could not find him; I called him, but he gave me no answer.

7 The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me.

8 I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, if ye find my beloved, that ye tell him, that I am sick of love.

9 ¶ What is thy beloved more than another beloved, O thou fairest among women? what is thy beloved more than another beloved, that thou dost so charge us?

though she could not presently recover (ver. 6—8), she expressed the greatest passion for him, and the highest admiration of him: in a rare description which she makes (ver. 10, to the end of the chapter) of his beauteous excellencies and perfections.

Bridegroom.

Ver. 1.] I am well pleased to see the fruitfulness of my garden, and therefore have not denied thy request, my tenderly beloved spouse; but am present in it, and have brought it to such perfection, that it hath produced many excellent persons more precious than myrrh, and all the spices before named: with whose service I am not only well pleased, but rejoice in the purity of their doctrine, and of their lives; inviting all that bear any love to me, both in heaven and in earth, to rejoice and to be exceeding glad together with me. See Ann. [c].

Sparrow.

Ver. 2.] I heard these gracious words, though I was not perfectly awake, and knew it was his voice, and not the voice of a stranger (John x. 5), which called upon me, and that with importunity (Rev. iii. 20), saying, Give me free admission into thy best affections; why dost thou deny, who art so very dear to me, so entirely beloved by me, who hast consented to love me above all things, and to keep thyself holy and undefiled by loving me alone: which I have long desired; and taken much pains, and endured great hardships, to win thy love. See Ann. [b].

Ver. 3.] But so stupidly dull and drowsy was I at this time, that I did not answer his kindness, as it deserved: but made unmanly excuses, and desired I might not be disturbed, now that I was taking my repose, and could not without difficulty leave my bed, and my beloved rest; the sweetness of which I had begun to taste. See Ann. [c].

Ver. 4.] And yet such is the kindness of him who is worthy of all love, he did not presently leave me to myself, but first raised me out of my slumber, by letting me know he was not well pleased with me; and making me sensible of the danger of such delays; which put me in such a commotion, that I was in great anguish of mind, and even quivered and shaked with fear, and grief, and sorrow. See Ann. [d].

Ver. 5.] Whereby I was not quite dejected; but only excited to shake off my sloth, and to make the more haste to acknowledge his goodness, and embrace his gracious motions to me; unto which I applied myself with zealous endeavours, resolving to entertain him with the most ardent love, and with the highest expressions of my esteem of him and of his favour. See Ann. [c].

Ver. 6.] But, though I thus repented of my negligence, yet see the lamentable effects thereof; for when I had thus disposed my heart, and set it wide open to receive his commands, my beloved had withdrawn his gracious presence, and was gone quite away out of my sight: which made me even sink down and die with fear, that I should not recover him again: especially as he was called to mind those many words of grace, wherewith he made his addresses to me; calling me (ver. 2) his sister, his love, his dove, his unde-filed: with which I was now affected too late; for I sought him diligently, but could not find him; I besought and entreated him to return, but received no answer from him. See Ann. [f].

Ver. 7.] This, though it was very bitter to me, yet did not utterly discourage me, but still I continued to seek him everywhere, as I had done heretofore (iii. 3), but they who formerly instructed me, and directed me unto him, now fell upon me with grievous reproofs, nay, reproaches for my fault; which cut me to the very heart: nay, they whose office it was to preserve the city of God in peace and safety, exposed me to open shame, and the foulest disgrace. See Ann.

Ver. 8.] So I turned myself to those of my neighbours and familiar acquaintance, who were awakened by my cries to come and see what the matter was; and conjured them, as they would answer it to God, and to those that knew me, that they would let him know—what shall I say? what shall I desire you to tell him? but that I do not enjoy myself, now that I want his company: nor can be well, till I recover his love again. See Ann. [k].

Ver. 9.] And some of them had so much compassion upon me, as to interest themselves so far in my sorrows, as to inquire into the cause of them: and how they might be assistant unto me in their cure; for they asked me, Wherein doth thy beloved excel other excellent persons? he is very lovely, no doubt, because beloved of thee, who art the most amiable of all other women; but what is his pre-eminence, wherein do those, who are worthy of the greatest love, fall short of him? that thou art thus solicitous about him, and layest such a severe charge upon us, to assist thee in thy search of him? See Ann. [f].

Ver. 10.] To whom I replied, My beloved is that great son of David, of whom you have heard: who is of a princely form, having admirable beauty and sweetness, mixed with equal majesty and brightness; dazzling the eyes of those that behold him; chosen by God to do the greatest things; and bring all nations into his obedience. See Ann. [k].

Ver. 11.] And therefore wears a crown of pure-gold upon his head: from whence his curled locks hang down upon his brow; which are of such a shining black that they add an excellent grace and great-ness to his royal beauty. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 12.] His eyes are sparkling, and yet mild; like those of milk-white doves, when they are highly del-ighted, as they sit by the river's side, or other places where there is abundance of water. See Annot. [8a].

Ver. 13.] The lovely dawn also upon his cheeks is no less grateful; rising there like spices when they first appear out of their beds; or like the young buds of aromatic flowers in the paradise before described; where the purple lilies are not more beautiful than his lips. From hence flow words more precious and more pleasant than the richest and most fragrant myrrh. See Annot. [8].

Ver. 14.] And as he hath the majesty of a prince, so he hath the compassion of a priest: and therefore clothed with such a vest as the high-priest wears when he ministers before God, and is adorned with the ephod unto which the breastplate with all its precious gems is constantly annexed. See Annot. [9].

Ver. 15.] His thighs also are covered with fine linen, which makes them look like pillars of the whitest marble; over which the holy robe is thrown, with golden belts at the bottom of them; all which are so contrived for beauty and glory, that his aspect, when he appears in these flowered vestments, is no less stately and great than the forest of Lebanon; whose goodly cedars do not more excel all other trees than he doth all other men. See Annot. [7].

Ver. 16.] So you would say, as well as I, if you did but hear him speak, or if he did but breathe approbation and say all in one word, there is nothing wanting to make him the desire of all nations; nor any thing in him but what is desirable; and there-fore do not wonder, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, that I am thus concerned about him, and restess till I find him; for this is the true portraiture of my be-loved, this is the character of him who, by owning me for such, gives me leave to call him my friend. See Annot. [4].

ANNOTATIONS.

[8] Ver. 1.] Unto that invitation which is made by the spouse in the latter end of the foregoing chapter, the bridegroom here gives an answer: and testi-fies his acceptance, by coming to taste the fruit of his grace, not to stay all in one word, but to make a feast in it: of which he calls his friends and companions, after the manner of those countries, to be partakers. His receiving fruit from his garden is expressed in these words, "I have gathered my myrrh," with the rest of the spices men-tioned in the former chapter. Then follows the feast (which they always made when they gathered the fruits of the earth). In these words, "I have eaten my honey-cob with my honey," &c. Which is put instead of all other things, because it was one of the greatest entertainments of those countries. As ap-pears from hence, that it was among the presents sent to Joseph when viceroy of Egypt (Gen. xlii. 11.), and brought to David by the great men of the coun-try, as part of his provision, while he dwelt among them in his banishment (2 Sam. vii. 29), and is men-tioned also by Homer as the entertainment which Hecamede gave Nestor and Patroclus; before whom she set green, or fresh, honey.

And as that comprehends all royal dainties that were to be eaten, so see and milk all the liquors at the feast, whereby is represented the joy he took in the fruit of his garden. In which joy he would have all good men, and angels themselves (Luke xv. 7, 10), to participate in the highest measure; that their joy, as our Lord speaks, might be full. For that is the meaning of "Drink, yea, drink abundantly, O be-loved." I have not adventured to be very particular in spec-i-fying the things to which those expressions may be applied; but have only mentioned the evangelical doc-trine, and the good works of Christians. If by myrrh and spices, any special thing he designed, I should think it is the martyrs; who offered up them-selves most acceptable sacrifices unto Christ, and made greater joy in heaven than the mere repentance of a sinner could do. And the joy that Christ took in such victorious souls as laid down their lives for him, may, did but heartily entertain his doctrine, is expressed by their feasting with him, Rev. iii. 20.

The last words, "Eat, O friends, drink," &c. may soberly be applied to the eucharist: where we feast with Christ on his sacrifice, and he feasts with us, beholding our love to him, and one to another.

[6] Ver. 2.] Here now begins a new scene or part of this pastoral Song; wherein Solomon represents himself as having lost that clear sight of the Messiah which he had in the Foregoing vision, ver. 11. (for they could not always keep up their minds to such a pitch of contemplation). But falling into a trance, thought he heard his voice (though he saw not his person) speaking to his spouse. Whom Solomon con-ceives to be in the same condition wherein he then was himself; and to hear those words spoken (ver. 1), between sleeping and waking. So the first words of this verse signify, "I sleep, but my heart wakest: the same with those of Balaam, Num. xxiv. 1, "falling (asleep) but having my eyes open." In which condition the Greeks describe their Saturi; of whom they say, κωναίνετα ὁπλαται καὶ τραγοῦδαν ἑκατόμα, "sleeping he saw, and waking he slept."

She had therefore before him, or in sight of, the sense of his kindness to her, and presence with her, which awakens her to attend more lively to his love: which he was desirous more fully to discover; and therefore calls upon her by more names of endearment than ever. For here are four put together, the following rising still higher than the foregoing. And he represents (after the manner of lovers) what he had suffered to gain her affection; which seems to me to be the meaning of the last words, "My head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night." Where-in he is represented as a beautiful Nazarite, having bushy hair, and many locks (as Samson had), who having travelled all night to visit her, was thereby very wet. For there were two sorts of dew; the "mor-ning dew," which was soon gone (Hosea xiii. 3), and that "dew which fell in the night," and lay long, and wet those who were in it very much: whereby it signifies in scripture, hardships and great afflictions (Dan. iv. 35).

These are those indeed who, by dew, understand the evangelical doctrine, by which innumerable souls were begetten unto Christ, as David prophesied (Ps. cx. 3). But this is not agreeable to what follows; and their reason for this exposition is not true, that dew is always taken in a good sense, for I have shown the contrary; and the dropping of the prophets (a metaphor taken from dew) is their prophesying against a place, and threatening judgments to come upon it (Ezek. xxi. 2. Amos vi. 16), which makes me think that Solomon here rather alludes to the last verse of the hundred and tenth Psalm (if he had that Psalm in his eye), which predicts the troubles and afflictions of the Messiah, "by drinking of the brook in the way." If this exposition of this difficult verse be not allowed, it may be supposed that the Messiah is here represented as coming in the person and condition of a poor man, to beg entertainment, and having not anywhere to lay his head (as our Lord speaks), was thereby exposed to the cold air, &c. Which will make him apt to have a concern one of the things to the church: shewing also the danger of neglecting it.

[c] Ver. 3.] And then this verse agrees perfectly with what we read in the parable, Luke xi. 7. Where the good man of the house was unwilling to be troubled; even by his friend, that came to beg his assistance, when he was going to compose himself to rest. But I take it to be a description of the dulness, which is sometimes apt to creep upon the most excellent minds; who in some tempers are so listless, as not to be much affected with the best motions that are made to them. Of which infirmity Solomon, having had many examples in the history of his own nation, might well conceive the spouse herself to be backward to entertain that grace which was offered to her. There are no difficulties in the words; which signify plainly, that she, having composed herself to rest, and being half asleep, was unwilling to be disturbed. For going into bed she had put off her clothes, and washed her feet, as the manner was, that fifth, when she went to bed (as her hands, or hands of the wearing sandals only, not shoes as we do), might foul the sheets; and it would have been a trouble to do all this over again; which is the meaning of the last words, "How shall I defile them?" i.e. I cannot easily persuade myself to it.

I shall only, therefore, set down the pious note of Theodoret upon these words: "Let us learn from hence, what mischief sloth and laziness do, and in what troubles and pains they engage us. For the spouse here excusing herself, and not being willing presently to rise to the bridgeway, is compelled a little while after, not only to rise and run down to the door, but to run through the city, and wander about the streets, and fall among the watchmen, and by them to be wounded; and after all could scarce find her beloved: to whom, if she had presently hearkened, and obeyed his heavenly call, she had avoided all these inconveniences."

There are those, not only among us, but also in the Roman church, who apply all this laziness to the state of the church in these last times. For which I see no warrant; but think we may rather apply it to those churches, who, presently after our Saviour's departure to heaven, left their first love, and grew cold, as we read in the second and third chapters of the Revelation. For it seems probable, by the sixth chapter of the book in the beginning of it, that here he speaks of particular societies, not of the whole body of the church.

[d] Ver. 4.] Ye much is the infinite goodness of the divine Saviour, he immediately represents the Messiah as not provoked, by this neglect, wholly to cast off his spouse; but rather stretching forth his hand to awaken her out of this security. For so it follows, "He put in his hand by the hole;" i.e. at the window, or casement; as if he would draw her out of her bed: or, as it may be interpreted, in a threatening manner, to punish her for her sloth. For so "putting forth the hand" signifies, to do some execution, 1 Sam. xxvi. 9, 11, 23. Which agrees with what follows, that presently she was mightily moved thereby, and more than awakened, being full of solicitude, and fear, and grief, and trouble. Which shows, indeed, that she did have eyes, but only to play him; and yet he took this so ill as to put her: great fear of some danger from it (as our Saviour doth in his letters to the churches, Rev. ii. 16, 16, 22, 23, &c.). For the wordбега, signifies the affections and passions; and the Hebrew wordヘニ, which we translate was moved, signifies made a noise or was tumultuos. Therefore do we by these words inform of trouble and grief, and of fear also; nay, of great fear and perplexity. For so St. Jerome here renders it, my belly trembled; as he doth in Ezek. vii. 16, where it is applied to doves (to whom the spouse was here compared, ver. 2), and we translate it mourning; but it should be rather trembling like doves. For that is the manner of doves, when observing them to be exceeding timorous; and therefore so it may be translated here, I was so full of trouble, that I quivered like a dove."

Others by "putting forth the hand," understand the touches he gives by his Holy Spirit; which doth not contradict what I have said; threatenings being employed by him for that purpose."
CHAPTER V.

[203] CHAPTER V.

[2] Ver. 6. But notwithstanding her repentance, she was thus far punished for her sloth, that her beloved shept him from her, for a time: and she could not hear the least tidings from him, or notice of him. Which cast her into such an excess of grief and fear, that she swooned away, and was like a dead body; (so that phrase, my soul went forth, signifies to die, Gen. xxxvi. 18, xlii. 28, and other places). And recovering herself again was extremely troubled, by the reflections she made upon his kindness, and by her insensibility of it. For which she asked his pardon, and sought his favour; but could receive no tokens of it.

[2] Ver. 7. I take "watchmen" here in a good sense, as before, i.ii. 3, unto which I refer the reader. And only observe, that to find a person, signifies sometimes, in scripture phrase, as much as to fall upon him, as we speak: and that on a sudden, Judg. i. 5, Ps. xxi. 8, exix. 113, Isa. x. 10. And so I have expanded it here; and refuted the smiting and wounding her, to the reproaches they cast upon her. For there is a smiting with the tongue, as well as with the hand that not only by enemies unjustly (Jer. xviii. 18), but by friends of love and charity (Ps. exil. 5). For there is not a greater kindness, than sometimes even to upbraid us with our faults. Which is farther expressed by taking away her veil from her; as much as to say, exposing her to shame: a veil being thrown over women's faces for modesty's sake, as well as a token of subjection (Gen. xx. 16). And so St. Jerome, in his epistle to Launa, says of the veil or pallium, as he calls it, to be pudicitiae signum, a sign of chastity: and therefore to take it away, was to represent her as an impudent, whorish woman. Greg. Nyssen adds that it was περιθήκων νυμφῶν (Hom. xii. upon this book), the nuptial veil; which, together with the face, covered the whole body: and therefore to be disrobed of it was the greater reproach; because it was to disown her to be his spouse, as she professed herself.

[8] Ver. 8. This verse is very plain, expressing the admirable temper of a true penitent: who leaves nothing unattempted to recover the favour of her Lord (of whom all the comfort from the watchmen, who explore the help of all good people), and yet doth not complain of what she suffered, nor of the harshness of those, who should have helped to restore her, and not dealt so severely with her (according to that of the apostle, Gal. vi. 1): but only bewails the loss of his presence, and represents that, notwithstanding, she had not lost her love to him: but rather that it was so great, she could not live without him. It must be confessed, that there is no necessity of reading those words which we translate, "that ye tell him," by an interrogation, "what will you tell him?" as the Hebrew seems to import (for the particle māth doth not always denote that); but it adds much to the life of the speech, and represents her passionning the height, if we so translate it; as I have taken it in the paraphrase.

[7] Ver. 9. In this verse the daughters of Jerusalem reply to her; and being touched with a pitiful concern for her (whose admirable beauty discovered itself to them, in this wretched condition wherein they saw her), they desire to have a character of her beloved; that they might be the better able to know him if they met him, and be the more excited to help her to seek for him, when they understood his deserts.

[7] Ver. 10. In this part of the character, which follows of him, Solomon seems to me to have had his eye upon the person of his father David (1 Sam. xvi. 12), whose very aspect promised much, and showed that he was born to rule. And whether we translate the first words, "white and ruddy," as in our Bible; or as Bochartus, "white and shining, or glittering," (making adam not to signify ruber, but rutilus, and the whole to be as much as summe conditus, exceeding fair and of a pure complexion), it matters not. For it only signifies, in my opinion, the majestic beauty of his aspect: which David himself had also described in those famous words (Ps. xlv. 2), "Then art fairer than the children of men." And then, in the latter part of this verse, he hath respect, as I take it, both to what they sang of his father David, after he came from his victory over Goliath (1 Sam. viii. 7), and to what David himself sang of this great prince in Ps. xlv. 3, 4, &c. and more largely, Ps. ex. 2, 3, 5, 6, which all relate to the conquest of the world unto him: and is signified in his expression of his being chief (or lifting up the standard) over ten thousands; that is, over great multitudes, or armies (Ps. iii. 6). The LXX. translate it, "Chosen out of ten chosen:" unto which I have had respect also in this paraphrase. As for mystical significations, some think by white and ruddy, is meant his divine and human nature; others, only his human nature; others, the whole of his person. For I have not dared to meddle with them. And shall but just mention the fancy of the cabalists, who understand hereby the effects he works in us. For sometimes he dispenceth himself in mercy and kindness; and then say they, he is white; sometimes in the zeal of justice, and with anger; and then he is red.

[7] Ver. 11. Now being thus represented as a king, he is next described as having a crown upon his head. So I understand cethem (which we translate gold), as Rashi doth; who takes it for a diadem: and, indeed, in other places of scripture it signifies some precious ornament, as Prov. xxv. 12. Now this crown upon the head is said to be such a one as David had mentioned before (Ps. xxi. 3), of pure gold. In the Hebrew of Pore, which Bochartus (both in his Phaleg, lib. ii. cap. 27, and in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 46) shows was the island anciently called Taphrobana; in which the footsteps of this word Pore remained in Ptolemy's description of the great island in the river Phasis, and the ereek or bay Pasis. The same excellent person, in his book of sacred animals (par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 10), shows that, in the latter part of this verse, we are to understand by kethoth (locks) the foretop, or the hair coming down the forehead; which is expressed in the next word, tabalim, "hanging down." And this foretop is only mentioned, because little else appeared, when the head had the crown on it.

This hair is said to be as black as a reed: because such shining black hair was accounted majestic, and much affected in those countries: insomuch, that they endeavoured by art to make their hair of this colour: and, as Pliny testifieth, they burnt the blood, and the brain, of ravens for that purpose. They looked upon this coloured hair also as a token of courage and fortitude; and, with a pure clear complexion, it is very lovely.

There are several mystical applications made of this: which I had rather the reader, who hath a mind to them, should seek in others, than find here.

[n] Ver. 12. The plainest meaning of this verse, is that of the LXX. and Vulgar Latin; which is to the same effect with what I have set down in the paraphrase. For washed and sitiling do not refer to the eyes, but unto doxes: who love to sit, nay, to cry (as the word implies), by reasons of others and other places which abound with water; and are then so pleased, that their eyes appear very quick and lively. And such piercing eyes, adding much to majesty, they are here made a part of this glorious person's character.

Washed with milk.] Signifies does as white as milk; which are most lovely; and when they have washed themselves, look as if they had been in milk, and came forth as such.

As for the common sense which the Hebrews give of this verse, and which most interpreters follow; Bochartus, in the beginning of his second part of Sacred Animals, seems to me to have evinced, that the Hebrew words will not be taken. But it is fit to mention it, and it amounts to this; that his eyes were clear and white, and full set (or set in perfection, as Aben Ezra here interprets the word millich), like a diamond or precious stone in a ring: neither too much depressed, nor too prominent; but handsomely filling the sockets. And if this were the natural interpretation of the last phrase, jobscob th cil mich, "sitting or dwelling by fulness or filling;" I should think these words refer to the precious stones in the pectoral of the high-priest, which are said to be set in their fillings, Exod. xviii. 17, 20. But this phrase doth not refer, as I said, to eyes, but to doves, that sit by places abounding with water; or, as Averarius will have it, ad vas placum hacet, "by a vessel full of milk.

The mystical application of these eyes to the doctors of the church, seems improbable; because they are described before in the eyes of the sponse (iv. 1). Rather, therefore, his exact care and providence over the church, which nothing can escape, may be hereby represented: for he sees into the very heart and reins, as he himself affirms, Rev. iii. 18, 22. And this was the idea of Solomon when he was made a kind of high-priest to the Hebrews; and it was a hard matter to give an account of it. The plainest seems to be this: that by cheeks we are not to understand those that are smooth, but wherein the hair begins to grow; which added much, in those days, to the goodness of any man, and was looked upon as a token of vigour, strength, and courage. And it may apply be compared to the flowers, or the sproutings and budtings of plants and trees. So I understand mizdoloth (which we translate flowers) to signify buds putting forth like little towers.

The lips may seem unfitly compared to lilies: because white lips are not beautiful. But Almonazar hath carried out of Dioscorides, Theophrastus, and Pliny, that there were lilies of gold. And besides, I find in Pliny (lib. xxii. cap. 5) mention made of a lily (which he calls rubens lilium), which was much esteemed, he saith, in Syria. He shows there also a way how to make purple lilies.

There are those who think Solomon compares the lips to lilies, only in regard of their fineness and delicate softness; thick, blubber lips, being very unhandsome, and a sign also, they say, of dulness and making the speech less graceful. And, indeed, eloquence is sometimes described by lilies; and may be here meant.

Concerning "sweet-smelling myrrh," see ver. 5.

And thus far we have only the description of an amiable, gracious majesty; which is much advanced by a sweet voice and eloquent speech. The mention of which may well put us in mind of what is said of our Saviour, Luke iv. 22, compared with Ps. xiv. 2.

[0] ver. 11.] If we understand the first part of this word to mean of the hands, it is thus to be interpreted, "He hath golden rings on his fingers (as before he is said, ver. 11, to have a golden head, i. e. a crown of gold upon it), set with the chrysolite;" as taris (which the LXX. here do not translate), it is most probable, signifies. And then the latter part of the verse sounds thus, word for word: "his belly is of polished ivory, covered with sapphire:" i. e. is purely white, streaked with blue veins. But who sees not that, though this be ingenious, yet it is not true! For the body is nowhere covered (as the word here is) with veins: which must needs signify more than streaked here and there. And, besides, it is not only against the rules of decency, but against the very scope of this discourse, to fancy that any of those naked parts of the body are here described, which are not commonly exposed to everybody's view. For the spouse is desired to tell by what marks this person might be discovered (ver. 9). Now he could not be known by any of those parts which are concealed and hidden from all men's eyes, being industriously covered. And therefore no such hidden parts are here represented: because he could not thereby be known and distinguished.

I conclude, therefore, that now she proceeds to describe the habit of this great person. And Solomon here, by the help of these words, makes us to think of that beauty wherewith his father had given him of the Messiah, in the hundred and tenth psalm (where he is said to be a priest as well as a prince), represents him in the habit of the high-priest. Who, among other noble vestments, had an embroidered coat; the sleeves of which, the Hebrews tell us, came down to his very wrists; nay, as Maimonides saith, and I cannot follow Pliny, which saith that he wore a coat that take to be here meant by his bands (which comprehend the arms and shoulders), that is, the clothing of those parts. And these sleeves, as well as the whole coat, were embroidered (as you read, Exod. xxviii. 4), to make the high-priest appear the more glorious. And if you ask what this embroidery was, the Hebrews have told you, in that scholiast, who is a kind of high-priest in their books, that it is a kind of high-priest, which was called cyclet holes, finely worked. And R. Solomon Jarchi expressly saith upon that text, that "they were holes made in gold rings, in which were fixed precious stones," &c. (as is afterward said of the stones of the ephod, ver. 11). Which so fully explains these words, "his bands are as gold rings, set with the beryl," that I need seek no farther. Though I have sometimes thought that the ephod itself might be here intended: which being fastened upon the shoulders (which, in order, after the head, eyes, cheeks, and lips, come to be here described, and are comprehended, as I said before, under the name of his hand), hung down before and behind him, and there was at each end of it, in order to hold it together, a gold ring, or gold rings, unto which the breast-plate was fastened, as we read Exod. xxviii. 27, 28. Maimonides saith it had four rings, two above, at the jewel-buckles; and two below, about the girdle of the ephod. That was one of the principal ornaments of the high-priest when he ministered; the other, and the greatest of all, was the breast-plate hereto annexed; and, as they say, was to be inseparable from the ephod.

Now this breast-plate is meant, as I take it, in the latter part of this verse. Where, under that word which we translate belly, and properly signifies bowels, is comprehended the breast and all: which this cochen, as the Hebrews call it, covered: and, as it covered those parts, so it was itself covered, or overlaid with twelve precious stones. The sapphire, which was the tenth, is only here mentioned; but it is usual in scripture to touch only upon one thing in a history, when the whole is intended. And besides, it is evident, from the foregoing part of this verse, that mention is alone made: for rings are spoken of in the plural number, and said to be filled with tarsiis; which must therefore denote more stones than one; as sapphire doth all the rest of the twelve which could not be mentioned in so short a description. Or sepphirin here, in the plural number, may signify stones as precious as the sapphire. Certain it is, the Chaldean paraphrase thought there was some respect here to the high-priest's breastplate; for he mentions all the stones therein, one by one. Which may make this interpretation of mine to seem less strange. And I conceive the sapphire to be here mentioned rather than any other; because it is of the colour of the heavens, and fittest to represent the sublime dignity in which he is now described. For the pavement under the feet of the God of Israel, when he appeared unto their nobles at mount Sinai, was of this colour (Exod. xxiv. 10), and so was the throne of God in the firmament, which Ezekiel saw (Ezek. i. 2).

Nay need it seem strange that the belly, upon which this covering was, is said to be of polished ivory (when there is no mention of any such thing in the law), for it only denotes that it was as shining and bright as that: and may possibly relate to the tunic or coat of fine linen, wherein the high-priest was to unthine; and therefore was commonly called by the Jews an ornament, than a garment, or any part of his vesture: the whole of which was contrived "for glory and for beauty" (Exod. xxviii. 10), i.e. that God might be served most magnificently.

[p] Ver. 15.] Next in order follows the description of the thighs: that is, of the garments upon the thighs. which were the very first that the high-priest put on, when he went about to clothe himself for his ministry. And are here said to be made of schesh, which is a word common to fine linen, and to pure whiteware (so the LXX. twice translate it Parian marble, Esth. i. 6, 2 Chron. xxix. 2), which the breccian of Egypt, being made of byssus, or pure fine linen, a thing of wonder among those countries, as appears both by Pliny and Pausanias. The latter of which authors, in his Elica, mentions this among the rare things (which were worthy of admiration) in that country, and says, "It was not inferior to the byssus of the Hebrews," who were ordered to make this part of the priest's garments of twined fine linen (Exod. xxxxi. 29), which rendered them the more substantial; and made them sit the fuller and stiffer, like pillars. For the Hebrews say they were made of six-thread byssus: and that they came down to the knees, where they were not gathered at the bottom, but sat open.

Below which breeches came down the holy well, or robe, upon the skirts whereof hung round about belts made of pure gold (Exod. xxviii. 31). Which may possibly be the basis of fine gold, here mentioned, to which the femoralis, or garments on the thighs, reached. Some refer all this only to his stately gait and walk, and thought there was some strength and firmness (which lie much in the thighs), and his ability to march against his enemies, and pursue them. And then the sockets of fine gold are his sandals, bound upon his feet with golden ribands, or something of that nature. The reader may choose which he thinks most probable, for the explication of the first part of this verse: "His legs (or thighs rather) are as pillars of marble, and he is altogether as a man sculptured." Now if my conjecture be allowed, then the latter part of the verse will not be hard to explain. For this and all the rest of his habit being contrived for beauty and glory, as was said before, from Exod. xxviii. 40, it made the high-priest appear with unusual majesty: the riches of these vestments being not easily to be valued. And so his countenance, or rather his aspect, his whole appearance (as the Hebrew word may signify), was as stately as Lebanon." Which was one of the goodliest sites in those countries, both for cedars and many other things; especially after Solomon had made his garden there, of which we read in the foregoing chapter, ver. 15, 16. Unto which lovely forest and garden, the appearance of the high-priest may be the better compared; because there were flowers, as well as pomegranates, if we may believe Philo (in his third book of the Life of Moses), wrought in the bottom of the holy robe. Which the LXX. in certain beautiful places wrote; that there was χειροκοπήμα, a "flour work," as well as pomegranates and bells in the hem of the melf (Exod. xxviii. 34). And, indeed, the pomegranates being made of wool of divers colours, they themselves might look like divers sorts of flowers. And besides this, it is to be observed, that several other parts of the high-priest's habit are peculiarly commenced to be made of a work called chechhs, which we translate cunning work. Thus the ephod is ordered to be wrought (Exod. xxviii. 6), and the girdle of it (ver. 8), and the breastplate (ver. 15). Which some translate artificial, others ingenious works: and all agree to have consisted in certain beautiful figures of flowers and animals; and in variety of colours. The girdle, moreover, is ordered to be made of a work called roken, which we translate needlework (ver. 39), because it is thought not to have differed from the former, save only in this; that the other things were only woven curiously, but this also curiously wrought with the needle. The Jews give another difference; that this was wrought so that the figures appeared on both sides, the other only on one. About which I shall not trouble myself; but only take notice that Josephus (in his third book of Antiquities, ch. 8) explains this verse thus, "Flowers were woven in this girdle, with scarlet, purple, blue; &c." and (as And others say, amongst them), then, in all probability, trees also were wrought in these priestly vestures: which made the fuller representation of a forest. Among which that of Lebanon was the principal, and, indeed, the most beautiful place in all those countries; which made the prophet express the glory of the church in these words, "The glory of Lebanon shall be given to it" (Isa. xxxiv. 2; see also Hos. xiv. 5—7).

Some think that hereby only the tallness of his stature is denoted; which was always looked upon as a princely thing, as it was in Saul. As for the helmet, its various decorations of these two verses, there are none to be sought for, if I have given the true sense of them; but such as relate to the excellency of Christ's everlasting priesthood; and its preeminence above the other, as much as the cedar excels all the trees of the forest.

[7] Ver. 16.] There is little difficulty here. For breach, is not upon sockets of gold."
CHAPTER VI.

1 Whither is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women? whither is thy beloved turned aside? that we may seek him with thee.

2 My beloved is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies.

3 I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine: he feedeth among the lilies.

4 ¶ Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tizah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners.

5 Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me: thy hair is as a flock of goats that appear from Gilgal.

6 Thy teeth are as a flock of sheep which go up from the washing, whereof every one beareth twins, and there is not one barren among them.

7 As a piece of a pomegranate are thy temples within thy locks.

8 There are threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, and virgins without number.

9 My dove, my undefiled is but one; she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her. The daughters saw her, and blessed her; yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her.

10 ¶ Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?

11 I went down into the garden of nuts to see steadfast and faithful in my love to him; who takes a constant care of such as study to resemble him. See Annot. [e].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 4.] It is true, O my beloved friend, who art still dear unto me, and most amiable in my eyes: I have not lost my esteem of thee; for I see thou hast not lost thy affection to me: nor that lovely, that decent and comely order, which makes thee not only beautiful, but venerable: nay, amazes all beholders, or, at least, strikes them with great admiration of thee. See Annot. [d].

Ver. 5.] Thou needest not look so earnestly, and with such care and solicitude, upon me, as if I had forgotten thee: for I see the same sparkling beauty in thy eyes, which I did before (iv. 1), and it no less affects my heart (iv. 9): thou wastest none of those ornaments which I formerly commended, but retainest them all, notwithstanding the discomposure in which thou hast been. See Annot. [e].

Ver. 6.] The same I say also of thy teeth, which are still white and clean; even set both above and below; firm and sound also; without any breach, or want of so much as one of them. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 7.] And, to be short (and not to repeat every thing again), I see the same fresh colour in thy cheeks: which makes thee look as lovely now thy veil is off (v. 7) as thou didst in the first blooming of thy beauty. See Annot. [g].

Ver. 8.] Therefore, though other kings and princes of these countries have a great many queens, and more wives, of an inferior rank, and virgins that attend them, without numbers: whose beauty they highly admire: See Annot. [f].

Ver. 9.] I have one only, and none other, whom I entirely love: and that is thyself alone: who preserves an inviolable faith and affection to me, and therefore art dearer to me than an only daughter (and she the most accomplished person and perfect beauty) is to her mother: whom all other persons at last shall admire; the queens themselves before named call thee blessed, and wishing all prosperity to thee; and they of the next degree shall praise thy excellences, the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded.

12 Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib.

and confess their own imperfections. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 10.] Saying, what an astonishing beauty is this that appears like a clear morning after a dark night, and is as bright as the moon when it is at full; may, as splendid as the sun when it shineth in its strength: and no less dazzles our eyes, and amazes our thoughts, than a glorious host of heaven; or an army here on earth, when it stands in battalions, with all their colours displayed! See Annot. [e].

Ver. 11.] Only this I expect from thee, that thou bring forth fruit proportionable to my care of thee, and kindness to thee; for to that end I went down before (v. 1, vi. 2) and now go again into my garden (which I have not neglected to dress, and prune, and water), to take a view in what condition it is; and in what forwardness the several sorts of fruit are, which I justly look to receive in their due seasons. See Annot. [f].

Spouse.

Ver. 12.] Alas! what am I, that I should receive such praises, who am not worthy of thy care! But have put such motions into my soul, as to make me aim at the highest perfections; and make all the haste I can likewise to attain them; and therefore I must, for the present, take leave of you, O my friends, who have kindly assisted me in the search of my beloved. See Annot. [m].

Companions.

Ver. 13.] Let us have thy company again. O thou fairest and most accomplished of all the daughters of Jerusalem. Come back again, come back, that we may behold thy wondrous perfections. And if any ask, What is that you would see? What would you enjoy in her happy society! Our answer is, Such a divine presence as appeared to Jacob, when he saw the angelical choir; which made him cry out, "This is God's host," and call the name of that place Mahanaim. See Annot. [n].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] The daughters of Jerusalem (mentioned v. 8) here justify what the spouse had said in the conclusion of the former chapter; and declaring themselves in love with him whom she had described, are desirous to join themselves to her company, and go in quest of him. In order to which, they would know whether she thought he was gone when he went from her.

[b] Ver. 2.] Unto which she replies in this verse, and seems to tell them, in his own words, what she had heard him say about that matter (v. 1). And it signifies that he was still in his church, and in every part of it; though sometimes they were not sensible of it. For so Theodoret well observes here is a distinct mention made of a garden, and of gardens, i.e. of the catholic church, which is but one, and of the several parts thereof. For sometimes St. Paul mentions only the church in the singular number, and sometimes the several churches even in the same nation (in which he is here) and in the same province or city (1 Cor. xiv. 34).

He is said here to go down into his garden, with respect to the mountains, mentioned iv. 8. And to feed, in the Hebrew, is either to do the office of a shepherd to his flock; or relates to his communion with his people, mentioned iv. 16, v. 1. Which may be the meaning also of gathering lilies, or, as Theodoret will have it, by this last clause is to be understood, his gathering holy and pure souls that are like to him, and joining them unto his church. And so the Arabic translation is, "to gather together the lilies;" following the Septuagint, who translate it, ἀκούσαι. And, indeed, I find the Hebrew word labat, signifies to collect things into a heap or bundle; as stones (Gen. xxxi. 16), manna (Exod. xvi. 27), fruit (Lev. xix. 9), silver (Gen. xlviii. 14).

The whole denotes, that communion with him is only to be sought in his church: especially in that part of it which preserves the order, wherein he hath disposed all things (like the walls and beds in a garden), and kept himself also in the purity of his religion.

[c] Ver. 3.] Now she seems to have so perfectly recovered herself out of the slumber wherein she had been, as to have regained her former sense of him, and of her interest in him; repeating those words which we meet withal before (ii. 16). Of the latter part of which ["be he found among the lilies"] may fit here farther to note, that to feed may relate either unto himself, or unto others; for there are examples of both. Of the former, Gen. xli. 2, Job i. 11. Of the latter, Gen. xxxix. 7, 9, xxxvii. 12. I take it here rather in this latter sense, and suppose it signifies his doing the office of a shepherd: and that he is said to feed amongst the lilies, "as the flocks in the midst of the seven candlesticks;" i.e. there to have his conversation, to take up his abode with them, &c., as he often says in the gospel of St. John (xiv. 23), that he would with those who love him and keep his commandments.

And such persons are here compared to lilies, which had a name given by Christ to himself, Greg. Nyssen and Theodoret hereby, not unfairly, understand, such as are confirmed to Christ their head, and have his image wrought in their souls, in righteousness and true holiness. For, said the former of them, ὅταν ἐξερευνήσατε, &c., "whatevver things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just," &c. (Phil. iv. 8) ὕστερα ἐν τῇ σωρείᾳ, "these are the lilies in which Christ delights."

[d] Ver. 4.] And now we must conceive, either that they went to the garden together, and there found them; or that he, hearing this hearty profession of unmoveable love to him, meets them: and, to revive her drooping spirits, falls again into a new commendation of the spouse; in the very same terms as before, and in some higher.

And, first, he compares her to Tirzah, which was a beautiful situation in the country of Ephraim: and therefore made choice of after this time, by Jeroboam, for the seat of his kingdom: and so continued till the building of Samaria, as we read 1 Kings xiv. 17, xv. 21, 23, and several other places: to which add, Josh. xii. 31. The very original of the word signifies as much as urbs amabilis, or a city that pleaseth one; and therefore chosen by one of the ancient kings of Canaan for the place of his residence.

And last, this should not be high enough, he next compares her to Jerusalem, which was the most lovely place in the territories of Judea, and indeed of the whole country. For which cause, as it had been the seat of one of the kings of Canaan, so the royal SOLOMON’S SONG.

Solomon, who saw the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth (ii. 15). It is mentioned by Pliny, likewise (lib. v. cap. 14), as the most famous city in the east.

And as she had commended him before, not only for his beauty, but also for his justice so she doth here, in the last place, call her "terrible as an army standing in battalions;" striking an awe, that is, into beholders. So I think it is to be expounded, as referring still to the goodness of her aspect, and not to her being invincible, inexposable, and striking terror into her enemies; as some interpret the whole verse.

And this more particularly, as he compared his verse metaphorically to the comedy order which Christ appointed in his church; which, while it was preserved, made the church very venerable in the world. So Theodoret, and many others, understood it as referring to the church, and Christ himself as variously interpreted the names and persons of the Old Testament.

And therefore threecore and fourscore are only a certain number for an uncertain; not the precise number of these wives and concubines. Theodoret thinks by these are mystically intended several ranks of Christians in the church: some more, some less perfect: but they discourse better, in my opinion, who refer these Chaldee names to the several sorts of poetically and schismatical churches: some of which gloried in the multitude of their followers, and in their wealth and splendour; but Christ hath only one catholic church, more glorious than them all put together; as it follows here in the next verses. And that, in effect, R. Solomon Jarchi, and some other Hebrew expositors, understand these words with application to themselves. Abraham and his posterity, say they, till the descendants from Israel, were threecore in number (compared here to queens). The sons of Noah and their descendants unto Abraham, were fourscore (compared to concubines). The rest who came from Cham, and Shem, in the west, and in the east, were not comprehended under a certain number. And so the meaning is, whatsoever kindness God had for the rest of Abraham's posterity, or of Noah's (not to mention Cham, Ishmael, and Esau), yet I have chosen, saith God, my people Israel, whom I have espoused to myself, by circumcision, and by the law, and by sacrifices, &c.

[7] Ver. 7. This is also exactly the same with the latter end of the third verse of the fourth chapter. The LXX. have also the first part: but they might as well have added all that there follows: which is here omitted.

[8] Ver. 8. Here, most think, Solomon alludes to the number of his own wives; who were fewer, they suppose, in the beginning of his reign (as Bochartus himself gathers from these words, in his epistle to the new Bishop of Winchester, p. 126): and that then he composed this song, before he let the reins of his lust so prodigiously loose, as afterward we read he did

(1 Kings xi. 1, &c.). But it is not at all likely that he had so many as are there mentioned, while his mind was filled with such divine raptures as these; and therefore I suppose he alludes to the custom of other princes in the east, who, besides their principal wives that were solemnly espoused and endowed, had also another sort who were neither; and yet were wives, called by the Hebrew philagathim, "concubines." And such a difference the Romans anciently made between these and the other sorts of profligate women, who was only taken in marriage, and her whom they called mater familiales, who was taken also to order and govern the family, and whose children inherited. As may be seen in Aulus Gallius, lib. xviii. cap. 8, wherein he confutes Elius Melissus, a conceited grammarian, who had started other ungrounded notions of the same kind.

And then threescore and fourscore are only a certain number for an uncertain; not the precise number of these wives and concubines. Theodoret thinks by these are mystically intended several ranks of Christians in the church: some more, some less perfect: but they discourse better, in my opinion, who refer these Chaldee names to the several sorts of poetically and schismatical churches: some of which gloried in the multitude of their followers, and in their wealth and splendour; but Christ hath only one catholic church, more glorious than them all put together; as it follows here in the next verses. And that, in effect, R. Solomon Jarchi, and some other Hebrew expositors, understand these words with application to themselves. Abraham and his posterity, say they, till the descendants from Israel, were threecore in number (compared here to queens). The sons of Noah and their descendants unto Abraham, were fourscore (compared to concubines). The rest who came from Cham, and Shem, in the west, and in the east, were not comprehended under a certain number. And so the meaning is, whatsoever kindness God had for the rest of Abraham's posterity, or of Noah's (not to mention Cham, Ishmael, and Esau), yet I have chosen, saith God, my people Israel, whom I have espoused to myself, by circumcision, and by the law, and by sacrifices, &c.

[9] Ver. 9. This verse needs not much explication; wherein the spouse is opposed to all the forenamed beauties: who are constrained to confess her pre-eminence. The Hebrew word for one, signifies also only: and an only child is as much as a beloved child: as appears by this that, akbarah, "only begotten," and akbarar, "well-beloved," are words of the same import in the New Testament. And if such an only daughter be also barak (choice we translate it, or) pure, as the word originally imports: free from all blemish (that is, a perfect beauty), it makes her still more dearly beloved.

It is in vain to inquire here, who is the mother intended in this place: for his love is only compared to the love of a mother towards such an only daughter; who hath engrossed, as we speak, all the excellent qualities that are in any other person. Which forced the daughters to admire her (so saw her signifieth, they looked upon her with admiration), and the queens to bless her, and the concubines to proclaim her praises. Thus, it is most likely, the latter part of this verse should be interpreted, "The daughters saw her, and the queens blessed her, and the concubines they praised her." For though the Jews now have otherwise distinguished the words by their accents, yet Maimonides, I observe, distinguishes them as I have done, in his Preface to Sedar Tzemah.

St. Cyril, from this and such like places of this book (iv. 8, 12, v. 1), proves there is but one holy Catholic church; making this observation (Epist. 73, edit. Oxon.), "We see one person everywhere mentioned," and no more; "because the spouse also is one," k.c.

[5] Ver. 10.] This same take to be the beginning of a new part of this song: and Theodoret, in particular, here begins his fourth book of commentaries upon it: but I look upon these words as the praises and commendations which the queens and concubines before mentioned bestow upon the spouse, with admiration and astonishment at her transcendent beauty.

They need no explication, being of known signification; only it is fit to note, that to make the eulogy more vivid, the repetition of the same expression, and the expansion of it, is usual. For though the morning be very beautiful and agreeable to every eye; yet the moon is still more bright, and the sun far brighter than that; but all the host of heaven (which I take to be meant in the last words) still more wonderful and amazing. For there being a gradation in this place, and all the other expressions relating to the person of the bridegroom, the reason to be thought that this doth so too: and that we are to understand by it the armis or host of heaven (as the scripture calls the stars), rather than armies upon earth. However, I have put both into the paraphrase, but have not meddled with mystical applications: they that desire them, may look into the commentaries of three fathers, where this verse is applied to the four degrees of Christians that are in the church. Others, with more reason, apply it to the progress which the church herself made in splendour and greatness: being, at first, like the morning when the day breaks, after a long night of ignorance: and then the light of Christian knowledge advanced, till the church appeared like the moon (whose power is still more evident, since the persecution struck into their hearts), till, in the issue, it dispersed all mists, and, conquering all opposition, shone like the sun: and then was settled in Constantine's time, like a well-ordered army, which beat down all idolatry.

They that would see more of these applications may look into Commentius's book De Bono Unitatis; in the beginning whereof there are applications of these things, both unto the church in general, and unto particular churches.

[7] Ver. 11.] This seems to be the voice of the bridegroom declaring what returns he expected to his love. The word agez, which we translate "mais" (of which there were several kinds, some very rich, as the pistick), is found only here: and by some is translated shorn or cut; which I have not omitted in my paraphrase. And bebe hannuchal (fruits of the valley) the LXX. translate "shoots by the brook" or rivers, where plants are apt to grow best: which is very agreeable to the original. The rest of the words are common: and the whole verse signifies that he went to look after the fruits of all sorts. The mystical applications may be found in all interpreters.

[m] Ver. 12.] The meaning of this verse seems to be, that the spouse, hearing such high commendations of herself, both from him, and from the persons mentioned verse 10, with great humility, saith, that she was not conscious to herself of such perfections (for so the first words sound in the Hebrew, "I did not know it, or I did not think so"), but is excited thereby to make the greatest speed to endeavour to preserve this character he had given her: and to go along with him into his garden (which she had neglected before, v. 2), there to give a good account of her proficiency. For which end she seems on a sudden to take leave of her friends (who had been so charitable as to go along with her to seek him), that she might for some time enjoy his company alone: which is the ground of their calling upon her to return, in the next verse. This is the best account I can give of these last two verses.

It is supposed Ammi-nadib was some great captain, who pursued his victories or advantages very indifferently and with very swift chariots.

[7] Ver. 13.] This verse is the voice of her companions, or friends; some of which wish for her company again: but they, seeing that she is happy in her company again, and how she was improved: and the rest asked what they expected to see in her? to which the other reply in the last words, "as it were the company," k.c.

The repetition of the word return, four times over, expresseth their vehement affection to her, and their desire to have her company again: whom they call Sulamith; as much as to say, Jerusalem; for the name of that place formerly was Salem, which carries peace in its signification; or, as others will have it, perfection: for shalum, in the second conjugation, signifies to finish, or perfect. And is a fit name here for the church, the new Jerusalem, built by Christ himself. This seems to me a great deal more probable than the conjecture of Menochius (lib. iii. De Repub. Hebr. cap. 21, n. 14), who, because wives, when they were married, took the name of their husbands, thinks the spouse from Solomon had the name of Sulamith, which Aquila translates ιερουσαλινα, pacifie, i.e. Solomonissam. The reader may follow which he likes best. Solomonissam seems to me not to have had respect to his own spouse in this song.

To see, or look upon her, signifies to enjoy her happy society; and the benefit of her excellent virtues and perfections. Whom, in the last two words, he seems to me to compare unto the choirs of the heavenly hosts. For the word mechola doth not signify any kind of company; but of such as dance or sing: as may be seen in Exod. xv. 20, xxxii. 19; Judg. xii. 34; Jer. xxxii. 1; Num. v. 15, and many other places. Which show that it signifies both chorea, a dance, and choros, the company that dances: and so the LXX. here translate it, ποίημα, "choirs." And mechola (which we translate "two armies"), may as well be a proper name as Ammi-nadib in the verse foregoing: and relates to the appearance of angels to Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 2), as a token of God's special presence with him; and most lively sets forth the far more glorious presence of God now in the Christian church. Or if we interpret it armites, or hosts, as we do, still it may signify the armies above in the heavens: either the stars or the angels, called "the armies in heaven," Rev. xix. 11, and "army of heaven," Dan. iv. 35.
CHAPTER VII.

1 How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter! the joints of thy thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman.

2 Thy navel is like a round goblet, which wanteth not liquor: thy belly is like an heap of wheat set about with lilies.

3 Thy two breasts are like two young roes that are twins.

4 Thy neck is as a tower of ivory; thine eyes like the fishpools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim: thy nose is as the tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus.

5 Thine head upon thee is like Carmel, and the hair of thine head like purple; the king is held in the galleries.

6 How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love, for delights!

7 This thy stature is like to a palm tree, and thy breasts to clusters of grapes.

8 I said, I will go up to the palm tree, and take hold of the boughs thereof: now also thy breasts shall be as clusters of the vine, and the smell of thy nose like apples;

9 And the roof of thy mouth like the best wine for my beloved, that goeth down sweetly, causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak.

10 ¶ I am my beloved's, and his desire is toward me.

11 Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field; let us lodge in the villages.

12 Let us get up early to the vineyards; let thy face, as the tower of Lebanon (whose top shows itself above the trees) doth to that noble forest. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 5.] And now that we take a view of thy head, we seem to be come to the top of mount Carmel; which is not more richly adorned by nature than its excellent form is by art: which hath contrived the most royal ornaments for it, and made thee an object fit for the king's affection; who, beholding thee from his palace, is fixed in contemplation of thy beauty. See Annot. [c].

Ver. 6.] Which cannot be described, but only admired; and constrains all to say, O how happy art thou! and how happy are they who are acquainted with thee! for what beauty is like to that, or what pleasure comparable to those which thou impartest to them that are in love with thy delights! See Annot. [f].

Ver. 7.] Whose tall and upright stature adds much to all this beauty; and makes thee resemble the goodly palm-tree: within whose boughs those clusters hang, to which we may compare thy breasts between thy arms. See Annot. [g].

Ver. 8.] Which is said to be stretched out to receive us with all thy embraces, and invite me and all my company, with a joint resolution to say, We will take hold of the boughs of this tree: we will get up into it and taste of its fruit: and now shall be happy indeed; and enjoy those sweet delights which flow from thy breasts, and from the breath of thy mouth; far more refreshing and comfortable than the choicest fruit that this good land affords. See Annot. [h].

Ver. 9.] For the richest and most generous wine, which when we have tasted, we say, Let it be sent to the best of friends, is not more comfortable to the bodily spirits, though it be so powerful as to make old men brisk, nay, to enliven those that are at the point of death, than thy words to raise and restore the souls of those who imbibe the sense of them into their minds. See Annot. [i].

Ver. 10.] If there be any thing in me that is pleasing to you, and deserve such praises, ascribe it all to him from whom I received it; for, as I have often said, I am his entirely, and he is pleased to be entirely mine, having espoused himself unto me with great desire (Ps. xlv. 11). See Annot. [k].

Ver. 11.] And O that he (without whom I can do nothing) would accompany me in the charitable de-us see if the vine flourish, whether the tender grape appear, and the pomegranates bud forth: there will I give thee my loves.

13 The mandrakes give a smell, and at our sign I have, to go and visit other people, besides you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem! Let us go, my beloved, unto those poor despised people that live in the fields and country villages: let us not only go to them, but dwell among them. See Annor. [7].

Ver. 12. Let us diligently visit the vineyards that have been newly planted there, and bestow our attmotions and affection on them. Let us see if they give any hope of good fruit; in promoting which, I will give thee a proof of my extraordinary love. See Annor. [8].

Ver. 13. And behold the happy success of such care and diligence! the most excellent fruit is already ripe, and meets us with its refreshing smell; there is nothing so choice and so pleasant, but it grows every-where; and is at the very gates; and that in great plenty and variety, both of this year’s fruit and of the last: which shall all be reserved for thy uses, and employed for thy honour, O my beloved, from whom all comes; and for the good and profit of those that belong to thee. See Annor. [9].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1. They who earnestly solicited the ret-turn of the spouse, in the conclusion of the former chapter, seem now to have a view of her again, and praise her perfection in a new method; beginning at the feet, and so upward (whereas before, ch. iv. her description was from the head, and so downward), because they saw her in motion; when she went away, and now at her return to them. Whom they call the princess, daughter, aluding, I take it, to Ps. xlv. 13, 14, and conceiving her as that royal bride, whose clothing is there represented as very glorious. And accordingly they admire her very shoes or sandals (by whose shape the beauty of the feet was discerned), which were wont to be set with genes, as we learn from many authors; I shall name none but the book of Judith (because what Greek or Roman writers say about their own shoes is not material), where sandals are praised, and are a part of the bravery wherein she set forth herself to deceive Holofernes (x. 4). And with these, she is said, in her song, to have ravished his eyes,” xvi. 9 (see also Isa. iii. 18).

Now the feet not being here considered as naked, in all reason we ought not to expound the next words of the naked thyghs (the discovery of which had been immodest), but of the clothing of them round about. For so that word we translate joints, is expounded by others the circuit: or, as the LXX. their whole proportion, or model: which was as fine as the ornaments that adorned them. So echalath signifies; which R. Solomon here observes is an Arabic word, denoting not jewels (as we translate it), but the fine drapery, and trimming, wherewith women deck themselves to set off their beauty.

Which agrees with what follows, “the work of the hands of a cunning workman.” Where workman also signifies, not an artificer, but a goldsmith, who (as Bochart hath shown) made wires, laces, wreaths, rings, rings, and suchlike little ornaments of gold and sil-Ver, as women used.

The Chaldee paraphrase applies all this to the people’s going up three times a-year to the public feasts: as R. Solomon beforenamed expounds also that place in Isa. iii. 7, “How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet,” &c. Which, without any reason, we apply to their return into the own country out of captivity; gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old, which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved.

and the Christian writers apply to the apostles going through the world to preach the gospel, whose steadfastness herein may be also here represented; though I see not why it may not as well be applied to Christians going cheerfully to worship God in their public assemblies.

[2] Ver. 23. The garments, I doubt not, of these parts are still described in this verse. For what resemblance hath the belly itself of any person (which it had not been seemly neither to describe) unto “a heap of wheats set with lilies”? And they seem to me to have had in their eyes that “apparel of wrought gold,” mentioned Ps. xlv. 13, and represent that part of it which covered the belly to be of raised or embossed work, resembling a heap of wheat. By which it is possible may be meant “many sheaves of wheat,” embroidered round about (as the king’s daughter’s raiment was, ver. 14) with flowers, especially with lilies. And then this was a figure wherein harvest was represented; which is no unlikely conjecture: for anciently 10 things was more honourable than to follow tillage or pasturage. From whence it is, that we find, in the latter end of Homer’s eighteenth Iliad, that the device contrived by Vulcan in Achilles’ shield, were reapers, cutting down ripe corn; and the king himself standing in a furrow, and providing a dinner for them.

Now, in the very midst of this work, I conceive there was a fountain: which I take to be the meaning of the first words of the verse, “Thy navel is a round goblet, which wanteth not liquor;” that is, “a great bowl or basin was wrought in the centre of the embroidery; full of water, which ran continually from above into it.” Or, “a conduit, running with several sorts of liquors into a great bowl.” Unto which the word hamanauzag (importing a mixture) seems to incline the sense.

The word agon, which properly signifies a concaten, as the LXX. translate it, a great bowl, or basin: is used by the Chaldee paraphrase for a receptacle of water, as in fountain or wells. As in Judges iv. 11, when the valley or plain of Agarmona, of bowls, which was in Kedesh, is interpreted, by Kimchi, the field, in which were many pits or trenches, like two full bowls of water. This seems to be a phainer interpretation than that of Sanchez; who fancies this to have been some jewel that hung down from her girdle upon the navel, which was of this form, round like the moon. And the Chaldee paraphrast understood it to be of this figure, when he applies it “to the head of their school, who stood in the knowledge of the law, like the circle of the moon; and seventy wise men round about him, like a heap of wheat.”

What is the mystical meaning of this hieroglyphic vesture (as it may be called), is very hard to say. It may be applied to the two sacraments, which the church administers to her children: the font in baptism being represented by the former; and the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper by the other part of this figure.

[c] Ver. 5. This verse hath been explained before, iv. 5. I only observe, that the Chaldee paraphrast applies these two breasts to the two Messiahs, whom they foolishly expect; the Son of David, and the Son of Ephraim: who shall be like Moses and Aaron, &c. Which I mention, because it shows that the Jews have an opinion, that the Messiah is dis-course of in this book; and that these words are to be applied to the leaders of the church, such as Moses and Aaron. Of which see in the place before named.

[d] Ver. 4.] The tower, to which the neck is here compared, in all probability is the same with that, in v. 4, which is called “the tower of David;” and here “the tower of ivory;” because of its smoothness and whiteness. And the phrase is varied, perhaps, to express an increase of beauty: for, ως ἐν τούτῳ τῷ γαρτερῷ, “the shining moisture of the eyes,” is commanded as very beautiful by many authors: particularly by Plutarch, who commends this in Pompey, and in Alexander; and by Philostratus, in his epistles, very frequently: “Thou seemest to me (saith he, ἐπίστ. γεν. κατοικία) to carry water, as it were, from the fountain of thy eyes, καὶ μάτια μένεις τοιαύτα, and therefore to be one of the “nymphs.”

Among pools, those fair ones at Heshbon were much celebrated; which were in the very entrance of the city, hard by the gate called Bath-rabbim; because it opened towards the way that led to Rabbah, the metropolis of the children of Ammon. And therefore it is likely that the more people pass in and out at it. For Heshbon, we find in Numb. xxii. 34, 25, &c., was the principal city of Sihon, whose country bordered upon the Ammonites: and it fell to the share of the Gadites, who desired this country, because it abounded with pasture, and was excellently watered; there being many rivulets and brooks in its neighbourhood, from whence the “pools of Heshbon” were supplied. Which were remarkable for their purity, and serenity, or quietness; and therefore fitter to represent the composed, settled eyes of a modest virgin.

Whose gravity and majesty, I suppose, are also set forth in the next words, by comparing her nose to the “tower which was in Lebanon;” and appeared at a distance among the trees (especially on that side which looks towards Damascus), as the nose in the face doth among the locks of hair that fall upon the cheeks.

A large, but well proportioned nose, was always acceded a considerable part of beauty; and an indication, it was generally thought, of greatness of mind and height of spirit. Some add, that it is a token of sagacity and prudence: and the nose being the instrument of smelling, they apply it to the great judgment and foresight of the doctors of the church, who, they think, may be hereby intended. For as the Chaldee paraphrast applies this whole verse to the Sanhedrin, who governed the affairs of that people (who were as full of wisdom, saith he, as a pool is of water), so Christians generally by eyes understand the guides and governors of the church. Who may the better be compared to the “pools of Heshbon;” because it was, after the conquest of Canaan, one of the cities of the Levites (Josh. xxi. 39), whose office it was to instruct the people. And such being called by the Jews ῥηβάδ, and in the singular number ῥαββί, and ῥαββανί, some have fancied that they are also denoted in the name of the gate of Bath-rabbim. For Bath (laughter) signifies people, or inhabitants; who were, as it were, those great men (as ῥαββανί signifies) what was law and judgment, in the gates of their cities. Damascus also being a great enemy to Israel, and noted for idolatry, they suppose, the nose being turned towards the watch-tower looking that way, is an emblem of the care that Christian doctors should take that the people be not seduced to idolatrous worship. We do not read anywhere in scripture of this tower; but that it was a watch-tower, the word συνήπτει here intimates; which we translate babith, but signifies, “looking like a watchman.”

[e] Ver. 5.] It appears from the very phrase, “Thine head upon thee,” that they mean the covering of the head. And this being a description of her utmost perfections, it denotes, I conceive, the crown or garland which she wore (as ready for her nuptials) resembling the top of Carmel. Which was another beautiful mountain in that country, whose head was covered with great variety of flowers and trees. Certain it is, that as it was a rich and fruitful, so a very pleasant and lofty place (Isa. xxxv. 2, Jer. ii. 7), and therefore fitly chosen to set forth the dignity and majesty of the spouse.

But there is no necessity, it must be confessed, to interpret this of the mountain Carmel; but the words may be translated, “Thy head is like a pleasant fruitful field.” For so the word Carmel (from the goodliness, perhaps, of that mountain) signifies in many places, Isa. xvi. 10, xxxii. 15, Jer. xviii. 33, where joy and gladness is said to be taken in Carmel, from Carmel; which we truly translate from the plentiful (or pleasant) field. For there the prophet speaks of the fruitful country Carmel, and Moab. And this is an illustration of beauty in other authors: who compare the head of a delicate woman, unto a fair meadow, or field. As Philostratus writes to his wife, ἥ δε τῇ καλῇ ἔρειν ἐνθά λοιπά; ἢ ἄρθρα διήρηκα, &c., “Thy head is a large meadow full of flowers; which are never wanting in the summer, and disappear not in the midst of the winter.” And in the same manner Achilles Tatius, lib. i. saith of his Clitophon and Leucippè, ἐν τοις προϊώνισιν ἐν λευκὸν, &c., The next word dailath is never used anywhere for hair; but should rather be translated the hair-lace that wherewith the hair, and all the ornaments belonging to it, were tied up. This hair-lace is said here to be of a purple colour; i.e. it was rich and noble. For this was the royal colour, and therefore called here the purple of the king (as the Vulgar Latin takes it, joining the latter part of the verse with this), tied up in folds, hanging down like canals, that is, hanging loose upon the shoulders (as some expound it), it is supposed to have given its name to the river which ran through the vale of Lebanon.

But the LXX. make the last words a distinct sentence as we do, in this manner: “The king is tied or bound in his walks.” That is, when he walks in his palace-royal, and beholds her beauty, he stands still, and cannot take his eyes off from her; being captivated with it, and tied as fast to her as the hair of her head is to the lace that binds it.

The former part of this verse is applied by the Chaldee paraphrast to the “king (the head of the people), who shall be just like Elias; who was zealous for the Lord of hosts, and slew the false prophets upon mount Carmel;” and the latter part of it to the poor, “who shall be clothed by him in purple; as Daniel was in Babylon, and Mordecai in Shushan.”

[f] Ver. 6.] This verse may be either taken for a commendation of love, which had thus adorned her, and raised her to this pitch of happiness; or of her, who is called love, in the abstract: to express more vehemently how lovely she was, and what pleasure they took in beholding her beauty.

The first word fair may relate to the rare composition of the whole body; and the next word pleasant or sweet, or comely (as some translate it), to her graceful motion, gesture, and sweet conversation.
And the sense, in short, is this: "O how desirable do the pleasures which thou impartest make thee."

Theodoret's note here is very pious; that we become thus beautiful and lovely (though deformed before) by delighting in charity, and making good our highest pleasure.

The remarkable thing is, that the Vulgar verse is a reflection upon the whole foregoing description; as appears by the first word zoth, this: as if they had said, "to all this thy stature is proportionable." Which is compared to the palm-tree: because it shoots up straight as well as high: and therefore sets forth that part of loveliness, which consists in tallness. Which was always thought a great addition to beauty: and was one reason why women wore ornaments upon the very top of their heads, as well as high shoes, to make them appear the taller. The noblest palm-trees of all other were in Judæa (especially about Jericho), as Pliny writes, lib. xiii. cap. 4. From whence it was, that, in future times, it became an emblem of that country: as we find in that medal of the emperor Titus, with a captive woman sitting under a palm-tree, and the inscription of Judæa captata.

Our learned countryman, Sir Tho. Brown (in his Miscellan. Tracts, p. 78), hath ingeniously observed, that they speak emphatically, when they say they will "go up to take hold of the boughs of this tree." For it must be ascended, before one can come at the boughs, which it bears only at the top and upper parts. But the trunk, or body of it, is naturally contriv'd, densis, gradatuisa corticea pollicibus, ut eburnus (as Pliny there speaks), with rings in the bark, orderly disposed, like steps, whereby it may be very easily clim'd.

And the clusters, to which the breasts are here compared, some think, are nothing but the fruit of this tree, viz. dates; for it is not expressed in the Hebrew what clusters these were: the word grapes being added by our translators of the Bible.

Who supposed, as others do, that vines ran up the palm-tree in those countries: which agrees well with what follows in the next verse, where the clusters of the vine are mentioned, as a fit emblem of her breasts. Which were described before (v. 4), but now mention'd again: to show that they looked not merely at the boughs, but that they saw the branches of that which is meant there by. And Theodoret makes this pious observation upon it: that "(though the church be described as sublime, and reaching up to heaven" (as his words are), "yet she accommodates herself to the weakest and lowest souls, stretching out the breasts of her doctrine to all that need it. For the boughs of the palm-tree" (saith he) "hang down very low." Which must be understood not of their hanging down near the earth, but below the boughs: which are all at the top, and very high. For which reason Menochius (lib. vii. De Repub. Hebr. cap. 8, n. 10) thinks it not to be true, which Aben Ezra here notes; that the vines in Palestine were jointed unto palm-trees: because the palm-trees had not enough strength to support the branches of the vine. [4] Ver. 8. I take this verse to be still the voice of the same persons, though in the singular number (as appears from the mention of the beloved, ver. 9, which shows it is not he that speaks here, but some other person), for one spoke in the name of the rest (as Daniel did in the name of his other three brethren ii. 30, 36), or the whole choir is considered but as one person: who desire to have fellowship and communion with the church in her benefits. Of which having tasted, they say, "Now also thy breasts shall be as clusters of the vine;" that is, now we shall enjoy those delicious pleasures before mentioned ver. 6).

That which we translate "nose," in the last clause of the verse, the Vulgar translates conformation (or mouth, rather), agreeable enough to the Hebrew; and most agreeable to the rest of the words. For that which is small is the breath, coming out of the mouth; compared to the fragrance of cedron, oranges, peaches, or other sweet fruits: which is peculiarly common to all such fruits, as well as those we peculiarly call apples; and indeed signifies any fruit that hath a fragrant odour breathing from it.

And this may be thus mystically expanded. And now shall he have delight and joy in the church, and the breath or spirit of the apostles; sweeter than grapes, or the smell of any other fruit. [5] Ver. 9. Which is farther explained in this verse. Where the roof of the mouth, i. e. the words which come from thence, is compared to the most excellent wine: which was so choice, that it was fit only to be presented to him to whose love they owed all they had (or so delicious, as our translation hath it, that it went down glibly), and so generous, that it put spirits into those who were quite spent with age; nay, raised those who were, in a manner, dead. So this character of the best wine runs, word for word, in the Psalm: and the metaphor of the mouth (or roof of the mouth) is brought straight to my beloved, and causeth to speak the lips of old people, or of those that sleep! that is, are dead. For this word, jeschinnin, our translators thought, may either signify old men, or men asleep: though exact grammarians will not allow it; but make a great difference between jeschinnin and jeschemin. The first of which (which is the word here), they say, never signifies old men, but only sleepers.

But if we wave this nice distinction, the words may also be thus translated——"which makes men speak with the lips of the ancient;" i. e. sentences, or most excellent sayings. I omit other glosses, which may be found everywhere.

[6] Ver. 10. Here now the speaker, after long silence, puts an end to their encouragement: modestly acknowledging that there was nothing in her that could deserve it; but only as she was, his who could not be praised enough.

The words, in effect, we have met withal twice before (ii. 37). For the meaning of the latter part, "his desire is towards me," is no more than this (as Mr. Mede hath observed upon Dan. xi. 37), he is my husband. Only there seems to me to be an allusion here to Ps. xlv. 11 ("the king shall greatly desire thy beauty," &c.), unto which Solomon, as I take it, hath a respect all along in this poem.

[7] Ver. 11.] And now she turns herself from him (beginning a new part of this song), and being augmented with those new companions who had joined themselves unto her, she desires him (without whom nothing could be effected) to go along with her into the fields and villages; that is, to those places to which we were not yet become his garden, of which they had been speaking hitherto. Or they were but preparing for it, by the culture he had begun to bestow upon them: which, from the following verse, seems to be the meaning.

Ophir, villages, are opposed in scripture to cities (1 Sam. vi. 19), and signify small and humdrum, as we speak, 1 Chron. xxvii. 25, Neh. vi. 2. And the word wallah, "let us lodge," signifies to tarry, and to make one's dwelling or abode in a place (Ps. xct. 1); and may be applied to the settling of the gospel in those regions where it was but newly planted. So Theodoret glosses: "Let us now take care of the nestlings, and most delicate souls, that they be long neglected; which are tropically called the fields and villages." Most apply, to the genuine word, in this manner, We have stayed long enough in the city of Jerusalem, and in its temples; let us go now to the heathen, &c. I pass by other applications, which may be found in interpreters; and only add this note of my own, that the gospel was first preached in cities mostly, and from thence spread itself in time into the neighbouring villages: in which idolatry lasted so much longer than in cities, that they gave the same name of paganism to it.

[m] Ver. 12.] This verse supposes those fields (ver. 11) not to have been quite uncultivated: but there were vineyards (that is, churches, in the mystical sense) planted in them. And her desire is, that he would accompany her, in visiting them early: that is, very diligently, as the word signifies in many places. Thus in Eccles. xxxix. 5, it is said of a just man, that he will give his heart "to resort early to the Lord that made him." Which is suitable to what the psalmist saith, Ps. v. 1, and Jeremiah, xxi. 12, xxxv. 3, 3. Thus Theodoret here expounds it, "It behooveth us to use all fitting diligence, in visiting those that have already received the preaching; whether they bring forth more than leaves; and especially, whether any beginning of charity appear among them." For so he expounds "if the pomegranates bud forth." And this, saith he, is the greatest expression of love to him; which he makes the meaning of the last words, "there will I give thee my loves." For what is sweeter than to love one another, he accounts as done to himself; according to his own words, "inasmuch as you have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

The vines may signify the lesser sort of people, and the pomegranates the greater.

[n] Ver. 13.] The word judaim is found only here and in Gen. xxx. 14, where we read, how Jacob's wives contended for them, as a most precious, that is, a rare and delicious fruit. For none can imagine they strove about that now called by us mandarakes, which are of a striking smell, and very offensive; or about any ordinary flower, such as violts or jessamine (by which some expound this word), which they might have sent out their maids to gather everywhere. Lundolphus, therefore, in his late Ethiopic History (lib. i. cap. 9, n. 23), hath happily conjectured that it signifies the fruit which the Arabians call mazz or maza (called by some the Indian fig*), which in the Abyssinian country is as big as a cucumber; and of the same form and shape, fifty of which grow upon one and the same stalk; and are of a very sweet taste and smell; from which cognition (as he calls it) of a great many intellects, he thinks it took the name of judaim. Which some derive from doth, either as it signifies love, or a breast: with which they fancy this fruit to have had resemblance.

So the sense of this verse is, that they found more there than they expected: or, that by her care the most excellent fruit was produced from people of the best rank (who may be understood by this most rare sort of fruit), and that everywhere; so that they needed not to be at the trouble to go far to gather it. For at their very gates there were megadim, all precious spices (mentioned before, iv. 13, v. 1), and those both new and old (a phrase for plenty and variety), which, as a faithful steward, she saith, she had laid up for him, with the same care that we do the most precious treasure; so the word zephanitis (I have laid up) is used, Ps. xvii. 13, civ. 11.

At the gates] May also signify as much as just ready to be gathered: or to be brought home.

Some apply new and old to the knowledge of the Old and New Testament, by which idolatry was vanquished, and true religion planted in the world: and they think our Lord himself alludes to this place, in those words, Matt. xii. 52, "which speaks of a wise scribe that bringeth forth out of his treasures things new and old." Others apply new and old unto those virtues that are only from faith, hope, and charity, and the like, and which the Lord had bestowed on him. But, I think, it may most aptly be accommodated to the spiritual gifts, which were newly bestowed upon the church by the Holy Ghost, after our Lord went to heaven: and the temporal blessings, which they enjoyed before: which were now all reserved for him, to be employed in his service. And so these words seem to me to have a respect unto Ps. cx. 3, where it is said, "In the day of his power, they should be a people of freewill-offerings." For when men give up themselves to God sincerely, they readily devote all they have to his uses; when he hath occasion for it. And thus the first Christians at Jerusalem did; who brought all their goods into his treasury: and other nations afterward made plentiful oblations as need required; thereby fulfilling another prophecy, Ps. lxxxi. 10, 15. Unto which megadim may have respect: for such precious things as silver and gold, as well as the excellent fruits of trees, are called by this name; as may be seen Deut xxxiii. 12—16.

CHAPTER VIII.

I O that thou wert as my brother, that sucked the breasts of my mother! when I should find thee without, I would kiss thee; yea, I should not be despised.

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.—The first four verses belong to the end of the foregoing chapter; wherein the spouse continuing her ardent desire to see his kingdom enlarged, he agrees to it. And then begins (ver. 5) the ninth and last part of this song: in which all the persons speak in their turns. Her friends admiring her new advancement; and the spouse declaring the mighty power of love, whereby she had attained it and hoped to keep it, and was made desirous to propagate it unto those that wanted it (ver. 6, 8). Which the bridegroom favour'd

2 I would lead thee, and bring thee into my mother's house, who would instruct me: I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate.

(ver. 9); and they all promising greater industry in his service, he testifies his acceptance of it, and she her longing to see all this accomplished (ver. 10, 11, &c.).

Spouse.

Ver. 1. And now, having finished this blessed work, I hope to gain more intimate fellowship with thee. I cannot but wish, at least, to be made so happy as to have thy gracious presence always with me: and, by familiar acquaintance and conversation, to be so united with thee, that I may not be ashamed openly to own my love; but look upon it as an honour to 3 His left hand should be under my head, and his right hand should embrace me.

4 I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, until he please.

5 Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved? I raised thee up under the apple tree: there thy mother brought thee forth: there she brought thee forth that bare thee.

6 ¶ Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame.

7 Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give make a public profession of my relation to thee. See Annot. [e].

Ver. 2.] Whereby I would carry the knowledge of thee from place to place, till I had introduced thee into the acquaintance of my nearest kindred: which would enlarge my knowledge, and make new discoveries; and cause no less joy unto thee, and unto all the world, to see them give entertainment to thee. See Annot. [f].

Ver. 3.] And thanks be to his goodness, I feel him communicating the power of his spirit to me: which is the greatest token of his love; and then works most strongly in our hearts, when he sees them fullest of love to him. See Annot. [g].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 1.] Who, with his wonted care, or rather with a more earnest concern than ever, repeats his charge to my companions: saying, I conjure you to take heed, lest you discompose, or give the least disturbance to this love; but let it enjoy its satisfaction to the height of its desires. See Annot. [d]

Daughters of Jerusalem.

Ver. 5.] And who can choose but admire at the power of love! which hath advanced her to such a degree of greatness, that it diminishes these things belied, and makes them say, Who is this that, out of a low condition, is raised to such familiarity with her beloved, that she leans upon his arm; being made one with him, and enjoying all manner of happiness in his love! Which I have excited towards me, saith she, by the pains I took in thy service, when I laboured in the country plantations (vii. 11, 12); such pains as thy mother felt, when she travailed with thee, and brought thee forth out of her womb. See Annot. [h].

Spouse.

Ver. 6.] Place me, therefore, hereafter so near unto thy heart, that I may never slip out of thy mind; but constantly receive fresh marks and tokens of thy love and favour: deny not this suit, which proceeds from most fervent love; which can no more be resisted than death, and is as inexorable as the grave; especially when it flames to the degree of jealousy, and is afraid of losing what it loves; then it necessarily torments the soul, if it be not satisfied; it wounds incurably; it burns and rages with such a violent and unextinguishable heat, as I feel in my breast, now that it is mightily moved by the Lord. See Annot. [i].

Ver. 7.] Though fire may be quenched, yet love cannot; no, not by the greatest difficulties, nay, troubles and sufferings: which, though they come pouring in continually, are so far from being able to suppress it, that they cannot abate it; nor translate it to any other, from the person it loves: for, as it is inestimable in itself, so it cannot be purchased by money; nor they whom it possesses part with it for the greatest estate that they might enjoy without it; but perfectly scorn and reject such profilers. See Annot. [j].

Ver. 8.] And as for those that want it, or in whom it is but just kindled, it makes us very solicitous what we shall do for them; particularly for one that is as dear to us as a sister; but of a small growth in this most desirable quality; and therefore not capable of that happiness which we enjoy: what shall we do for her, when it shall be said, The time is come that she should be disposed of in marriage; and yet it shall be said withal, that she is not fit for it! See Annot. [k].

Ver. 9.] We will not despair of her; nor cast her off; but be both patient with her, and do our utmost to make her such as we desire: let her but be faithful and constant, and we will do for her as we do for a wall that is low; which we pull not down, but build up higher, and adorn also with fair and goodly curtains; or as we do with the door of a noble house; which, if it be too weak or too mean, we spare no cost to mend it, but enclose in a case of cedar. See Annot. [l].

Little Sister.

Ver. 10.] And our labour, I foresee, will not be lost; for I hear her say, I am such a wall; and my breasts rise and grow big like such turrets: I am no longer of a low and despible stature, nor unmeet for his love; but from this time forth I shall be acceptable unto him, and find such favour with him, as to enjoy all the happiness which he imparts to those that are most dear unto him. See Annot. [m].

Ver. 11.] Which I will endeavour to answer by my best diligence in his service; and from thence still promise myself a greater increase of happiness; for though great persons let out their lands to others, as king Solomon doth the vineyard he hath in Baal-hamon unto several tenants, from every one of which he receives a vast revenue, besides the gain, which they have to themselves as a reward of their labour (ver. 12). See Annot. [n].

Ver. 12.] Yet I will not commit the vineyard which I am intrusted withal, to the care and management of other persons; but cultivate it myself, with my utmost industry; my own eye shall be ever upon it, 18 Thou that dwellest in the gardens, the companions hearken to thy voice: cause me to hear it.

and I will let nothing be wanting for its improvement; and therefore, if he receive so much profit, besides the benefit that accrues to others, what fruit may not I expect from a far better soil than his, and from far greater pains and providence that I will use about it? See Annot. [a].

Bridegroom.

Ver. 13.] Which coming to the ears of her beloved, he said to her, in the presence of all that waited on her, Thou hast taken up a worthy resolution: nothing can be that will not be so happy, as to see thy habitation in thy vineyard: nor canst thou possibly be better employed, to thy own as well as my content, than about the gardens (vi. 2) committed to thy charge; and therefore ask what thou wilt of me, and I will thee before all thy companions, who are witnesses of what I say, I will do it for thee. See Annot. [n].

Spouse.

Ver. 14.] I have nothing to desire but this, that thou, who art my only beloved, wouldest come and accomplish all these things: make all the speed, that is possible, to come and save us, and perfect thy loving-kindness always as it is said, to the swiftest creatures make to save themselves from danger; let nothing hinder this; but thy love, which makes all things sweet and easy, overcome the greatest difficulties in thy way to us. See Annot. [e].

ANNOTATIONS.

[a] Ver. 1.] This verse, at first sight, looks like a repetition of the same desire wherewith he began this book; that they might be so happy, as to see the Messiah appear, though it were but in his infancy; which would transport them with joy, &c. And thus the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it, of the time when the Messiah shall be revealed to the congregation of Israel.

If we consider what follows, it will be more reasonable to connect it with what went before: and to take it for a most ardent expression of love to the person before spoken of, with a desire to have more intimate familiarity with him; such as a sister hath with a brother when he is a sucking child; whom, if she met in the street she would not be ashamed to take out of the nurse's arms into her own, and openly kiss; and not imagine she should thereby incur any reproach or contempt.

This seems to be the most literal sense of the words; which may be applied to the open profession of Christianity, with the greatest confidence and security; nothing being more innocent and harmless than the love and service wherein it engages its disciples to their Lord and master, Christ. Who the more obedient any person is to God's commands, holds that man or woman the nearer to him; even as dear as a "brother, sister, or mother" (Matt. xii. 50). Which (saith Grothus upon that place) is the mystical sense of the Song of Songs (see more in my Preface).

[b] Ver. 2.] This dear Lord (i.e. the knowledge of him) she desires here to carry still farther; till she had brought him into the house, that is, into the family of her mother. Which may be applied unto the design of God to awaken the Jews to believe on Christ, by bringing in the fulness, that is, a vast number of the gentiles (Rom. xi. 25). Which the apostle saith there (ver. 15), would be "life from the dead:"

unto which the last words of this verse may be accommodated.

For after she had said she would lead him or bring him down; and then bring him into the house of her mother; she adds, thou shalt teach or instruct me. Which agrees with what the apostle there writes (ver. 12), that the fall of the Jews was the riches of the gentiles; that is, enriched them with the treasures of divine wisdom and knowledge, how much more would their fulness enrich them? If we refer this clause (as we do) to mother before named, the best sense I can make of it is this. By whom I was educated and instructed. And then follows her making him drink of spiced wine (that is, making a feast for him, Prov. xi. 2, where the most excellent wine made the chiefest part of the entertainment), such wine as makes those who are asleep to speak (vii. 9). Which effect, the receiving of the Jews again will produce; as the apostle tells us when he saith, it shall be life from that which is death (Col. iii. 3). i.e. a most powerful argument to culminate the most stupid souls, and move them to believe in Christ.

Certain it is that herabach, spiced or aromatic wine, denotes its fragrancy or delicious odour; whereby the best wines are discerned, as much as by their taste: and the word we translate "juice" signifies everywhere, in the Hebrew tongue, as it never were, whereby the prophets set forth something that works with greater power and efficacy than ordinary (Zech. ix. 17). And here, I doubt not, relates to something new and unusual: and in the mystical application, may signify a greater fulness and power of the Spirit, than had been in former days; working like new wine in the hearts of those that received the gospel.

And this is said to be done to him, because, as Theodoret noted before, what is done to his members, he takes as done to himself.

[c] Ver. 3.] Who is here represented as immediately condescending to her desires, and fulfilling her wishes: vouchsafing a new supply of the power of the Spirit to transport and comfort her in those labours of love for his name's sake. Which were so great, that she is represented here as spent and fainting away. So she had done before, ii. 6, where see the meaning of these words.

[d] Ver. 4.] This verse hath also been twice used before; with no difference from what we read here, but that now the mention of krukh and race is left out: and yet he charges them with greater reverence than ever. For the Hebrew phrase here signifies, as much as what do you do, why do you stir, &c., that is, by no means; take heed how you disturb her (see ii. 7, iii. 5).

[e] Ver. 5.] This seems to be the voice of her companions, or "daughters of Jerusalem," mentioned in the very beginning (and begins the last part of this song), admiring the new change they saw in her. For she was represented before as coming out of the wilderness (iii. 6), but not as "leaning upon her beloved:" as she is here. Which signifies her advancement unto a state of greater dearness to him, and familiarly with him.

The word mikreppeloth is not found elsewhere, and therefore variously translated by interpreters. But most agree that it signifies, either closely adhering, or leaning, relying, and recumbent, as they speak: which L. De Dieu hath shown is the use of the word in the neighbouring languages. But there are those who think it imports something of pleasure (and therefore the Vulgar takes in that sense with the other, as I have in the paraphrase), and translate it, "flowing with the delights." For she having been in the fields and villages, visiting the vineyards, and other places (vii. 11—13), is now introduced as coming back from thence, into the royal city. Which being seated on high, in comparison with the plains out of which she came, she is said to ascend, or go up, but, that she might not be tired with the journey, is represented as "leaning upon the arm of her beloved" (or, as some will have it, "lying in his bosom," as St. John did in our Saviour's), and laden with the delicious fruit before mentioned (vii. 13). Which excited the admiration of all that knew her, when they beheld the grace of her heart towards her: togedther with her own beauty, riches, ornaments, and happiness.

The latter part of this verse, all the Greek fathers take to be the bridgroom; and so do many of the Latins. But some of them, and all the Hebrew writers, take them to be the words of the spouse; because thee is of the masculine gender. Whichever way we take them, the sense is very hard to find. If we go the first way, the most natural sense seems to be, that he puts her in mind of the poor and mean condition out of which he had taken her, into a state of the greatest friendship with him: that she might not be thereby put off, with the acclamations which were made to her.

But I have followed the Hebrew points in my paraphrase, and understood the words of stirring up his love towards her, when they were looking after the plantation mentioned vii. 11, 12. Which was excited by the care and pains she took in that business; like the pains of a woman in travail: unto which St. Paul compares the solicitude and care he had about the Galatians, that "Christ might be formed in them" (iv. 19).

Certain it is that eilbelath a word which relates to the pangs of travelling women, and therefore the LXX. translate it ἁγήθησας; so that if I have not conjectured amiss about the rest, my interpretation of the last words is natural enough. For ἐγερθῆναι similitudinis (as they call it) is frequently omitted in the scripture, and to be supplied in the sense. Twice in this very book it is wanting, v. 15, vii. 4; "thy eyes are doves;" that is, as doves. And in Prov. xvii. 21, and in his father's words, very often, Prov. xvi. 22, "How say you to my soul, Flee a bird (i.e. as a bird) to your hill!" And to omit other places, cxix. 119, "Thou puttest as all the wicked of the earth doors;" i.e. as or like doors.

In like manner I take the last words of this verse, "there (viz. I stirred thee up) as thy mother travailed in birth with thee, there, I say, like her that brought thee forth:" i.e. by such pains as these I raised up thy love to me.

As for what is said by many interpreters, concerning Eve's eating the apple in paradise, and thereby ruining all mankind; there is no reason to think, either that she is the mother here meant, or that topparch denotes an apple, rather than orange, citron, or such-like fruit.

[8] Ver. 6.] The words, according to the Hebrew points, are the words of the spouse; beseeching her beloved to keep her always in his mind, as one very dear to him. For that was the end of having the name, or the picture, of a beloved person engraved on a seal, or jewel, and wearing it next the heart, or upon the arm; that it might testify their great esteem of such persons, and the constancy of their affection towards them, and that they desired they might never slip out of their memory (see Jer. xxxii. 24). So that this verse is an allusion to the high-priest; who carried the names of the children of Israel engraven in precious stones, not only upon his breast, but upon his shoulders also; as may be seen, Exod. xxviii. 11, 12, 21, and this, "for a memorial before the Lord continually," ver. 29. (Which interpretation may be confirmed by the words of the son of St. John, Ecclus. xlv. 11, who saith, "Aaron was adorned with precious stones, graven like seals.") And they think withal, that "seal upon the heart" relates to the inward affection; and "seal on the arm," to the outward expression of love and esteem.

And then follows the reason of this prayer; which proceeded from the remembrance of her love, which he had grown to her in the height of jealousy (which is nothing but the highest degree of love), lest she should lose him, as she had been in danger before (v. 6, &c.).

This love is said to be "as strong as death;" which is admirably expressed by Maximus Tyrius, dissert. 10. "Wild beasts are not terrible to it, nor fire, nor precipices, nor the sea, nor the sword, nor the hailers, οὐδα καὶ τά ἄρματα οὐδὲ πυρωστάτα, &c., but even the most unpassable difficulties are got over by it; the hardest things are presently mastered; the most frightful easily surmounted," &c.; it is everywhere confident, overbids all things, overpowers all things, &c. But none express this like St. Paul, Rom. viii. 35—37, &c.

There is no difficulty but in the last clause of the verse for (as "strong as death," signifies to be insuperable; so "cruel as the grave," denotes it not to be moved by prayers and entreaties, or anything else); where the word ἐξοπλασθήσεται should not be translated "the equals thereof," but the "arrows thereof are arrows of fire." That is, it shoots into the heart, wounds it, and burns there: nay, infames it vehemently by the wound it gives: as the reverend and learned Dr. Hammond hath observed upon Ps. lxxvi. 3. And so the LXX., seem here to understand it, when they translate it ἐξοπλασθῆσεται, its feathers, or wings, wherein it flies, "are wings of fire. Which wings or arrows of fire, are said, in the last words of all, to be a "most vehement flame;" or rather it should be thus translated, "which are the flames of the fire of the Lord." So the Hebrew word seems to signify, being compounded of three words, fire, flame, and the Lord: denoting mighty, and exceeding scorecloth, and kindled with the love of the Lord. This is found in other parts of the Bible (Jer. ii. 31), but in the Punic language also, as Bochartus shows in his Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 15. Some translate it, "Such flames are kindled only by the Lord. And then, if there be an allusion to the breastplate of the high-priest, in the beginning of the verse, I fancy the conclusion may allude to the fire that went out from before the Lord" (Lev. ix. 21), and devoured the sacrifices, as love doth all manner of difficulties. This fire was to burn perpetually upon the altar, and never be suffered to go out (Lev. vi. 12), and therefore the best emblem of love that could be found.

[6] Ver. 7.] For it is unextinguishable, as it here follows, "Many waters cannot quench love." Which is a metaphor whereby profane authors also have set forth the mighty, inconquerable power of love, τίς ο δ ψαυτός ἐμπυρώσης, &c., "What new kind of confiscation is this!" saith Philostratus in one of his epistles; I say, Aaron was ready to call for water, and therefore he knew none to bring it, ὅτι τῶσομαι νῦν τοῖς ἑλέους τῆς φύσης ἀπὸρωστά, for a quencher of this fire is the most impossible to be found. If one bring it from the fountain, or if he take it out of the river, it is all one; for the water itself is burnt up by love.

By many waters are sometimes meant, in scripture, the river of heaven, Ps. cxlv. 5.
many afflictions (as is very well known), which they that love, frequently endure, before they can accomplish their desire. But though there should be an inundation of them, we are told they cannot overflow them: as the word they translate “drowned” signifies, but it will still live and be uppermost, and prevail.

And such is its constancy, and satisfaction also, which it hath in its own pleasures, it regards not riches at all; but will rather be poor with one whom it affects, than enjoy great possessions with another person. Nay, it despises, and that with disdain, the offers of a man’s whole estate; if that condition be imposed, of forsaking its love. Others may laugh, perhaps, at such persons; but, it is all one, they smile at them again. So Theodoret, and the LXX. understand the latter part of this verse, “if a man give away all his substance in charity, they will extremely despise him.” That is, saith he, they that spend all they have, and their very lives, for the love of God, are set at naught by those that want such love. Other interpretations of these words I have expressed in the paraphrase.

[f] Ver. 8. Here is another property of divine love, that God’s house and collections for those that want it; or have but the beginning of it, will not be in danger to lose them. And this seems to be the speech of the spouse to her companions, who were all troubled for a sister (that is, some church), which was of a small growth, and had no breads; that is, was not ripe for marriage. For all have breasts; but they do not all increase even, till they are of such an age that they may be called women of the church, xvi. 7. The interpreter inquires there what they should do for her, “in the day when she shall be spoken for!” that is, demanded in marriage. Or, “when there shall be speech concerning her,” that is, concerning this defect of hers.

[2] Ver. 9. Here he returns an answer to that question: which is, that he and they will take the greater care for her; to raise her stature, and to bring her to perfection. For where there are good beginnings, we are not wont to forsake them: but rather to add to them and improve them. As, for example, the wall of a building which we esteem, we do not suffer to fall to the ground, but strengthen and raise it: nay, adorn it somewhat, and beautify it with towers and pinnacles; which was not for the wall’s sake, but to appear more gloriously. Or, if it be a door of a house, which we value, we let it not decay; but rather case it with boards of cedar, to make it more durable, as well as neat and handsome: for cedar is not apt to putrefy.

This seems to me the most simple exposition of these words; and I do not think fit to trouble the reader with that vast variety, which may be found in interpreters. But only add, that they may very naturally be applied unto a soul, or a church in a state of imperfection: but built upon Christ the foundation: in this manner, "Let her but be firm and constant, like a wall, in her love to me, and I will not abandon the care of her; let her but exclude all other, and open to me alone, and she shall never want any thing necessary to her perfection: for I will richly adorn her, and make her like the house of God himself; which is lined with cedar.”

[F] Ver. 10. And then this verse may be thus applied (being her answer): “I am resolved to do what thou requir’st (to be steadfast and faithful), and already perceive the reward of my fidelity,” &c. For these words plainly relate to the foregoing, as I have expressed in the paraphrase: unto which I shall add nothing; for if that be admitted, there is no difficulty in them. It being known to everybody, that shalom, “peace,” signifies all manner of happiness in the Hebrew language: which is included also in our English word favour, whereby we there translate it. For it signifies all the good things, that may be expected from the favor of life, or the favor of a person.

[2] Ver. 11. And being thus favoured by him, she now promises her diligence (in this and the next verse) to do him the best service, and to make the greatest improvements she could, of the talents committed to her. For though Solomon (she here saith) let out his vineyard, which he had in Baal-hamon, a place near Jerusalem, as Aben Ezra tells us (which is followed by most interpreters, few thinking it to be near En-gedi), where abundance of people had vineyards, and he a very large one: for it being let to several farmers, every one paid him a “thousand pieces of silver,” i. e. shekels (as much as to say, it brought him a thousand shekels); which is for a “parcel,” or a “portion” as is a sum of perfection, Ps. exi. 13; Micah vi. 2, and other places, and the number of farmers or tenants, though not expressed, some think to be ten; yet she takes upon another resolution, which she expresses in the next verse.

[m] Ver. 12. Where she saith she will herself look after the vineyard committed to her trust, and not leave it to the care of others. Which seems to be the meaning of her parable: “My vineyard which I have before me;” i. e. under my eye (as we speak) and special care. Thus God’s judgments are said to be before David (Ps. xviii. 29); that is, he took great care never to swerve from them.

It amounts also to the same sense, if we take this phrase to signify as much as, it is in my power (Gen. 20:1; Jer. xi. 4). For there was no man kept it in her own hand, or occupation, and did not farm it out to others.

And then the last part of the verse signifies, that if Solomon made such a profit of his vineyard as that before named (besides two hundred shekels, which each of the farmers got over and above for their pains), though he do not express it himself, what would be the increase that she was likely to make by her own care and diligence in the business! That is, it was incredible what fruit she would reap by her pains; according to that of the son of Sirach (Eccles. xxiv. 31, &c.), “I said I will water my best garden, and I will water abundantly my garden-bed; and lo, my brook became a river, and my river became sea,” &c.

This seems to me the most natural sense of these two difficult verses, which Almazir suggested to my thoughts. And that Solomon, not any other person, is here intended, Malmedides himself agrees; who, in his treatise of the Foundation of the Law, ch. vii., hath these words: “Whereas you meet with the name of Solomon, in the book of Canticles, it is holy; as the rest of the names there are: save only in that place, A thousand are to thee, O Solomon,” &c. Others also add that place (Cant. iii. 7), “Behold his bed, which is Solomon’s,” &c. Where the masters say, it is a common name, as well as here.

These two verses are ingeniously applied by some, to the far greater increase of knowledge and goodness in the church than in the Synagogue: that is, by Christianity than by Judaism.

[n] Ver. 13. This verse, according to the Hebrew points, is the voice of the bridegroom: who seems to commend the resolution she made, in the foregoing verse. And he calling her “the inhabitant of the gardens” (which are the same with the vineyard before mentioned), she signifies her perpetual care about their prosperity. In recompense of which, he bids her, before they finish this interview, to ask what she will of him, and it shall be done for her. Which, in short, is the sum of what the same Almonazar hath long ago conjectured to be the sense of this place.

[3] Ver. 14.] Unto which she returns her answer in these words, and so shuts up this Song. Which seems to me to conclude as it began; with a desire that the Messiah would come, and make good all those things that had been represented in these ruptures.

The word berach, which we translate "make haste," is twice translated by the LXX. δικτεικαι, to go, or run through, to the very end (Exod. xxvi. 38, xxxvi.
32). And, no doubt, denotes here most vehement and restless endeavors in a speedy course: like that of a roe, buck, or wild goat, rather; whose agility, both in running and jumping, is celebrated by all authors, and said to be such as is scarce credible.

The young hart (called here ophir) is still more swift and nimble than the old; the exceeding great fear wherein it is adding wings (as we speak) to its feet.
Whence Xenophon saith, there is nothing comparable to their swiftness when the old ones are absent, and they are pursued by dogs: τοις ταξις ὁδί τιξον, &c.,
"then there is no speed like" to that of such young harts, as his words are quoted by Bochartus.

Who well observes (lib. iii. cap. 17, par. 1. De Anima), that the sense of the last words ("upon the mountains," &c.), is to be made out by adding one word, in this manner: "Be thou like the young harts running (or when they run) upon the mountains of spices;" i.e. the mountains where spices grow; such as those mentioned lv. 6. Such, perhaps, was Bether (ii. 17, where we meet with these words before), and I have sometimes thought, that they should be so translated here, "the mountains of Besamin:" as there
"the mountains of Bether."

But what these mountains were we are now ignorant, though this is certain, that the creatures here mentioned were bred in the highest mountains of the country; as Ellem testifies in the latter end of his fifth book: "The harts in Syria are bred in their highest mountains, Amanus, Libanus, and Carmel."
For there they were safest and most secure from danger; there it was difficult to pursue them, especially when they climbed up the steepest places.
And therefore the psalmist and the prophet Habakkkuk, when they would represent themselves as in a state of perfect security, say, God had "made their feet like hinds' feet, and made them to walk upon their (lambeth) high places" (Ps. xviii. 33, Hab. iii. ult.). Which words allude to the inaccessible mountains, which those creatures frequented; especially the females, that they might there secure their young ones. Besides, as there they could feed and bring forth their young most securely; so there was the sweetest feeding.

In short, Solomon here seems to long for the first coming of the Messiah, as St. John doth for his last:
who concludes his book of the Revelation in the same manner as Solomon doth this: saying, "Come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. xxii. 20).

There are those who fancy, that in the foregoing verse the bridgework asks her consent, for the perfecting their love in marriage; and desires her, in the audience of her companions, to lift up her voice, and sing the nuptial hymn: which she now, say they, in this verse, professes herself to be ready to do, if he would but be present with her, and assist and direct her to do it aright. And then it is thus applied and paraphrased by the forenamed Almonazar:—

"Thou commandest me that I should with morning and evening hymns and songs celebrate thy omnipotent wisdom and goodness, &c.; vouchsafe, then, speedily to adjoint the eternal force and flame of thy Holy Spirit unto my voice; that, in spirit, and truth, and sanctity of heart, I may sing thy praises: and, not only with my mouth and sound, but in my mind and heart especially, worthily worship thy incomprehensible majesty."

Whence it is, that the church, being moved by a divine inspiration, saith thus in all her prayers:

"O Lord, open thou our lips: And our mouth shall show forth thy praise.
O God, make speed to save us.
O Lord, make haste to help us." Amen.

END OF BISHOP PATRICK'S COMMENTARY, &c.
COMMENTARY

UPON THE

PROPHECY OF ISAIAH.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE AND RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, JONATHAN,
Lord Bishop of Winchester, and Prelate of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

My Lord,

The chief design of the following work, which I humbly offer to your Lordship, is to assert the ancient and catholic sense of several texts of the prophet, whom I undertake to explain, and to transcribe them from some novel expositions, which tend to deprive the Christian religion of the benefit of so considerable a testimony; and I humbly beg leave to present to your Lordship this small acknowledgment of my duty and observance, as a member of your cathedral, and minister of a parish church of your diocese and patronage, and to which your Lordship hath been pleased to be a benefactor, when it lately suffered under a great calamity.

How mean soever the performance may be, I hope the design of it may in some measure recommend it to your Lordship's patronage, which is to illustrate this evangelical prophet, who, by the general consent of former ages, hath been placed at the head of that noble order: a person whose supernatural gift of prophecy added a new lustre to the greatness of his birth, and whose liberal education furnished him with a noble eloquence, and suitable to the dignity of his argument.

The same Holy Spirit who sometimes spake to the world by shepherds and fishermen, that the excellency of the truths delivered by them might appear to be of God, and not of themselves, at other times made choice of the pen of a David, a Solomon, and an Isaiah, to instruct us that the outward accomplishments of birth and fortune may be sanctified to higher purposes, and made instrumental in advancing the glory of God and the interests of religion.

That your Lordship may continue to employ the advantages of your great station and quality to God's honour and the service of his church, is the hearty prayer of,

My Lord,
Your Lordship's most dutiful and obedient servant,
WILLIAM LOWTH.

PREFACE.

There is no part of the holy scriptures that more deserves the thoughts of inquisitive men, than the writings of the prophets. God, in his word, hath offered suitable matter for the several capacities of men. The historical books instruct us in the methods of providence, and afford an agreeable entertainment to inquisitive minds, as they contain the most ancient records that are in the world, and relate the most remarkable occurrences that ever happened in it. Persons of ordinary understandings may find all necessary truths plainly delivered, and often repeated in the New Testament writings, and in the practical books of the Old : those of higher endowments may find sufficient employment in unfolding the types and figures of the Jewish economy, and in searching into the depths of the prophetic predictions. We may, indeed, find some prophecies plainly delivered with great exactness of time and particularity in circumstances (those especially which relate to the coming of the Messias), that, when the events came to pass, they might appear to be the effects of God's determinate counsel and foreknowledge. But the far greater part of the prophetic predictions are couched in symbols and sacred hieroglyphics (a way of conveying the abstruser parts of knowledge much used in the eastern countries), as it were on purpose to excite the curiosity of the ingenious, and reward the diligence of the industrious searchers after divine truth. Which we may add, that the metaphorical style of the prophets is very proper to inspire the minds of attentive readers with noble ideas of God's wisdom and providence, and to affect us with the most lively image of the glorious kingdom of God and Christ, the happiness of those that shall have a share in the triumphs of it, and the terribleness of those punishments which are denounced against such as will not have him to reign over them. And to encourage men in the searches of this kind, they will find such a harmony and correspondence between the figures and emblems whereby the prophets point out things to come, that the careful comparing of them with each other will afford the best clue to guide the attentive reader through the most difficult parts of their writings, and is likewise a surprising proof that they all wrote by the direction of one and the self-same Spirit.

This hath been in some measure attempted in the ensuing work, where the author hath used his utmost diligence to compare the text with such parallel passages, both of the Old and New Testament, which might any way conduce to the clearing up its sense: and he is willing to believe, that if he hath given any new light to the obscure and difficult passages of this prophet, it is chiefly by comparing the phrase and idiom of the text with other parallel places more exactly than hath hitherto been done by any commentator upon this prophet that he hath seen: and he desires the reader, that when he finds a more than ordinary difficulty, he would carefully consider the parallel texts there referred to, which to have set down at length would have enlarged this work beyond its due bounds.

The writings of the prophets unfold the methods of providence in many remarkable instances: such as are God's disposal of kingdoms and governments, and making use of wicked princes and nations to be the instruments of his justice in punishing others as bad or worse: the gradual discovery of the coming of the Messias, and the several steps and advancements by which God introduced his kingdom into the world, and will still carry it on till the consummation of all things. These speculations must needs afford great entertainment to men of curious and inquisitive tempers, and be matter of delight as well as instruction. These reasons, as they should encourage those to the study of the prophetical writings who have any talents for such an employment, especially those whose profession engages them to search the scriptures: so they should recommend any attempt that is made towards the farther explaining of so considerable a part of the holy scriptures. For after all the pains that hath been taken in clearing up the sense of these sacred books, by persons excellently qualified for such an undertaking, still there is room left for farther endeavours in that kind. For there is a treasure of heavenly wisdom contained in them, that can never be exhausted: and as it is highly reasonable to believe that some parts of the Old Testament prophecies reach to the end of the world, so it is as reasonable to expect, that in every age Providence should open some new scene which will give farther insight into the meaning of those sacred writings.

I confess I can by no means approve of the opinion of some learned men, who are for trumping the sense of the prophets, and confining it within as narrow a compass as they can, and will needs maintain that the prophets scarce foresaw any thing but what was to come to pass in or near their own time. I must own myself puzzled to assign a reason why God should appoint a succession of prophets to foretell what should come to pass within the compass of about three hundred years (for within that time most of these prophets lived whose writings make up that part of the scripture canon which is called by that name), and take no notice of any other occurrences which should happen in succeeding times; whereas to extend the prophetic views to the end of the world, seems much more agreeable to that description of God's prescience which the holy writers give us, that "he declares the end from the beginning" (Isa. xlv. 10), and "his wisdom reaches from one end of the world to the other mightily, and sweetly does it order all things" (Wisd. viii. 1). So that even when the whole mystery of God's dispensations shall be finished, it will appear that nothing is contained in them but what God hath formerly "declared to his servants the prophets," as it is expressly affirmed, Rev. x. 7.

For a farther proof of this assertion, I desire it may be considered, that the prophecies which foretell the visibility and universality of Christ's church, accompanied with perfect peace, prosperity, and holiness, cannot, with any probability, be said to have as yet received their accomplishment, as neither have those predictions which foretell the flourishing state of the Jewish church and nation in the latter times. And to suppose these prophecies to have already received their utmost completion, is, in my judgment, to give too great an advantage to the Jews, and in effect to acknowledge that they never were, nor will be, fulfilled in their natural and obvious sense. Whereas, on the other side, to assert that many prophecies relating to the Messias are already fulfilled in our Lord Jesus Christ, a truth that can be made out beyond all contradiction; and withal to maintain that several others concerning the same subject relate to his second coming, and their accomplishment shall usher in or accompany that his glorious appearance; I say, the observing this distinction between the different times wherein the several prophecies relating to the coming of Christ shall be fulfilled, effectually answers all the arguments which the Jews make use of to support themselves in their incredulity; it discovers a perfect harmony and correspondence between the prophecies of the Old and New Testament, and it gives us an agreeable view of a more flourishing state of the church than the world has yet been blessed with, and thereby engages us to use our best endeavours to restore the church to its primitive purity, wherever we find it defective.

These considerations at first engaged me to attempt a commentary upon the prophet Isaiah; who, as he is the first and principal of the prophets

COMMENTARY
UPON THE LARGER AND LESSER PROPHETS: BEING A CONTINUATION OF BISHOP PATRICK.

BY WILLIAM LOWTH, B.D.
PREBENDARY OF WINCHESTER.

in order, so he hath had the honour of being styled the evangelical prophet by the Christian church, because he foretold the coming and kingdom of the Messias with greater clearness than any of the rest. But he will have but little pretence to that title if we follow some men's notions, which have been lately renewed and zealously maintained by Mr. Samuel White, in his commentary upon this prophet; where he all along supposes that the far greatest part of this prophecy relates only to the times in which the prophet lived, and those that succeeded till the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. Indeed, he is willing to allow the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah to have been fulfilled only in our Saviour; but, according to his hypothesis, that prophecy must come in very abruptly, without any connection upon what went before, or what follows. To do him all the justice I can, I must own, that in his preface he asserts a double meaning of many prophecies; one more immediately relating to the present circumstances of things in or near the prophet's own time; the others having more distant views upon the state of the gospel times. But this general design in his argument, as to the chapters, and in his note whenever an occasion is offered, is to run down and ridicule the spiritual and mystical sense of particular texts or prophecies, and to accuse the commentators who have asserted it, as making a noise of wax of the scriptures, and forcing the words to an unnatural and improper signification (see his argument on ch. lxvi. as also on xxi., xxxvi., lv., lx., lxxi., and his notes upon xxx. 25, xlii. 2, xlix. 9, lx. 7). Now these assertions are a direct contradiction to the manner of interpreting the Old Testament prophecies made use of by Christ and his apostles in the New; where we find our Saviour applies several of the ancient prophecies to himself; and the apostles frequently assert, that all things happened to the Jews in figures, that their ordinances were parables (τα ἐν τοῖς σχηματισμοῖς τῶν νόμων), Heb. ix. 11) or allegories with respect to the times of the gospel; that the Christian church is the true Israel of God, and all the privileges appropriated to the Jewish nation in the Old Testament, as God's segullah, or peculiar people, do in a more eminent manner appertain to the church of Christ, which is that true kingdom of God, the Jerusalem coming down from heaven, of which the earthly Jerusalem, and the temple there, was only a type and figure.

These rules for interpreting the ancient prophecies laid down by the apostles, ought to be a standard for all Christians to square their interpretations by, as being delivered by those who had the γνῶσις or that especial gift of the Spirit, which enabled them to explain the prophecies of the Old Testament, and apply them to the times of the New. This is that public or authentic interpretation of the scripture prophecies that St. Peter opposes to a private interpretation, 2 Pet. i. 20 (ἀπαραθέτηται). The word ἀπαραθέτηται properly signifies interpretation, being derived from ἄπαρα, which signifies to explain, Mark iv. 34. So Gen. xli. 12, “to each man according to his dream he did interpret.” It is in the Greek, ἀπαραθέτηται τὸ νῦννον, ἵνα ἰδῇς; that is, to such an interpretation is wholly owing to human wit or invention, or relates to private persons and transactions. Whereas, this public interpretation is taken from the “common analogy of faith” (Rom. xii. 6), and arises from “comparing spiritual things with spiritual” (1 Cor. ii. 13); i.e. the spiritual sense of the Old Testament writings with that of the New, and with one another. In which particular I cannot but look upon Mr. White’s exposition as very deficient, in that he scarce ever compares the phraseology of Isaiah with that of the other prophets, or with parallel texts of the New Testament; which one would think every Christian commentator should have a particular regard to in explaining the sense of the ancient prophecies.

The ancient Jews never contested this point with the Christians, but always acknowledged that the chief design of the prophets was to foretell the times of the Messias. And when Christ and his apostles explained the prophecies in a spiritual or mystical sense, they interpreted them according to the received notions of the synagogue, and are never taxed, that we can find, for misapplying the particular texts they alleged, as if they did not belong to the times of the Messias. The words of St. Peter do, in some measure, inform us from whence the Jews might receive these notions, 1 Pet. i. 11, 12, where he tells us, that the prophets who “searched diligently what, and what manner of time the spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory which should follow, had it revealed unto them, that not unto themselves, but to us they did minister the things” which the apostles preached. No doubt but they studied their own prophecies, and the Spirit of God so far assisted them and enlightened their minds, as to enable them to leave this key for the interpreting their own writings, and letting succeeding ages into the true meaning of them. And thus a traditionary explication of the Old Testament prophecies was carried down from the very time of the prophets to after ages.

Several arguments may be alleged to prove that these notions were generally received among the Jews long before Christ’s time: in the first place, we may argue from their admitting the Song of Solomon into their canon, which could have no pretence for being placed among the sacred writings, but only as it was supposed figuratively to set forth the spiritual marriage of Christ and his church. The same point may farther be proved from their ancient Targums and paraphrases upon the scripture, from the Mishna, and those mystical expositions of several texts which we read in the epistle of Barnabas, and which it is probable were taken out of some Midrasch, or authentic exposition of the scripture texts, as hath been observed by

ISAIAH.
Bishop Fell and other learned commentators upon that epistle. And though it should be granted, that some of those writings are not so old as the time of Christ and his apostles, yet this doth not invalidate the force of the argument, because those writings consist of traditional explications of scripture which the compilers took from the writings of former ages, just as, in aftertimes, the Greek Catena upon the scriptures were compiled out of the writings of the ancient fathers by authors of a later day.

It does not appear that this mystical way of applying the scripture prophecies to the times of the Messias was ever called in question, till the Jews came to engage in disputes with the Christians: and then, to avoid the force of their arguments, they found it necessary to reject the opinions of their ancestors. It was this consideration made Aquila and Thaddeus, apostates from Christianity to Judaism, to undertake a new translation of the Old Testament into Greek, because they thought the interpretation of the Septuagint too favourable to the Christians, having been framed according to the traditional explication of the sense of the prophets which had been received among the Jews time out of mind (see Bishop Pearson’s notes upon his Exposition of the second, third, and fourth Articles of the Creed; and Justin Martyr’s Dialogue against Trypho the Jew).

This Christian interpretation about the prophecies is called the mystical sense, because it helps to unfold the mysteries of the gospel, not as if it were always opposed to a literal sense. For in many cases what we call the mystical sense, more exactly answers the natural and genuine import of the words, than any other interpretation that can be given of them. To instance in that famous prophecy (Isa. vii. 14), “Behold, a virgin shall conceive,” &c. Supposing, but not granting, that this prophecy can be applied in a lower sense to Isaiah’s son, or any other person but Christ; yet it is plain, at first sight, that the historical sense which is commonly given of the words, to denote one that is now a virgin, but should afterwards marry and bear a son, comes infinitely short of the true force and meaning of them, and contains nothing in it that can deserve to be called a sign or wonder. This seems to have been a maxim in interpreting prophecies received among the Jews before Christ’s time, that wherever they observed an imperfect completion of a prophecy in the historical event, which no way answered the lofty expressions and extensive promises which the natural sense of the text imported, there they supposed the times of the Messias to be ultimately intended, “in whom all the promises of God are yea, and amen” (Scriptores divinarum de Typo disserentes, divinis quiddam ex inopinato pati solent, et ad Antitypum vehementiori Spiritus aflight Rapi et elevari.”) Spencer de Legib. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 8, n. 2).

To prevent any misunderstanding, it may be proper likewise to take notice, that this mystical sense of the prophecies is now and then, but not so fitly, called a secondary sense; not as if it were less principally intended by the prophets, but rather with respect to the time, because it is the last or ultimate completion of their predictions.

That many of the prophecies are not limited to one single event, but may have different views, and be capable of being fulfilled by several steps and degrees, is what I have all along supposed in the following commentary, and therefore here it will be proper to assign the reasons for such a supposition. This subject hath been handled by several learned men, and of late by Dr. Nich. Clagett. [My Lord Bacon has made and observation upon this subject which deserves to be taken notice of; in his Advancement of Learning, book ii., ch. 11. “In the interpretation of prophecies, that latitude must be allowed which is proper and familiar to divine prophecies, that their accomplishments may be both perpetual and punctual. For they resemble the nature of their author, to whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.” And though the fulness and height of their complements be many times assigned to some certain age or point of time, yet they have nevertheless certain stairs or scales of accomplishment throughout divers ages of the world.”]

I shall not repeat what hath been said already upon this argument, but only lay down some general reasons of this assertion.

I have already observed, that this opinion is agreeable to the sentiments of the Jews; the only point in which they differ from us is, whether the Messias, to whom the prophecies relate, be already come, or be yet to come. Therefore I shall not any longer insist upon that argument, but proceed to observe, that under the Old Testament all the most considerable persons and transactions there mentioned were typical, and prefigured the state of things under the Messias. Thus the New Testament informs us, that by Sarah and Hagar were allegorically represented the two covenants: by the preferring of Jacob before Esau, the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the gentiles; by the deliverance from the Egyptian bondage, the redemption of mankind by Christ, the “true passerover sacrificed for us:” that the Israelites passing through the Red sea did typify the sacrament of baptism; and their sojourning in the wilderness in their way to the promised land, was designed to signify that we are but “strangers and pilgrims” in this world, and must look upon heaven as the only true place of “rest which remains for the people of God.” In the characters the scriptures give us of Adam and Melchisedec, of Isaac and Joseph, of Moses and Joshua, of David and Solomon, of Eleakim and Jonah, of Cyrus and Zorobabel, they plainly describe them as figures of Christ: that several circumstances of their lives did forebode the most remarkable passages of his, and that the deliverances some of them wrought for God’s people were earnest of a greater redemption to be accomplished by the Messias. Several of the psalms, particularly the eighteenth and the hundred and eighteenth, were written upon particular occasions, relating to some remarkable circumstances of David’s life, as appears both by their titles (which, to be sure, are as ancient as the compiling the Old Testament canon), and by the general subject handled in them: and yet several passages out of these psalms are applied in the New Testament to Christ and the gospel, as more eminently fulfilled in them. From these principles we may conclude that there is a resemblance, or correspondence, between many of the transactions mentioned in the Old Testament and those which should come to pass under the New; and consequently, that the prophets, when they spoke of some events near their own times, probably had more distant views, which might reach even to the latter ages of the world.

This assertion, as it shows that fulness of sense contained in the scriptures, which Tertullian saith (advers. Hermog. cap. 22) "he did so much reverence and adore" (adoro scripture plentitudinem), so it introduces Christ into the world with a great deal of pomp and solemnity; whilst it makes the whole contrivance of the Jewish dispensation, and all the eminent persons of former times, as so many harbingers to prepare the way for his coming, and thereby raises in our minds a just veneration for the gospel state, as the master-piece of divine providence, that point wherein all the lines of God’s manifold wisdom do meet as in their centre; from whence it is evidently demonstrated that “Christ was ordained by God, before the foundation of the world,” though in his wise disposal he did not appear till the latter times of it. These providential congruities between the times of the Old and New Testament do very much confirm the authority of both Testaments; for they plainly show that they were written by the direction of one and the same Spirit, who hath therein discovered to us one entire scene of providence, which reaches from one end of the world to the other.

The apostles justify this way of interpreting scripture prophecies, by the interpretations they give us, both of the ancient prophecies and of our Saviour’s own predictions: of each of these I shall give a remarkable instance. That prophecy of Isaiah (lxi. 4), “He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows,” without question is principally to be understood of Christ’s undergoing the punishment due to our sins: but yet St. Matthew applies it to the pains which he took in healing men of their bodily infirmities, and his rendering his own life uneasy by the care and trouble he underwent to give ease to others (Matt. viii. 15). In like manner, that expression of our Saviour (John xvii. 12), “Those whom thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost,” was chiefly meant of Christ’s care to preserve his disciples in a firm belief of, and adherence to, those truths which he taught them; yet we find St. John applies the words to the care that Christ took of their safety when he yielded himself up to those that came to apprehend him (xviii. 9). From hence it appears that the holy writers themselves suppose, that the expressions of inspired persons may have several senses couched under the words.

The same may be affirmed of that prophecy of Christ concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, and the end of the world (Matt. xxiv.), in which it is hard to determine where our Saviour makes a transition from one subject to the other: this makes it probable that he had both these events in his eye together, and that several of his expressions were partly verified at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, but were more fully to be accomplished at the general judgment, of which that particular judgment was an earnest and forerunner.

The prophet Isaiah is certainly one of the most difficult of all the prophets, though perhaps few are sensible of it, but they that try to explain him: besides the want of ancient records to clear up some historical passages of his prophecy, a difficulty common to him with the rest of the prophets, there are some difficulties which do in a particular manner attend his writings. The profundity of his thoughts, the loftiness of his expressions, and the extent of this prophecy, have made the commentators hitherto written upon him fall short of a full explication of his book: and he that will undertake to fathom the depths of this prophecy, is in great danger of going out of his own. This prophet seems to have been favoured with an entire view of the gospel state, from the very birth of the Messias, to that glorious period when the “kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ.” Upon these accounts, as he deservedly holds the first rank in that noble order of prophets, so it may be hoped the candid reader will favourably receive any attempt that is made to give some farther light to this prophecy, how imperfect soever. And particularly, I would make one request to him, with which I shall conclude this preface, viz. that in those parts of this exposition where there is any mention made of the Jews being to be restored to their own land upon their conversion, and some other particulars relating to that glorious state of the church, which we may from prophetic grounds of scripture expect to come to pass in the latter times of the world, there he would not judge of what is said upon these obscure subjects as so many positive assertions, but only as probable conjectures, and such as the words of the text may fairly be supposed to favour. For in these and such like abstruse matters, which at present lie hid in their causes, and in the abyss of providence, a modest man should not pretend to be wise above that which is plainly and expressly written.

CHAPTER I.

1 The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah kings of Judah.

2 Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me.

3 The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider.

4 Ah sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evildoers, children that are corrupters: they have forsaken the Lord, they have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger, they are gone away backward.

5 "Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more: the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint.

6 From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it: but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores: they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment.

Ver. 1. The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz.] The two usual ways whereby God communicated his will to the prophets, were visions and dreams (Num. xii. 6). In vision the inspired person was awake, but his external senses were bound up, and as it were laid aside in a trance. Thus Balaam describes it as to himself, "Who saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open" (Num. xxiv. 16). It is called vision, not from any use made of corporeal sight, or that it is entertained with external objects; but because of the clearness and evidence of the things revealed, and the conformity this kind of inspiration bears to the information which the mind receives by corporeal sense. Though sometimes vision is accompanied with external representations; as when Isaiah saw the glory of the Lord "sitting in his temple" (vi. 1), and Ezekiel had the description and dimensions of the temple revealed to him in a vision (Ezek. xlv. 2), and St. John had a sight of the "new Jerusalem coming down from heaven" (Rev. xxi. 10).

Which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem.] His prophecy does chiefly relate to the kingdom of Judah, though he does accidentally speak of the ten tribes, as he does also of the Moabites, Egyptians, &c., the kingdom of Judah itself being concerned in the good or ill which befall their neighbours.

This probably was not the first vision which Isaiah had (see note on vi. 1), but is placed at the beginning of his book; because this and the four following chapters contain a general description of the state and condition of the Jews, under the several judgments which God liketh shall be brought upon them. This part of the preface or introduction to the rest of his prophecy.

Ver. 2. Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth:] An expression bespeaking men's attention (compare xxiv. 1; Deut. xxxii. 1; Micah i. 2, vi. 1, 2). It further signifies an appeal to the world, to angels, and to men (compare Deut. iv. 26, xxx. 19; Ps. l. 4). The holy writers sometimes appeal to inanimate things, to signify the evidence and undeniableness of the truth which they assert: so Joshua tells the Jews, "This stone shall be a witness to us" (Josh. xxvii. 19).

If have nourished and brought up children.] God's protection over his people is compared to the care that parents take in nursing and breeding up their children (see Deut. i. 31; Isa. xlvii. 3, 4, xlviii. 9).

Ver. 3. The holy writers send men to brute creatures for instruction, thereby to upbraid their stupidity (see Prov. vi. 6; Jer. viii. 7).

Ver. 5.] The end of God's judgments in this world is men's reformation; and since this people appears to be incorrigible, it is no reason to expect that he should try any further methods of discipline with them, but consume them all at once (see Nah. i. 9).
7 Your country is desolate, your cities are burned with fire: your land, strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate, as overthrown by strangers.

8 And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, as a besieged city.

9 Except the Lord of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Go- morrah.

10 ¶ Hear the word of the Lord, ye rulers of Sodom; give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorr.ah.

11 To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the Lord: I am full of the burnt offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he goats.

12 When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts?

13 Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting.

14 Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me; I am weary to bear them.

15 And when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you: yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear: your hands are full of blood.

16 ¶ Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil;

17 Learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow.

18 Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.

19 If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land:

20 But if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured with the sword: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

21 ¶ How is the faithful city become an harlot! it was full of judgment: righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers.

22 Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water:

23 Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves: every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards: they judge not the fatherless, neither doth the cause of the widow come unto them.

24 Therefore saith the Lord, the Lord of hosts, the mighty One of Israel, Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries, and avenge me of mine enemies:

25 ¶ And I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin:

26 And I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy councillors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, the faithful city.

27 Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness.

28 ¶ And the destruction of the transgressors commodating their differences. So God, upon the repentance or reformation of the people, engages to pass over their former transgressions, and to load them with the same grace and favour, as if they had never offended; for by their "sins being made white as snow," is meant, by a usual metonymy, the sinners themselves being thoroughly purged from guilt (compare Ps. ii. 7).

Ver. 21. ¶ How is the faithful city become a harlot? Cities are often represented under the resemblance of women (see Jer. vi. 2): as being mothers of their inhabitants: sometimes they are called virgins (see note on xxiii. 12). But when they turn lewd and vicious, they are styled harlots. This name is given to the heathen cities of Tyre (Isa. xxiii. 16), and Nineveh (Nahum iii. 4); but it is applied to Jerusalem chiefly with respect to that solemn covenant made between God and the Jews, often expressed in scripture by his being married to them (see Jer. iii. 14, xxxi. 29); and by idolatry they were guilty of the same falseness against God, as a woman is guilty of adultery; the sin of idolatry being commonly styled, "Going a whoring after other gods" (see Bishop Patrick's preface to his comment upon the Canticles).

It was full of judgment; This relates to the first, and the early settlement of the Jewish government, under the reigns of David and Solomon.

Ver. 22. Thy silver is become dross.] A proverbial phrase, signifying that there is nothing sincere or pure left among them; but the very best things, such as government and the administration of justice, have a great allowance made of them. (compare Jer. vi. 28, 30, Ezek. xxix. 18, 19.)

Thy wine mixed with water.] Another proverbial speech of the same importance; the LXX. render it more at large, οἱ τοῦ κυρίου χυμού τοῦ ὁδόν ἔηστιν,

"Thy vintners mix thy wine with water," whence κυρίου signifies to embace by a foreign mixture (see 2 Cor. ii. 17).

Ver. 23.] They rulers and magistrates are in a state of rebellion against God, and live upon injustice and rapine (see Hos. iv. 18, Micah iii. 11, vii. 3).

Ver. 24.] An expression borrowed from men's passions, who find some sort of ease and rest in their minds upon venting their anger on just occasions, or in bringing offenders to condign punishment; in like manner, God is described as feeling ease and satisfaction in executing his justice upon obstinate and incorrigible offenders (compare Ezek. v. 13, xvi. 42, xxii. 17). We may further observe, that God is never said to take pleasure in the punishment of any, but those who have filled up the measure of their iniquities (see Gen. xlix. 24, Lev. xi. 30): those whom he corrects in anger, as Jeremy expresses it. As to others, the rule of the same prophet holds, that "He doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men" (Lam. iii. 33), but even sympathizes with their calamities (compare Judg. x. 16, Isa. liii. 2). See ver. 23. ¶ I will turn my hand upon thee.] The phrase signifies to fall upon or punish those whom we had spared or conivied at before; see Ps. xxxi. 14, Zech. xiii. 7, 2 Sam. viii. 3, where the phrase is the same in the original, but otherwise understood by our interpreters, who translate it, "To recover his brother." And purely purge away thy dross, &c.] See ver. 22. This place foretells some great reformation (compare Mal. iii. 3), which shall be brought to pass by separating the bad from the good, and destroying those that are incorrigible (see Ezek. xx. 33, and notes upon iv. 3).

Ver. 26. ¶ I will restore thy judges as at the first.] These promises relate, at least in their primary sense, to the restoration of the Jews after the seventy years of captivity, when they had the face of a government restored to them: and their governors, Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, and others, were remarkable for their integrity. The expression seems to allude to those judges, whom God raised up to the Jews at their first settlement in the land of Canaan, to whom the prophet resembles these rulers, both because they were men of great piety and virtue; and because these latter did not affect the state and title of kings, till the latter times of the Jewish commonwealth. (Compare Jer. xxx. 20, 21.)

Afterward thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness.] This title is taken in its full extent, relates to more flourishing times of the church than the world hath yet seen (compare Zech. viii. 3, compared with ver. 20 of the same chapter: see likewise Isa. iv. 3, xxvi. 8, xi. 1, ix. 21, Zech. iii. 11-13).

Ver. 27.] When God shall redeem Zion, and restore those that truly turn to him, he will make a remarkable discrimination between the righteous and the wicked; God's judgments will be visible in punishing the latter, and his mercy in saving the former (see note on v. 15).

Ver. 28. ¶ For they shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired.] The sacrificing in groves and shady places was an ancient rite of idolatry. Learned men observe, by comparing Judg. ii. 12, with iii. 7, that Baal and Ashhtaroth are the same with Baalim and Asheroth, or the gods worshipped in groves. This kind of worship was expressly forbidden in the law (see Deut. xii. 3, xvi. 21): and yet prevailed so much in the times of the idolatrous kings, that the practice was not quite laid aside under religious princes (see Kings xv. 24, xxii. 43). But the captivity of the Jews had that good effect, that they scarce ever afterward relapsed into idolatry.
and of the sinners shall be together, and they that forsake the Lord shall be consumed.

29 For they shall be ashamed of the oaks which ye have desired, and ye shall be confounded for the gardens that ye have chosen.

If we suppose the words relate to some further reformation of the church in the latter times, we may observe, that when the prophets speak of an entire reformation of the state of the church, and mention the utter extirpation of idolatry out of it, as if that were one of the last enemies of God and his truth that was to be destroyed (compare with this place, Isa. ii. 18, xxvii. 9, xxx. 22, xxxi. 7, xiv. 16, lxv. 10; Hos. ii. 17; Mich. v. 13; Zech. xiii. 2; Tobit xiv. 6).

Ye shall be confounded for the gardens [See note on lxv. 3].

CHAPTER II.

ARGUMENT.—The former part of this chapter describes the promulgation and success of the gospel upon the first coming of Christ: the latter part represents his second coming to judgment: the first and second coming of Christ are often joined together by the prophets: one reason of which may be, because the destruction of the Jewish state quickly followed after the promulgation of the gospel, which is represented in words that denote the general dissolution of all things. See Joel ii. 31; Matt. xxiv. 29, as indeed all God's remarkable judgments are types and forerunners of the last and general one (see note on xiii. 10).

Ver. 1. The word that Isaiah the son of Amoz saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem.

2 And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it.

3 And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.

4 And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people: and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.
ship the work of their own hands, that which their own fingers have made; 9 And the mean man boweth down, and the great man humbleth himself: therefore forgive them not.
10 ¶ Enter into the rock, and hide thee in the dust, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty.
11 The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day.
12 For the day of the Lord of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up; and he shall be brought low:

kingdom (see xi. 6, lv. 35; Ps. lxvii. 7; Zech. ix. 10; Luke ii. 14): and he himself is called prince of peace (Isa. ix. 6). The spiritual sense of this prophecy implies our Saviour being the great peace-maker, who should reconcile the Jews and gentiles to God, and to each other, Eph. ii. 14 (see more in the notes upon xi. 9). But if we look upon this and the like prophecies, as foretelling the outward peacefulness of Christ's church or kingdom, which the natural sense of the words imports, they seem to relate to some more flourishing state of the church than hath yet been seen upon earth, when Christ, after having subdued all his enemies, shall grant rest unto his faithful servants (2 Thess. i. 7). And thus much is implied in the former part of the verse, and will farther appear by comparing Zech. ix. 10; Hag. ii. 21.

Ver. 5. The prophet addresses himself to those Jews of latter times, that should live when the glad tidings of the gospel were published, and exHORTs them to make use of those means of grace which God would so plentifully afford them, and not continue stubborn and refractory as their forefathers had done, which disobedience of theirs had provoked him to forsake them as his peculiar people.

Ver. 6. Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people.] This is not an inference from what goes before, as Mr. White pretends, in order to confine the preceding prophecy to Isaiah's own time, but is rather an inference from what follows, and should be translated, 'Therefore this reason thou hast forsaken thy people, because they be replenished,' &c. (See a like instance, v. 13).

Because they are replenished from the east, and are soothsayers like the Philistines.] The prophet assigns the reason of God's withdrawing his kindness from the Jews of the present age (as there would be a more remarkable rejection of them under the gospel), because of their following the corrupt manners of the idolatrous nations round about them, in seeking to soothsayers and wizards, which God had so expressly forbidden them (Deut. xviii. 14). Both the eastern parts that border upon Judea, i.e. Syria and Chaldea, were famous for pretenders to this sort of science (see Numb. xxiii. 7; Isa. xlviii. 12); and likewise the Philistines, who lay westward of it (see 1 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kings i. 2).

They please themselves in the children of strangers.] They invited or encouraged pretenders to such knowledge from foreign parts: or, they took pleasure in learning the idolatrous practices of the strangers round about them, as the Philistines (see Deut. xii. 30; Exod. xxxiv. 16; 1 Kings xii. 3). Ver. 7. Their land also is full of silver and gold.] The prophet reproves those who, in the midst of the public calamities, made no conscience of enriching themselves by oppression and injustice (compare i. 22, v. 7, 5; see also likewise 3 Kings v. 29). Their land is also full of horses.] The king was forbidden to 'fetch horses out of Egypt' (Deut. xvii. 16), which was a country that abounded in horses, of which there was great scarcity in Judea (see 1 Kings x. 29; Isa. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 9). One reason of that prohibition was, that the Jews might not have any alliance with Egypt, which the prophets often reprove them for. Indeed, if they had continued firm in their obedience, they need not have sought the alliance of any of their neighbours (see Deut. xxix. 10).

Ver. 9. The mean man boweth down, and the great man humbleth himself. The words denote a universal corruption, that both high and low are given to idolatry (see Psa. lxxxi. 11). Therefore forgive them not.] i. e. Thou wilt not forgive them: the imperative is here taken for the future (see the like instances, vi. 10, xxiii. 16; Zech. xii. 7). God's judgments are sometimes foretold by way of imprecation (see 2 Tim. iv. 16): and many of the imprecations of the Psalms may be understood as such predictions (see likewise Gen. ix. 29). If we understand the words in this sense, they are supposed to be uttered against incorrigible sinners; and it is for the glory of God's justice, that such persons should receive the due rewards of their deeds. Compare Neh. iv. 5; Ps. xxviii. 4, lxx. 3, lxxix. 27; Jer. xviii. 25]

Ver. 10. The remaining part of the chapter is a prediction of some general judgment that should end in the utter destruction of the Jewish land and government: such was that of the captivity. But many of the expressions are such as relate to the last judgment (see the note at the beginning of the chapter). The prophets often take occasion to represent the terrors of the last day, from the particular judgments which should befall some one nation (see note on xili. 10, xxiv. 1). Enter into the rock, and hide thee in the dust.] The words express the great consternation of wicked men, especially at the day of judgment, whose guilt shall prompt them to cast about where to hide themselves (see v. 19, 21 of this chapter, Luke xxii. 30, Rev. vi. 15).

Ver. 11.] "Pride being the beginning of sin," as the wise man speaks (Eccles. x. 12), God's judgments are more especially levelled against it; and one end of the destruction he brings upon particular countries, and will bring upon the whole world, is to "stain the pride of all worldly glory," as our prophet speaks (xxii. 9), and to convince men that there is nothing in this world worth men's setting their hearts upon (compare xxvi. 5).
13 And upon all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up, and upon all the oaks of Bashan.
14 And upon all the high mountains, and upon all the hills that are lifted up.
15 And upon every high tower, and upon every fenced wall.
16 And upon all the ships of Tarshish, and upon all pleasant pictures.
17 And the loftiness of man shall be bowed down, and the haughtiness of men shall be made low: and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day.
18 And the idols he shall utterly abolish.

Ver. 13.] i. e. The great and principal persons of any city or nation (see the same metaphor, x. 33, 34, xiv. 8, xxxvii. 24).
Ver. 14.] The words may signify greater or lesser magistrates (compare Ps. lxiii. 5).
Ver. 15.] Upon all the cities and towns of strength.
Ver. 16.] Bochart does probably guess, that Tarshish, in its primary signification, was a port in Spain, called afterward Tartessus. But it likewise appears, by comparing 1 Kings xxii. 48, with 2 Chron. xx. 36, that there was a place of the same name near Ophir, famous for its gold; which Ophir the same learned person places in India (see his Phaleg, lib. ii. cap. 27, iii. 7), and Huetius, in the eastern coast of Africa (Lib. de Navigat. Solomonis, cap. 2). Wherever this Tarshish stood (and it is not unlikely that in process of time this name might be given to more places than one), it was famous in former times for the traffic of the Phenicians, who were the first merchant adventurers. From thence, “ships of Tarshish” signify in scripture any trading or merchant ships. Accordingly here the Septuagint render the words, “ships of the sea,” as our old English translation does, Ps. xlviii. 6. The words here, joined with what follows, “and upon all pleasant pictures,” denote the destruction of all fine and elegant furniture, and those rarities which are brought by sea from foreign parts, in which men are apt to pride themselves (compare Rev. xviii. 17-19).
Ver. 16.] See note on i. 29.
Ver. 19.] See note on ver. 10.
Ver. 20.] They shall bury their idols under ground, or hide them in some dark corner, as what they are perfectly ashamed of.
Ver. 22. Cease ye from man,] i. e. From valuing man (see note on ver. 11). See the like phrase, Prov. xxi. 4, “Cease from thine own wisdom;” i. e. from esteeming it.

CHAPTER III.

1 For, behold, the Lord, the Lord of hosts, doth take away from Jerusalem and from Judah the stay and the staff, the whole stay of bread, and the whole stay of water,
2 The mighty man, and the man of war, the judge, and the prophet, and the prudent, and the ancient,
3 The captain of fifty, and the honourable man, and the counsellor, and the cunning artificer, and the eloquent orator.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter contains a description of the calamities which should befall the Jews in the declining part of their government, and should at last conclude in a total captivity (ver. 20).
Ver. 1.] Bread is commonly called the staff of life (see Lev. xxvi. 26, Ezek. xiv. 18). This judgment seems to relate to the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, when bread and water were both very scarce (see Jer. xxxvii. 2, Ezek. iv. 16).
Ver. 2, 3. The mighty man, and the man of war, the judge, &c.] This likewise relates to the same times, particularly to Jehoiachin’s captivity, when all the men of war were carried away captive with him (see 2 Kings xxiv. 11).
The prophet.] This same judgment threatened in the times of the captivity (Ezek. vii. 26), and actually fulfilled then, as appears by Jeremiah’s complaint.
Vol. iii.—39

19 And they shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth.
20 In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which they made each one for himself to worship, to the moles and to the bats:
21 To go into the clefts of the rocks, and into the tops of the ragged rocks, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth.
22 Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils: for wherein is he to be accounted of?
ISAIAH.

7 In that day shall he swell, saying, I will not be an heale, and will not be an healer: for in my house is neither bread nor clothing: make me not a ruler of the people.

8 For Jerusalem is ruined, and Judah is fallen: because their tongue and their doings are against the Lord, to provoke the eyes of his glory.

9 ¶ The shew of their countenance doth witness against them; and they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not; Woe unto their soul! for they have done to me what is not good; the anger of the Lord shall fall upon them.

10 Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him: for they shall eat the fruit of their doings.

11 Woe unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him: for the reward of his hands shall be given him.

12 ¶ As for my people, children are their oppressors, and women rule over them. O my people, they which lead thee cause thee to err, and destroy the way of thy paths.

13 The Lord standeth up to plead, and standeth to judge the people.

14 The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people, and the princes thereof: for ye have eaten up the vineyard; the spoil of the poor is in your houses.

15 What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor? saith the Lord God of hosts.

16 ¶ Moreover the Lord saith, Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet:

17 Therefore the Lord will smite with a scab the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion, and the Lord will discover their secret parts.

18 In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their caulds, and their round tires like the moon,

19 The chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers,

20 The bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands, and the tablets, and the earrings,

21 The rings, and nose jewels,

22 The changeable suits of apparel, and the saying, Thou hast clothing, be thou our ruler.] Thou hast all manner of necessaries (see ver. 7) fit to support the dignity of a ruler.

To take hold of another, is a gesture of entreating his friendly assistance (see iv. 1. Zech. viii. 23).

And let this ruin be under thy hand.] Let thy hand, thy power, and interest, support this righteous state of the government: so some understand the phrase, as if it were spoken by the figure hypallage; others thus, "Let this righteous and tolerating government be under thy care and protection."

Ver. 7. Make me not a ruler of the people.] I have not ability to undertake such an office; and the times are so bad, that I will not expose myself to the envy and danger of a high station.

Ver. 8. To provoke the eyes of his glory.] To provoke the glorious and all-seeing eyes of God, who is said to be "of purer eyes than to behold iniquity," but with no mercy (Hab. i. 12).

Ver. 9.] It is very uncertain what the word hucorath signifieth, being never found elsewhere in the Bible: our translators render it, the shew, i. e. the impudence of their countenance: whereby they put a bold face upon the worst of crimes, and glory in their shame, after the example of Sodom, as it follows (see i. 10).

Ver. 10, 11.] See a parallel place to this, Eccles. viii. 12, 13. Both these texts plainly intimate that God hath appointed a time wherein he will put a difference between the righteous and the wicked: times of great calamity and confusion are proper seasons to put men in mind that God will one day rectify these disorders.

Ver. 12. As for my people, children are their oppressors.] See ver. 4. The words may be rendered, "Their oppressors glean them;"] i. e. take from them that poor remainder of their substance, which the former calamities had left: the word is used for gleanings, after the main vintage is already gathered, Deut. xxiv. 22, 23: see see ver. 11.

Women rule over them.] Women signify here, metaphorically, the weakest and most contemptible part of the people, who take upon them to govern their butters (see ver. 4, 5). In this sense the word is taken, xxvii. 11, like that of Virgil:

"O vere Phrygice, neque enim Phrygeseaus."

They which lead thee cause thee to err.] The margin reads, "They that call thee blessed," i. e. the false prophets who soothe thee up in thy sins, and foretell nothing but peace and prosperity (compare ix. 15, 16).

Ver. 14.] He will avenge the cause of the poor and oppressed, by those judgments which he is bringing upon the great and honourable (see ver. 1—3).

Ver. 15.] Thou squeeze them by thy oppression: this is expressed, by "flaying their skin, and pulling their flesh from their bones," Mic. iii. 2, 3.

Ver. 16.] Making a tinkling with their feet.] Some interpret this of chains like a sort of trammels put about their feet, which hindered these nice ladies from making too large strides (see Dr. Alix's Reflect. upon the Scrips. p. i. ch. 20). But the words which describe the women's ornaments in this and the following verses are of a very doubtful signification; the modes of every age and country varying so often, that the succeeding fashion makes the former to be quickly forgotten, and the words that express it to be out-dated.

Ver. 17.] The Lord will discover their secret parts.] When they shall be carried captive, stripped and bare, without any covering for their nakedness; for such were the barbarous customs of conquerors towards their captives (see xx. 4, xliv. 3, Jer. xiii. 22, Mic. i. 11. Nah. iii. 5.

[Ver. 21. Nose jewels.] The word may be translated "jewels for the face," or forehead, as it is rendered, Gen. xxiv. 47, Ezek. xvi. 12. But the same phrase is used Prov. xi. 22, where it certainly signifies a nose jewel; and our interpreters translate it to that sense "As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout." St. Austin, in his Questions upon Genesis, tells us, it was the custom of the women in Mauaitania to hang jewels in their noses, and the same custom is still observed in Persia, Arabia, and other countries, as those who have travelled thither inform us. See Harris's Collect. of Travels, par. i. p. 207.] manly, and the wimples, and the crisping plait.
23 The glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the vails.
24 And it shall come to pass, that instead of sweet smell there shall be stink; and instead of a girdle a rent; and instead of well set hair balding.

Ver. 24. And burning instead of beauty.] The old English translation reads, sun-burning, by way of explication: their faces shall be exposed to the heat of the sun, either by their being made slaves, and forced to toil in the open air, or else in their transportation into foreign parts.

Ver. 26. Her gates shall lament and mourn.] As being solitary, and none passing through them, and the courts of judicature, that used to be kept there, being shut up.

CHAPTER IV.

I And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel: only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.

CHAP. IV.

Argument.—From the second verse the prophet describes the glorious state of the church, which should follow upon its restoration from those calamities described in the former chapter: and the words plainly point at the conversion of the Jews in the latter times of the world, and the flourishing state of the church, which should follow upon it. This subject is more largely handled in the latter part of this prophecy, particularly ch. iv., and so on to the end of the book.

Ver. 1. Seven women shall take hold of one man.] This verse should have been continued to the former chapter; for it contains another melancholy instance of the calamitous circumstances which should attend the church. "Their young men" are said to be "fall by the sword" (lil. 25): so that there should be "seven women to one man," who "should take hold of him;" i.e. use importunity to be married, contrary to the natural modesty of their sex, and that upon hard and unusual conditions of maintaining themselves.

Only be so called by thy name.] It is the custom of all nations for the wife to be called or distinguished by her husband’s name. Thus we read of Mary the wife of Cleophas, John xix. 15. So among the Greeks and Romans, Hectoris Andromache, Marcia Catonis.

To take away our reproach.] Barrenness was thought a great reproach among the Jewish women (see Luke i. 25), and is threatened as a curse to them (Hos. ix. 14): as fruitfulness is promised for a blessing (Deut. xxviii. 4; Ps. cxxvii. 3). Upon this account the Hebrew women generally married young (see Selden’s Uxor Hebræica, lib. ii. cap. 5), and were very desirous of children (see Gen. xxx. 1; 1 Sam. i. 5).

Ver. 2. In that day.] This phrase often denotes in Isaiah, not the same time with that which was last mentioned, but an extraordinary season, remarkable for some signal events of providence; called elsewhere, by way of excellence, “the day of the Lord” (compare ii. 11, 12. x. 20, xvii. 7, xix. 18). Just as that day denotes the day of judgment in the New Tes-ness; and instead of a stomacher a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty.

25 Thy men shall fall by the sword, and thy mighty in the war.
26 And her gates shall lament and mourn; and she being desolate shall sit upon the ground.

And she being desolate shall sit upon the ground.] Sitting upon the ground is a sign of the deepest mourning and lamentation (see Job ii. 13; Lam. ii. 10; Isa. xlvii. 1): so Jerusalem is here described as a woman bereaved of her children, and lamenting over them in this melancholy posture. And thus she was represented in a medal coined by Vespasian’s order, after the destruction of that city by the Romans (see Mr. Gregory’s Observat. chap. 5).

2 In that day shall the branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the earth shall be excellent and comely for them that are escaped of Israel.

tament, as a time of all others the most remarkable (see 2 Thess. i. 10; 2 Tim. i. 12, 18, iv. 8).

Mr. White is forced to own that the expression here cannot be meant of the same time mentioned ver. 1, though elsewhere he is willing to take advantage of the phrase, that he may the better confine the sense of the prophet to some particular juncture, in or near, his own time; particularly in his notes upon xl. 11, xix. 18. But here even Grothus his leader differs from him, and acknowledges in his notes upon xiv. 21, "That it is usual for the prophets to pass from the threatenings that relate to their own times, to the promises which belong to the times of the gospel."

We may further observe, that the scriptures speak of the extraordinary appearances of Christ’s kingdom as ushered in by greatigrations foregoing (see xxiv. 15, xxxi. 2; Jer. xxxiv. 7; Dan. xii. 1; Matt. xxiv. 21). Thus the saints are said to come out of great tribulation, Rev. vii. 14, and are here called the escaped, and sometimes ζητομένοι, as it is expressed in the Greek (see note on i. 9): those that are escaped, as it were, out of the fire.

Shall the branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious.] The Messias is often called the branch. See Jer. xxiii. 5; Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12, in all which places the Hebrew reads Tsomok, as it does here. But the Septuagint, in the three last places, render it Ἀναρέω, the east or morning light, and translate it to the same purpose in this place: concerning which sense of the word, see the note on xli. 12.

The church is likewise called the branch of God’s planting,” Jx. 21.

The fruit of the earth shall be excellent and comely.] The spiritual blessings of the gospel are sometimes described under the emblems of fruitfulness and plenty (see xxviii. 6, xxx. 23, xxxii. 20, xiv. 6; Psal. lxviii. 6; Joel iii. 18; Hos. ii. 22).

For them that are escaped of Israel.] Those Jews who are converted, and escape that destruction which shall overtake the inerudite and disobedient. This may be partly understood of those that were converted by the preaching of Christ and the apostles; and thereby escaped that vengeance which involved the 3 And it shall come to pass, that he that is left in Zion, and he that remaineth in Jerusalem, shall be called holy, even every one that is written among the living in Jerusalem:

4 When the Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion, and shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem from the midst thereof by the spirit of judgment, and by the spirit of burning.

rest of the nation (see Acts ii. 40; 1 Thess. ii. 16). But I conceive it is chiefly meant of those Jews who shall be converted at the end of the world, when the obstinate and incorrigible shall be destroyed, and shall return home from their several dispersions (compare xxvii. 12, 13, xiv. 20, lxvi. 19; Ezek. xx. 34—15).

Ver. 3. He that is left in Zion.] Those that escape the common destruction of those countrymen (see ver. 2).

Shall be called holy.] This may relate to the great purity and holiness of the first professors of Christianity, which the apostles often bear witness to, and glory of, in their writings (see Acts iv. 33; 1 Cor. vi. 11; Phil. ii. 16; Col. i. 6, ii. 5; 1 Thess. i. 3, 11, 13, 19, 20; 2 Thess. i. 1). But the words look further, to the conversion of the Jews in the latter times, and that abundant degree of grace and sanctification which shall be conferred upon them, after that the "transgressors and rebels are purged out of them," Ezek. xx. 39 (compare Isa. i. 27, lxxvi. 1, Zeph. iii. 11; Zech. xiv. 20).

Even everyone that is written among the living in Jerusalem.] Whose names are written in the book of life among God's elect, to whom the promises made to God's people peculiarly belong (see Ps. lxi. 23; Ezek. xiii. 9; Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5, xxi. 27). The phrase alludes to the registers which were kept of the Jewish tribes and families (see Ezra ii. 59); and those that could not prove their pedigrees from thence were not admitted to the same rights and privileges which others enjoyed (see ibid. ver. 62).

Ver. 4. When the Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion.] Whose sins are mentioned, iii. 16, &c. The Septuagint express the sense more fully, and read by way of supplement, "The sons and daughters of Zion,"

And shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem.] The sins of cruelty and oppression (see v. 7), or of murder and bloodshed (i. 15), particularly in killing the prophets, and persecuting God's servants (see Matt. xxiii. 37; Acts vii. 52). Or it may signify pollution in general, as the word sometimes is taken (see Ezek. xvi. 6; Joel iii. 21).

By the spirit of judgment, and by the spirit of burning.] By making them pass through the "flame of affliction," as it is expressed xviii. 10. The phrase denotes that severe discrimination which God shall make between the good and the bad, the pure silver and the dross; the better being purified, the worse being consumed in the fire (compare Ezek. xxii. 21; Mal. iii. 2, 3.). These expressions may probably allude to that severe trial which all shall undergo at the general confutation which is designed for the "perdition of ungodly men" (2 Pet. iii. 7); when many of the righteous shall escape with great difficulty, and "be saved as through fire," 1 Cor. xi. 13, that place being understood of the general judgment by many interpreters, both ancient and modern.

Ver. 5. A cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night.] A plain allusion to the cloud by day, and pillar of fire by night, that conducted and protected the Israelites in the wilderness (Exod. xiii. 21); and afterward rested upon the tabernacle (Ex. xlvi. 3). In like manner, God promises here to give visible tokens of his presence in, and protection over, the church, and each particular member thereof. Smoke and thick darkness was an emblem of God's presence, as well as a cloud (see vi. 4; Ps. xviii. 8).

For upon all the glory shall be a defence.] The saints or living members of the church are called God's glory, because God is glorified in them (see xlv. 13, xlix. 3, lxix. 20). Grace and glory of God is in some measure communicated to them (see John xvii. 22; 2 Cor. vii. 1); and they are designed to be made partakers of farther degrees of it in the world to come (see 2 Cor. iii. 18; 2 Thess. ii. 14); and here God promises, in an especial manner, to protect and defend them. The Septuagint render the words to a plainer sense, and such as the Hebrew will bear, παραρελμὴντοι, παρασκευάζων ἑαυτῷ, "It (i.e. Zion) shall be defended with all the glory" (of God): i.e. God's glory, or the divine Shechinah, shall be both a light and a defence to his people (compare Zech. iii. 5).

Ver. 6.] God's placing his tabernacle among the Jews was a token of his dwelling among them, and admitting them under his immediate protection (see Lev. xxvi. 11, 12) accordingly, dwelling in God's tabernacle is, in scripture phrase, equivalent to abiding under his shadow or protection (compare Ps. xci. 1, with xxvii. 5, xxxi. 20). So here it is said, that God's visible presence in his church will be its defence and security from all sorts of calamities and persecutions. The expressions in the latter part of the verse allude to the movable tents which travelers carry along with them in hot countries, for a defence against the scorching heat of the sun, and the fierceness of storms and rain (compare xxv. 4, xxxii. 2; Rev. vii. 15).

CHAPTER V.

1 Now will I sing to my wellbeloved a song of my beloved touching his vineyard. My well-beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill: 2 And he fenced it, and gathered out the

CHAPTER V.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter contains a general reproof of the Jews, for their ingratitude, impurity, excess, and covetousness, for which sins the prophet de-stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a winepress therein: and he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes.

3 And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah, judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard.

4 What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?

5 And now go to; I will tell you what I will do to my vineyard: I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up; and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down:

6 And I will lay it waste: it shall not be pruned, nor digged; but there shall come up briers and thorns: I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it.

7 For the vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah his pleasant plant: and he looked for judgment, but behold oppression; for righteousness, but behold a cry.

8 Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no place, that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth!

9 In mine ears saith the Lord of hosts, Of a truth many houses shall be desolate, even great and fair, without inhabitant.

10 Yea, ten acres of vineyard shall yield one bath, and the seed of an homer shall yield an ephah.

11 ¶ Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that they continue until night, till wine inflame them!

12 And the harp, and the viol, the tabret, and pipe, and wine, are in their feasts: but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands.

13 ¶ Therefore my people are gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge: and their honourable men are famished, and their multitude dried up with thirst.

14 Therefore hath he enlarged himself, and opened her mouth without measure: and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth, shall descend into it.

15 And the mean man shall be brought down, and the mighty man shall be humbled, and the eyes of the lofty shall be h humbled:

16 But the Lord of hosts shall be exalted in judgment, and God that is holy shall be sanctified in righteousness.
17 Then shall the lambs feed after their manner, and the waste places of the fat ones shall strangers eat.
18 Woe unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart rope:
19 That say, Let him make speed, and hasten his work, that we may see it: and let the counsel of the Holy One of Israel draw nigh and come, that we may know it!
20 ¶ Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!
21 Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight!
22 Woe unto them that are mighty to drink used, Isa. x. 22, lix. 17. If we understand the words so here, the sense will be, that God's power and holiness shall be magnified in the judgments he executeth upon the wicked. But we may understand righteousness here as opposed to judgment, and signifying the same with mercy (see i. 27, and note on xxxii. 16); and then the meaning of the latter part of the verse will be, that God's holiness shall be rendered illustrious in his showing mercy to the righteous (see the following verse): God is said to be sanctified in those in whose preservation or destruction he exerts his power after a remarkable manner (see Numb. xx. 13, Ezek. xx. 41, xxii. 22, 25, xxxvi. 23, xxviii. 16, 25, xxxix. 27).

Ver. 17.] While strangers devour the possessions of those who have grown rich by oppression (compare i. 7); the lamba, i.e. good men, shall be under the peculiar care of Providence, and shall want nothing that is necessary for their support. God is often represented as a shepherd, and his care of the righteous described by their feeding securely in rich pastures (see Ps. xxxii. 1; Isa. lix. 10).

Ver. 18.] Who are industrious in finding out pretences to confirm themselves and others in their evil practices, and still add one sin to another.

Ver. 19.] This is an objection often in the mouths of the prophets, that God doth not hasten the fulfilling of his promises or threatenings, so as to give them ocular demonstration of their certainty (see Amos v. 18; 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4).

Ver. 20.] That endeavour to confound both the names and the natures of virtue and vice, commend and applaud what is evil, and disparage and disconsest what is good. This reproof of the prophet supposes, that the difference between good and evil is as self-evident as the most contrary qualities which we are informed of by the report of our senses: and that the advantage which light hath above darkness doth not shine out with a brighter evidence, than the pre-eminence which virtue hath above vice.

Ver. 21.] Who think themselves too wise to need any instruction, and therefore despise the admonitions of God's prophets.

Ver. 22.] By condemning and punishing him, make him look as if he were guilty.

Ver. 23.] They shall be consumed both root and branches. The prophet alludes to the metaphor insisted on at the beginning of the chapter, where he calls the Jews God's vineyard, and his pleasant plant.

Ver. 24. The hills did tremble.] The mountains and the earth itself are often said to tremble at God's judgments (see Ps. lxvii. 18, exvii. 7; Jer. iv. 24; Micha. i. 4; Nahum. 5; Hab. iii. 10), which expressions allude to the trembling of mount Sinaï, when God came down upon it (Exod. xix. 18), as also to the thunder which accompanies God's extraordinary judgments, and makes the earth tremble (see Ps. xviii. 7, 13). And because these particular judgments are an earnest of the general judgment, when the whole frame of the world shall be dissolved.

Their carcasses were torn in the midst of the streets.] The preterperfect tense is here used for the future (see ver. 10), for the words relative to Sennacherib's invasion, or rather to the Babylonian captivity (see the following verse). He compares those enemies to lions (ver. 29), and by the same metaphor he says that they shall tear the Jews to pieces, and leave their carcasses torn in the midst of the public ways or streets (compare 1 Kings xiii. 21).

Ver. 26. He will lift up an ensign to the nations from far.] Setting up a standard is a signal for armies to assemble together (see xviii. 3; Jer. ii. 27). Thus God will gather together the nations that live afar off, and assemble them to fight against Judea. The nations here specified are the Babyloniens, who are, in like manner, described as "coming from a far country" (xxxix. 3; Jer. v. 15). It is true, Babylon stood upon the river Euphrates; which was once the border of the Jewish kingdom (see Gen. xv. 19; 1 Kings iv. 21). From whence it may be argued, that the Babyloniens or Assyrians cannot be meant here. But to this it may be replied, that many of their confederates, who made up great part of their army, lived at a farther distance. Indeed, all foreigners were looked upon by the Jews as living a great way off, because they maintained but little commerce with their neighbours. So the queen of Sheba is said to have come "from the uttermost parts of the earth" (Matt. xii. 42), whereas she came but from Arabia Felix. This threatening may also be extended to the desolation of Judea by the Romans (compare Deut. xxviii. 49, and see the note on vs. 11).

Will he kiss unto them from the end of the earth.] Will call them by a certain signal (compare viii. 15). "From far," and "from the ends of the earth," are equivalent expressions (see xliii. 6). The meaning of the phrase is, that the least whisper of God's voice shall be heard from one end of the earth to the other, and shall summon the nations to the place appointed.

Ver. 27—30.] See a parallel description of a hos-and, soldier's. «So. that and Isa. this 2 Deut. lion, with flint throne, I saw His and with scripture habit (see Dan. 5), (see Ver. 1. 2 Kings iii. 21), for it fastened his armour upon him, and made him more nimble and fit for action. From thence it is taken to signify strength and courage (Job xlviii. 3; Isa. xlv. 5), and to unloose the loins, is to cleanse and dispirit (Dan. v. 6; Isa. xlv. 1).

Nor the latchet of their shoes be broken.] They shall be all well appointed; and as their courage shall not fail them, so neither shall any defect in their habit or armour retard them, or render them unfit for action.

Ver. 33. Their wheels like a whirlwind.] That nothing can stop nor resist. Chariots were a principal instrument of war, and are always mentioned in the ancient accounts of battles, as well in scripture as in profane authors.

Ver. 39.] Every thing looks black and dismal. The scripture expresses great calamities by the heavens being darkened, and the sun, moon, and stars, withdrawing their light (compare viii. 22, xiii. 10, Jer. iv. 23; Ezek. xxxiii. 7; 5; Joel ii. 10; Amos vii. 9).

CHAPTER VI.

1 In the year that king Uzziah died I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple.

2 Above it stood the seraphims: each one had six wings; with twain he covered his face, like flint, and their wheels like a whirlwind.

29 Their roaring shall be like a lion, they shall roar like young lions: yea. they shall roar, and lay hold of the prey, and shall carry it away safe, and none shall deliver it.

30 And in that day they shall roar against them like the roaring of the sea: and if one look unto the land, behold darkness and sorrow, and the light is darkened in the heavens thereof.

CHAP. VI.

Argument.— This chapter, though not the first in order, gives an account of Isaiah's call to the prophetic office (at least, of a new commission to him), together with a prediction of the unsuccessfullness of his ministry, by reason of the hardness of the people's hearts. The like account we have of Jeremiah's call, Jer. i.

Ver. 1. I saw also the Lord] i.e. The divine Shechinah, or the "glory of the Lord," as St. John explains it (John xxi. 41); who also assures us, that it was the Logos, or second person of the blessed Trinity who now appeared, this vision having a particular relation to the times of the gospel (see ver. 9, 10). It was the unanimous sense of the ancient church, that all the divine appearances in the Old Testament were made by the Son of God, by whom all the affairs of the church were ordered from the beginning: see this proved both from the New Testament and the fathers, by Bishop Bull, Defens. Fid. Nicen. cap. 1, sect. 1. Dr. Aix hath shown that the ancient Jews were of the same opinion, in his Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians, especially ch. 13—15.

Sitting upon a throne.] A description of what the Jews call the divine Shechinah, or a glorious representation of the divine majesty, which was exhibited in a mighty lustre, or flame of light, together with a visible appearance of angels as its attendants (compare Exod. xxiv. 10; Ezek. i. 26; Dan. vii. 9, 10; Rev. iv. 2). The divine presence is usually represented in scripture as a bright light, or flaming fire, breaking out of a cloud, or thick darkness (see Ps. xviii. 12, 13; Ezek. i. 5; Dan. vii. 10). A lively image of both was that pillar of cloud end of fire, which accompanied the Israelites in their journey (Exod. xiii. 21), then settled upon the tabernacle (xli. 35), and afterward.

and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly.

3 And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory.

filled the temple (1 Kings viii. 10). This argument is handled with great accuracy, by his Grace of Canterbury, in his learned treatise of Idolatry (ch. 14).

But, and ver. 2. His train filled the temple. Above it stood the seraphims] God is always represented as attended with a numerous train of angels (see Ps. lxviii. 17; Deut. xxxiii. 24; Dan. vii. 10). For this reason the cherubim were placed in the temple, as overshadowing the mercy-seat, to which posture the next words here allude, "above it stood the seraphims," which might better be translated "above him (i.e. the Lord) stood the seraphims." We read in Ezekiel (x. 20, xi. 22), that "the cherubim were under the God of Israel, and his glory was over them above;" but there God is represented as carried by them in a triumphal chariot, which the modern Jews call the mercurial, and the psalmist expresses by God's "riding upon the heavens" (Ps. lxviii. 33), and "flying upon the wings of the wind" (xviii. 10). The seraphims are called so from their bright colour, like that of flaming fire (see Ezek. i. 3; Ps. cix. 4). There seem to be only two seraphims represented in this vision, in imitation of the two cherubims over the ark.

[Ver. 2. Above it stood the cherubims.] The words might be better translated, "Beside it (i.e. the throne) stood the cherubims," as attending upon him. So the LXX. understood it, and render it, "The cherubims stood round about him." The Hebrew word maimmon signifies the same here with maimal, which is rendered beside, Jer. xxxvi. 21.

With twain he covered his face.] Out of reverence towards God, as being unable to bear the glory of his majesty (see Exod. iii. 6; 1 Kings xix. 13).

With twain he covered his feet.] Or lower parts: the Hebrew expresses the nakedness or secret parts by the feet (see Gen. xlix. 10; Deut. xxvii. 57; Judg. ii. 21; Isa. vii. 20). The expression applied to angels imports those imperfections, to which even the 4 And the posts of the door moved at the voice of him that cried, and the house was filled with smoke.

5 ¶ Then said I, Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips: for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts.

6 Then flew one of the seraphims unto me, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar:

7 And he laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged.

8 Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I; send me.

9 ¶ And he said, Go, and tell this people, saying, 'Hear ye indeed the word of the Lord, and say ye, The word of the Lord is unto找准, and who will go forth for us? And I said, Here am I; send me.'

ISAIAH.

5.5] God himself says, that 'no man can see his face and live' (Exod. xxxiii. 20): i.e. unless his life be preserved by a peculiar favour. This made men afraid of approaching the divine presence (see Deut. v. 24; Judg. xiii. 22); especially when they reflected upon their sins, which made them unwilling to appear in the presence of God (see Luke x. 8). Isaiah was terrified at this vision, and withal sensible that God appeared to him, in order to send him upon some message to the people, to which end he had formerly appeared to Moses (Exod. iii. 2), as he did afterward to Ezekiel (i. 4). In these words, therefore, he deprecates the undertaking of the prophetic office, as one who had no extraordinary talent in speaking, especially to a people that were not at all disposed to hearken to God's commands (compare this place with Exod. vi. 12). What the prophet here calls unclean or un sanctified, Moses there styles un circumcised lips; where he excuses himself from the like employment, both from his own incapacity, and from the cold reception he was like to meet with among the Israelites.

6.6. Having a live coal in his hand.] Signifying thereby the gift of utterance, represented by fiery tongues, Acts ii. 3, and the efficacy of God's word uttered by the prophets, compared elsewhere to fire (Jer. v. 14, xxiii. 29). The use of fire, likewise, is to cleanse and purify (see the following verse).

7.7. He laid it upon my mouth.] To signify that all the grace and gifts that purify the mind, and enable us for the discharge of any particular function, come from God (compare Jer. i. 9).

8.8. Whom shall I send? God asks this question, not as if he were not resolved whom to send, but that Isaiah might voluntarily offer his own service. So God is elsewhere introduced as asking questions, not to inform himself, but to condemn, or justify men out of their own mouths (see Gen. iii. 9, 10).

Who will go for us?] So God speaks in the plural number, Gen. i. 26, which is justly thought to imply a plurality of divine persons: for it cannot be said, with any probability, that God is described in Genesis as acting with, or communicating his purposes to the angels, which is the fancy of the rabbins; because the history of the creation takes no notice of angels, and, consequently, there is no ground for interpreting any text in the first chapter of Genesis with relation to them.

9.9.] The imperative is put for the future (see note on ii. 6), and so the Septuagint here understand it. This threatening is denounced for their former contempt of God's messages (compare Matt. xiii. 12, &c.).
CHAPTER VII.

241

Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not.

10 Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed.

11 Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate.

12 And the Lord have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land.

13 ¶ But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return, and shall be eaten: as a teak tree, and as an oak, whose substance is in them, when they cast their leaves; so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof.

For the circumstances of one age may be exactly parallel to those of another; and God, that comprehends all things at one single view, can adapt the same prophecy to answer the event in both cases. This subject is more largely handled in the preface.

13.] The inhabitants of the land, by God's just judgment, shall be carried captive into a far country (see note on v. 26): so that the cities and populous places shall become desolate, and the palaces of great men forsaken (compare xxxii. 14).

19. But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return, and shall be eaten. The Hebrew may be translated thus: which makes the sense run plainer; But yet in it shall he be left a tenth, after it is (or although it is) again eaten; or devoured; the verb shab, which is translated here return, is often adverbially, and is translated to that sense by our interpreters, Ps. lxxxi. 26, Thou shalt quicken me again; where our old translation reads more to the letter of the Hebrew. "Thou didst turn and refresh me." Thus the word is used, Eccles. iv. 1, ix. 11; "I returned and considered," i.e. I considered again: and so, I conceive it should be translated here; for the sense of the verse is plainly this, that although God suffers the Jews to be devoured by repeated judgments; first carried captive by the Babylonians, and afterward destroyed by the Romans (see note on ver. 11), yet still he will preserve a remnant (see i. 9); called here a tenth part, which holy seed shall be a seminary to preserve the nation to aftertimes: just as when a tree is stripped of its leaves, and looks as if it were dead, in winter, yet the root and sap of it remain, from whence arises a new succession of branches and leaves in the spring. According to this interpretation, the words contain in them a promise that God will never utterly reject the whole nation of the Jews, how severely soever he deals with them: which promise is more explicitly mentioned, Jer. xxxvi. 36, 37, compared with Rom. xi. 2, 16, 29. The holy seed is called here a tenth, perhaps is allusion to the tithe under the law, which was set apart from the rest, and consecrated to God's service.

CHAPTER VII.

1 And it came to pass in the days of Ahaz the son of Jotham, the son of Uzziah, king of Judah, that Rezin the king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah, king of Israel, went up toward Jerusalem to war against it, but could not prevail against it.

2 And it was told the house of David, saying, Syria is confederate with Ephraim. And his let us make a breach therein for us, and set a king in the midst of it, even the son of Tabael:

7 Thus saith the Lord God, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass.

8 For the head of Syria is Damascus, and the head of Damascus is Rezin: and within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken, that it be not a people.

9 And the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria is Remaliah's son. If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established.

10 ¶ Moreover the Lord spake again unto Ahab, saying,

11 Ask thee a sign of the Lord thy God; ask it either in the depth, or in the height above.

Damascus shall be the metropolis only of Syria, and Rezin shall have no other royal city under his government besides Damascus.

And within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken, that it be not a people. Archbishop Usher hath given the clearest explication of this difficult verse, in his Annals of the Old Testament, ad A. M. 3327, where he explains it, not of the first captivity of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser, but of their final deportation by Esar-haddon, who totally dispeopled the land, and brought new inhabitants from Babylon, Cuthah, and other cities of the Assyrians, to inhabit the cities of Israel (see Ezra iv. 2, compared with 2 Kings xxvii. 21). And then Ephraim or Israel wholly ceased from being a people. This last captivity that learned prelate places in the twenty-second year of Shalmaneser the fifth, which is just sixty-five years from the beginning of Ahaz's reign.

Capellus and Grotius correct the text here, and put shesh instead of shisim, sic for sixty, and so make the two numbers amount but to eleven years, which they suppose to be the space between the date of this prophecy and the captivity of the ten tribes. I had not thought this criticism worth taking notice of, but that Mr. White mentions it with approbation. But I believe he can hardly find a like instance of any number bigger than a decimal, broke into such an unusual partition. Besides, all the present copies of the Hebrew text, and the ancient versions, justify the received reading: and to alter the original, without either reason or necessity, is not to be allowed in criticizing upon profane authors, much less upon sacred ones. It may be farther observed, that this criticism, if it were allowed, doth not solve the difficulty: for it is two-and-twenty years from the date of this prophecy, to the captivity of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser. Inasmuch as Rezin and Pekah invaded Judea at the beginning of Ahaz's reign, as appears by comparing 2 Kings xv. 37, with xvi. 5. Now Ahaz reigned sixteen years, and after him Hezekiah six years, before that captivity. The occasion of Grotius's mistake appears in his notes upon this place; viz. that he did not allow for the interregnum, which all judicious chroniclers place between the end of Pekah's reign and the beginning of Hosea's, which is plainly inferred by comparing the times of the kings of Israel and Judah together.

Ver. 9.) The same sort of expression with that of ver. 8. Or else it may be thus translated, "The head of Ephraim which is Samaria, and the head of Samaria is Remaliah's son" (shall be broken): the verb being supplied from the foregoing verse.

Ver. 11. Ask thee a sign of the Lord thy God.) A sign is a miracle wrought for the confirmation of some message or promise delivered from God (see Exod. iv. 8; Judg. vi. 17; Isa. xxxviii. 22): this was usually wrought presently; but sometimes a thing future, where the event is remarkable, is proposed for a sign, as here (see, likewise, Exod. iii. 12; 1 Sam. iii. 31; Jer. xliii. 9, 105; in the depth, or in the height above.) Either in the heaven or in the earth. The Jews were very fond of signs from heaven, as if they were more convincing than any other sort of miracle (see Matt. xvi. i).

Ver. 12. To tempt the Lord is to mistrust his providence, or expect he should give some extraordinary instance of it to confirm our belief (see Deut. vi. 16; Matt. iv. 7): but these words of Ahaz, although they have a show of piety, do yet really proceed from despair and unbelief, as appears by the prophet's answer, ver. 13.

Ver. 13. Hear ye now, O house of David.] The prophet does not apply himself any farther to Ahaz, as a person who would not regard what he said, but directs his discourse to the house of David, or the royal family, to comfort them under desponding apprehensions (see ver. 2): and assures them that God's promises to the family of David should never fail; but have their eminent completion in the Messias, whose birth he foretells in the following words.

Is it a small thing for you to weary men, but will ye weary my God also? You may reckon it a slight and inconceivable fault to despise God's prophets, but surely you must needs think it a heinous offence to treat God Almighty after this fashion. Men are elsewhere said to "weary God with their sins" (Isa. xliii. 24; Mal. i. 17), when they tire out his patience: just as they are said to " vex and grieve his Holy Spirit" (xviii. 10. Eph. iv. 30), when they turn a deaf ear to all his admonitions.

Ver. 14. The Lord himself shall give you a sign.] He shall give it marked, and such a sign as could not enter into your thoughts to desire. This shows that God's signs were not applicable only to the immediate work of God, such as a son of a virgin is, which therefore must be the genuine sense of the following words.

Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son.] Christ is called "the seed of the woman," by way of distinction (Gen. iii. 15), as not to be born in the ordinary way of generation. The Hebrew word almah, most properly signifies a virgin, and so it is translated here by all the ancient interpreters; and is never once used in the scripture in any other sense, as several learned men have proved against the pretensions of the modern Jews (see particularly Bishop Kiddle's Demonstration of the Messias, part. ii. ch. 5). The primary signification of the word almah is hid, or concealed; from whence it is taken to signify a virgin, because of the custom in the eastern countries to keep their virgins concealed from the view of men, never suffering them to stir out of the woman's apartment.

But shall call his name Immanuel.] This is spoken of the mother, who usually gave the name to the child (see Gen. iv. 1, xvi. 11, xxix. 32, xxx. 6, 8). To be called is the same in scripture phrase as to be; name being often put for thing in the Hebrew dialect. To this sense the word daber is often used in the Old Testament; and Luke i. 32, the original reads "with God no word shall be impossible;" i.e. no thing: so it is said of Christ (ix. 6), "his name shall be called Wonderful," i.e. he shall be a wonderful person; and (i. 26), "Jerusalem shall be called a city of righteousness;" i.e. her manners shall answer that title: this we are to understand the Messias's being called Immanuel, i.e. being really what that name imports; i.e. "God with us;" being both truly and properly God, and called so. ix. 6, and also living or dwelling with us, men. In the same sense we are to understand that prophecy of Christ (Jer. xxiii. 6), "This is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness." Several other texts of the Old Testament speak of the Messias as God (see xxviii. 4, xlviii. 16; Isa. xli. 9, 10; Hos. i. 7; Zech. ii. 10, 11; Mal. iii. 1).

Ver. 15. But and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil, and choose the good.

It may, indeed, justly be wondered, that any part of this illustrious prophecy concerning Christ should be supposed applicable to any other person or event. But to this it may be answered, that as all the merities promised to the Jews were figures or earnest of the times of the Messias, in whom all the promises of God were verified (see 2 Cor. i. 20): so the prophets, in foretelling temporal merities, are sometimes carried beyond themselves and their subject: if I may so express it, to foretell the blessings of the gospel; and after this extraordinary rapture, they return to the subject which was the immediate occasion of their prophecy (see the note upon x. 20).

But and honey shall he eat, &c.] This subject is again enlarged by St. John. The learned Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3292, suppose this prophecy to be applicable to none but Christ; accordingly that learned prelate explains the fifteenth and sixteenth verses to this sense, "Butter and honey shall he eat;" i.e. Christ shall take upon him the infirmities of childhood, and shall be fed with the common nourishment given to children in those countries, which was milk, or butter and honey. Then he supposes the prophet to point to his son Shear-jashub, whom he took along with him (see ver. 3); and to tell Ahaz, for his present comfort, that before that child should come to discern good from evil, the land of Israel, and its two confederate kings, should be destroyed by the king of Assyria. To confirm this exposition, it may be observed, that Isaiah mentions but two of his own children, Shear-jashub, here (ver. 3), and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, viii. 3, and never calls Immanuel his son; from whence we may justly conclude, that he was a distinct person from them both; and, indeed, the eldest son, or heir of the house of David, and king of Judah: see viii. 8.

Ver. 15. Butter and honey shall he eat.] If we suppose these words applicable to any person that was to be born quickly after the uttering this prophecy, the sense of them will be, that although the invasion of the land, and the siege of Jerusalem, did threaten 16 For before the child shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings. 17 ¶ The Lord shall bring upon thee, and upon thy people, and upon thy father's house, days that have not come, from the day that Ephraim departed from Judah; even the king of Assyria. 18 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria. 19 And they shall come, and shall rest all of them in the desolate valleys, and in the holes of the rocks, and upon all thorns, and upon all bushes. 20 In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head, and the hair of the feet: and it shall also consume the beard. 21 And it shall come to pass in that day, that a man shall nourish a young cow, and two sheep; 22 And it shall come to pass, for the abundance of milk that they shall give that he shall eat butter: for butter and honey shall every one eat that is left in the land. 23 And it shall come to pass in that day, that God's people (see xix. 23, xxvii. 13; Zech. x. 10). Archbishop Usher, A. M. 3294, supposes that the conquest of Egypt by the king of Assyria, foretold in the twentieth chapter of this prophecy, happened before the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib, and that a great many Egyptians were his auxiliaries in that expedition.

Ver. 13.] He pursues the same metaphor, and represents this foreign army as so many flies that lie in shoals in lower grounds; and as bees, whose custom it is to get into rocks (see Deut. xxix. 13; Ps. lxxxi. 17): implying that no place should be free from them, and even the strongest and best fortified cities (compared sometimes to rocks: see Numb. xxiv. 21) should be no security against them.

Ver. 20. In the same day shall the Lord share with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria. Because shaving the head was used as a mourning (see Lev. xxiv. 5), from hence it is metaphorically used for a great calamity (see Ezek. v. 1). And the invasion of an army is particularly resembled by it here, because that leaves a country bare, and strips off all its ornaments, among which the hair hath a principal place. The Assyrian is called a hired razor, because God often rewards those whom he makes instruments of his vengeance upon sinners, which is expressed by giving them their hire (see Ezek. xxix. 18, 19; 2 Kings x. 30). And as Ahaz hired the king of Assyria to assist him (see 2 Kings xvii. 7, 8; 2 Chron. xxviii. 21) so the prophet says God will hire the king of the same country to destroy Judea, as Tiglath-pileser did, whom Ahaz had hired (2 Kings xvi. 6). Though by the river is meant Ephraim (see note on xl. 16).

The head, and the hair of the feet: i. e. All ranks and conditions, both high and low. In what sense the feet are here understood, see note on vi. 2.

Ver. 21, 22.] The enemies shall make such a destruction both of man and beast, that there should want hands and cattle to till the ground, so that the whole land should of itself turn to pasture. And those few inhabitants that should be left, should have neither flocks nor herds to feed in those waste places; the utmost of their stock should be a cow and two sheep, which should give abundance of milk by reason of the plenty of grass, and want of cattle to eat it: whereupon milk and butter should be the chief part of the people's sustenance: compare xxxvii. 30, where it is said, 'Ye shall eat this year,' meaning the year of Sennacherib's invasion, 'such as growth of itself,' without ploughing or sowing, as appears by the following words there.

For butter and honey shall every one eat! He means wild honey, which is found in the woods (see Matt. iii. 4).

Ver. 23.] The choicest vineyards, which in times of peace would let for a thousand shekels a year, every place shall be, where there were a thousand vines at a thousand silverings, it shall even be for briers and thorns.

21 With arrows and with bows shall men come thither; because all the land shall become briers and thorns.

shall be left uncultivated, to be overrun with briers and thorns, there being no encouragement for any improvements, which men expected every day should be destroyed by the enemy.

Ver. 24.] For hunting wild beasts (see Gen. xxvii. 3); or else to defend themselves against them.

Ver. 25.] The Hebrew may be thus translated, which makes the sense run easy; And all the hills that are (or used to be) digged with a mattock, that the fear of briers and thorns may not come there! (i.e. to clear them from briers and thorns: see the note on xxvi. 23, "shall be for the sending forth of oxen," etc. All those hills that used to be carefully manured and turned to vineyards, which were usually planted upon hills (see v. 1, Ps. lxxx. 11), shall now lie waste, and be only fit for cattle to graze in: ground untilled naturally turns to pasture; therefore these and the like expressions signify great desolations and destructions both of man and beast (compare xvii. 2, xxvii. 10, xxxii. 11).

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Moreover the Lord said unto me, Take thee a great roll, and write in it with a man's pen concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz.

2 And I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest, and Zechariah the son of Jerebekiah.

3 And I went unto the prophetess; and she conceived, and bare a son. Then said the Lord unto me, Call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz.

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet renews the promises made to Ahaz in the former chapter, which are to receive their utmost completion in the Messias; and he foretells the rejecting of the Jews for not believing on him.

Ver. 1. Take thee a great roll, and write in it with a man's pen] When the prophets are commanded to write any thing, it signifies first the certainty of the thing spoken of, and then the importance of it, that the memory of it ought to be transmitted to posterity (see xxx. 8; Dan. x. 21; Hah. ii. 2). The prophet is commanded to take a great roll, either because the words were to be written in capital letters, or that he that runs may read them! or else because it was to contain all that part of Isaiah's prophecy which concerns this subject, comprehending the foregoing chapter and the following one. By a man's pen, is meant such a pen, and such characters, as are in ordinary use among men. So the "measure of a man" (Rev. xxi. 17) is such as is commonly used among men.

[Take thee a great roll.] Compare Zech. v. 1, and then see the note there.

Concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz.] The word signifies to "run swiftly to the spoil, and make haste to the prey," and denotes the speedy destruction of the confederate kings of Samaria and Damascus (see ver. 4).

Ver. 2. I took unto me faithful witnesses to record.] There were always witnesses to the matrimonial contract (see Selden's Uxor. Hebræica, lib. i. cap. 2); the same custom is mentioned, Tobit vii. 14 (or the sixteenth verse, as it is reckoned in some editions), according to the Hebrew copy published by Fagius, which reads the verse thus, "Then he called witnesses, and gave her in marriage in their presence, who signed and sealed the deed which contained the particulars of the dowry which she was to have.

This circumstance signifies the prophet's contract-

25 And on all hills that shall be digged with the mattock, there shall not come thither the fear of briers and thorns: but it shall be for the sending forth of oxen, and for the treading of lesser cattle.

4 For before the child shall have knowledge to cry. My father, and my mother, the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away before the king of Assyria.

5 And the Lord spake also unto me again, saying,

6 Forasmuch as this people refuseth the waters of Shiloah which go softly, and rejoiceth in Rezin and Remaliah's son;
7 Now therefore, behold, the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory: and he shall come up over all his channels, and go over all his banks:

8 And he shall pass through Judah; he shall overflow and go over, he shall reach even to the neck; and the stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel.

9 ¶ Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces; and give ear, all ye of far countries; gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces; gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces.

10 Take counsel together, and it shall come secret friends to the two confederate kings, as thinking them an overmatch for the kingdom of Judah; and so were resolved to be of the strongest side. Shiloah was a small river that ran through Jerusalem (see Neh. iii. 15; John ix. 7), and denotes the small strength and forces of the king of Judah, that did bear no greater a proportion to the power of the Syrian monarch, than a small brook does to the mighty river Euphrates.

Ver. 7. It is usual to resemble multitudes to great waters (see Ps. cx liv. 7; Rev. xvii. 1, 15). Especially an army is fitly represented by the inundation of a rapid river, which carries all before it, and leaves the ground waste and desolate: compare xvii. 12, 13; Dan. ix. 25, xi. 10, 22, where the same expressions are to be found which are used in this and the next verse.

Ver. 8. He shall reach even to the neck. The prophet persists in the same metaphor, the words importing the danger which threatened the Jews by reason of this invasion, as a person is in great danger of being drowned when the water comes up to his neck (see xxx. 23).

The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel. i.e. His army or his camp shall fill thy land, as the Septuagint very well express the sense. So the "wing of abominations," as some render the original, Dan. ix. 27, is by many interpreters translated "the abominable army," which translation is confirmed by the authority of St. Luke, xxii. 22, and St. John, xvi. 33. I observed before, that the prophet never calls Immanuel his son; and here he speaks of him as a distinct person from both the children above mentioned, and in such a style as befitts none but him that was to be in an eminent manner the son of David, and king of Israel.

Ver. 9. Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces. The prophet returns to the subject spoken of, ver. 6, and insists over the confederacy of Syria and Israel against Judah, foretelling that all their united endeavours shall prove abortive, because, saith he, God is with us, the import of the word Immanuel (see Matt. i. 22). He will certainly make good his promises to the family of David, which will be eminently fulfilled in raising up Christ to sit on his throne, whose "kingdom shall have no end."

Give ear, all ye of far countries. This expression seems to favour that interpretation which expounds the foregoing words of the Assyrians and their associates (see the note upon ver. 9), but the most distant times and countries may be fitly said to be concerned in the admonition here given; the import of which is, that God will preserve his church, and advance the kingdom of the Messias by such measures as he in his infinite wisdom shall think most proper, in spite of all the united endeavours of men to the contrary. This is the very introduction of the scriptures, and is the subject of the second psalm in particular. Gird yourselves. See note on v. 27. And ye shall be broken in pieces. Ye shall be disincomfited, and all your designs blasted (compare Dan. viii. 25).

Ver. 10. Speak the word, and it shall not stand. Whatever decrees you resolve upon, whatever commands ye give out, in order to their being put in execution, shall come to nought.

Ver. 11. For the Lord spake thus to me with a strong hand. The spirit of prophecy is expressed by "the hand of the Lord being upon the prophet" (see 2 Kings iii. 15; Ezek. iii. 14, xvii. 1). Accordingly here the word of the prophet felt an extraordinary impulse to deliver this message, as from God, containing a doctrine of great importance (see ver. 13): who likewise inspired him with courage and presence of mind to discharge his duty in this particular.

Ver. 12. To all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy. Or rather, "In all things wherein this people shall say," &c. Many of the Jews were secret friends to Rezin and Pekah; and this circumstance much increased the fears of that invasion, because it was given out that they had a strong party among the people of Judah; so that it seemed impossible to contend against such an enemy. The prophet is commanded to arm those that heard him against these posters, and prevent them not to join with the popular cry in this matter.

Ver. 13. Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, as St. Peter expresseth the sense, 1 Peter iii. 15. God is the proper object of our fear (see Ps. lxvi. 7; Luke xii. 4, 5): men ought therefore to possess their minds with an awful sense of his power, justice, and faithfulness, and this will preserve them steady in their trust and dependence upon him under the worst circumstances: this is a lesson of great importance, and necessary for our conduct at all times.

Ver. 14. He shall be for a sanctuary. i.e. A refuge and protection (see Ezek. vi. 16). The same thing is elsewhere expressed by "dwelling in the secret place of the most high" (Ps. xci. 1), and "in his pavilion or tabernacle" (Ps. xxvi. 5, xxxi. 20).

But for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel, &c. God and his promises, which shall be men's refuge and security, become the occasion of hurt and mischief to unbelievers. Their sins are aggravated by "dwelling in the secret place of the most high" (Ps. xci. 1), and "in his pavilion or tabernacle" (Ps. xxvi. 5, xxxi. 20). But for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel, &c. God and his promises, which shall be men's refuge and security, become the occasion of hurt and mischief to unbelievers. Their sins are aggravated by "dwelling in the secret place of the most high" (Ps. xci. 1), and "in his pavilion or tabernacle" (Ps. xxvi. 5, xxxi. 20).
full, and be broken, and be snared, and be taken.

16 Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples.

17 And I will wait upon the Lord, that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him.

18 Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel from the Lord of hosts, which dwelleth in mount Zion.

the prophets have foretold concerning him, that he should be matter of offence to the Jews, and their iniquity should in the end be the occasion of their ruin, and the "taking away both their place and nation." The prophet expressly mentions "both the houses of Israel," to show the general rejection of the Jews under the gospel. This very expression is a demonstration that the prophet here enlarges his views beyond the subject of Rezin and Pekah's association, which was the immediate occasion of this prophecy. Under those circumstances, Israel and Judah were in two different interests, and the prophet exhort the king and people of Judah to trust in God, who would be their defence against the designs of their brethren of the ten tribes; whereas, this verse speaks of them both as involved in the same sin and punishment.

We may further observe, that this text is directly spoken of God by the prophet, but applied to Christ and the apostles in the above-mentioned places (see the like instances in vi. 1, compared with John xii. 41, and xlv. 23, compared with Rom. xiv. 11): a plain proof that Christ is God, and is described as such by the Scripture.

Ver. 16.] To seal, signifies sometimes to secure or keep safe; in this sense it is joined with scutting up, John xiv. 17, the same with binding up here. But when the word is applied to a book, it signifies to conceal, or hide from common understandings (see Isa. xxix. 11; Dan. xii. 4). God here commands the prophet to deliver his promises, and the several declarations of his will, especially those concerning the Messiah, to his faithful servants, to be kept safely by them, and laid up in their memories; and although at present they were as a book sealed up, and not easily understood; yet when the event answered the prediction, they would be a justification of God's truth, and of those who depended upon his word: of which number the prophet professes himself to be one, in the following verse.

The law and the testimony may signify, in general, any declaration of God's will, so as to comprehend his promises as well as his precepts: thus the Hebrew word אָבָד (equivalent to גַּ֫לּ, the word used here), which commonly signifies a law or statute, denotes God's promise and decree, Ps. ii. 6, exii. 7, and exix. 151, where David saith, "All thy commandments are true," the context shows, that the word commendments is equivalent to promises: the word testimony is used in the same sense, Ps. xxviii. 5.

Ver. 17.] The prophet still persists in his resolution to depend upon God; though at present, saith he, he doth not give any visible tokens of his presence among us, yet I doubt not but in his due time he will remember his promises, and not suffer any part of them to fail. God is said to hide his face, when he does not answer our prayers, or give any marks of his favour and assistance (see Deut. xxxii. 27; Job xxxii. 24; Ps. xlv. 24).

Ver. 18.] These are the words of the prophet, as well as the verse foregoing, though speaking in the person of Christ, whom he here represents (see Heb. ii. 13); and the meaning of them is, that he and his children, mentioned vii. 3, viii. 3, were remarkable for being visible pledges of God's promises, and rememberers of his veracity and the people's duty. For which reason as they were admired and respected by well disposed persons; so they were made objects of scorn and derision to hypocrites and unbelievers (compare Deut. xxviii. 16; Ps. lixxi. 7; Zech. iii. 8; Ezek. xlviii. 4; Luke ii. 31).

Ver. 19. Seek unto—wizards that peep, and that mutter.] To peep signifies the same with the Latin pipere, or spy, as seen in xiv. 10. By peeping and muttering are meant the answers of those who, pretending to familiar spirits, muttered or spoke imperfectly, as if their voice proceeded out of the caverns of the earth (see xiv. 10), or spoken inwardly, so that their words seemed to come out of their belly, from whence they were called ἐπιστασία in Greek.

Should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead?] i. e. "Should they seek for the living to the dead?" By the dead may be meant idols which are dead insensible things (see Ps. cxv. 5, &c.), and for that reason opposed to the living God, 1 Thess. i. 9. A great part, likewise, of the heathen idolatry consisted in worshipping dead men (see Ps. cxv. 20, and inquiring after oracles which were placed in the temples, and monuments dedicated to their deified dead). Under this account, several mournful and funeral rites were used in their worship, such as cutting their flesh (1 Kings xviii. 28), and shaving their heads (Baruch vi. 31), which usages were for this reason forbidden to the Jewish priests in particular (Lev. xxi. 5), and to the people in general (Lev. xix. 27, 28).

Ver. 20. To the law and to the testimony.] Have recourse to the oracles of God (see ver. 16).

It is because there is no light in them.] Compare Mic. iii. 6. Some render the latter part of this verse "There shall be no prosperity to them;" according to the usual acceptation of light for happiness, as darkness is put for misery (see particularly ver. 23).

Ver. 21. They shall pass through it, hardly bested and hungry.] They shall pass through the land, or the earth, mentioned ver. 22. The prophet describes the condition of unbelievers under the public calamities; that they shall wander here and there, be impatient under their pressures, and, in the rage of their despair, curse first God and providence (compare Rev. xvi. 10, 11), and then their king, to whose ill conduct they impute a great part of their miseries. Ibid. and ver. 22. And look upward. And they
1 Nevertheless the dimness shall not be such as was in her vexation, when at the first he lightly afflicted the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, and afterward did more grievously afflict her by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, in Galilee of the nations.

2 The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light: they that dwelt in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

3 Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not increased the joy: they joy before thee according to the joy in harvest, and as men rejoice when they divide the spoil.

CHAPTER IX.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet continues to foretell the times of the Messias; the sixth and the seventh verses being an illustrious prophecy of his birth and kingdom. Afterward he returns to describe the calamitous state of the ten tribes, and the provoking sins they were guilty of in the midst of those judgments; which subject is continued to x. 5. The writings of the prophets are very much obscured by the unskillful division of the chapters, which very often break off in the middle of a subject; as at other times, discourses are joined together, that have no affinity with each other.

Ver. 1. Nevertheless the dimness shall not be such as was in her vexation, &c.] If we follow the division of the text just now mentioned, and begin this chapter in the original with the words kay'v harashon, the verse may be thus translated according to Mr. Mede (see book i. disc. 25, p. 101 of the fol. edit.): "As the first (or former) time made void (or debased) the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali" (when the king of Assyria, Tiglath-pileser, carried great part of that country captive: see 2 Kings xv. 29); "so the latter time shall make them glorious, the way of the sea by Jordan, Galilee of the nations, the people that walked in darkness," &c. This translation exactly agrees with the sense of the text, as it is applied by St. Matthew to our Saviour's preaching in Galilee, by the "borders of Zebulun and Napthali" (Matt. iv. 13, 14). So that to make the Hebrew text correspond with the sense of it given by the evangelist, we must understand it is containing a comfortable promise to those parts of Judæa; whereas the contrary is rather suggested in the usual translation of the words. This translation is likewise agreeable to the stops or sentences which are placed under the Hebrew text, where we find a full stop put at the word lechid, which is not taken notice of in the common versions. But if we follow that sense, which the English and most other translations give of the place, we must understand the people spoken of in the second verse to be the same with those mentioned in the first.

By the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, in Galilee of the nations.] By the sea is meant the sea of Galilee away from the distress of that [land], or that [time]."

For the first six words in the Hebrew text of the ninth chapter: the first verse be joined to this; which division of the words is confirmed by the Chaldee paraphrast and the Vulgar Latin, and is indeed necessary for the explaining the prophecy contained in the first two verses of the following chapter (see more there).
4 For thou hast broken the yoke of his burden, and the staff of his shoulder, the rod of his oppressor, as in the day of Midian.

5 For every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood; but this shall be with burning and fuel of fire.

6 For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.

7 Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish introduces this prophecy with this preface. The prophetic speech to the house of David. Compare viii. 13.

Unto us a son is given; God's sending his Son into the world," especially his "giving him to die for our sins," is spoken of in scripture as the greatest gift that God could bestow upon mankind (see John iii. 16. 10), and may fully be applied to the mystery of our redemption, which the scripture speaks of as the great masterpiece of the divine wisdom (see Eph. iii. 10).

Counselor.] i. e. Intimate to all his Father's counsels and decrees, "those eternal purposes which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord," as St. Paul speaks. In the spiritual sense we are to understand those words of St. John, that "the onlybegotten Son was in the bosom of the Father" (John i. 18), and those of Christ, "None knows the Father, save the Son" (Matt. xi. 27).

The mighty God.] The same expression is used, x. 21, concerning the God of Israel. Christ is likewise styled the Almighty," Rev. i. 8.

The everlasting Father.] "The author of eternal salvation," as Christ is styled by St. Paul, Heb. v. 9. The Septuagint renders the words, μητρὸς ὕποτισας αὐτοῦ, "The Father of the world to come;" and the Vulgar Latin follows this translation; which, since the Hebrew words will admit of, I cannot but have a particular regard for, because I xxxv. 10, is from the authority of this text, that the state of the gospel, or the kingdom of the Messias, is called in the New Testament by the title of μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, "The age," or "world to come" (see Matt. xii. 32. Heb. ii. 8. vi. 5).

The everlasting Father.] If we follow the common translation, the words are very applicable to Christ. Masters and teachers have a title of fathers commonly given to them (see 2 Kings ii. 12. vi. 21. xiii. 11. I Cor. iv. 15). So our Lord calls his disciples his children (John xiii. 23. xxi. 5). And St Paul applies that text of Isaiah (viii. 18), "Behold I, and the children whom God hath given me," to Christ and his followers.]
it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this.

8 ¶ The Lord sent a word unto Jacob, and it hath lighted upon Israel.

9 And all the people shall know, even Ephraim and the inhabitant of Samaria, that say in the pride and stoutness of heart,

10 The bricks are fallen down, but we will build with hewn stones: the sycamores are cut down, but we will change them into cedars.

11 Therefore the Lord shall set up the adversaries of Rezin against him, and join his enemies together;

12 The Syrians before, and the Philistines behind; and they shall devour Israel with open mouth. For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still.

Ver. 7. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end.] The Jews write the Hebrew word lemordek with a mem chosam, as they call it, wherefore may think some great mystery is implied: this conceit of theirs shows that there hath been an ancient tradition among them for interpreting this place of the Messias.

Upon the throne of David, &c.] The Messias is said to sit upon the throne of David, because all the promises concerning the perpetuity of his family and kingdom, did chiefly relate to Christ, and were fulfilled in him (see Gen. xlix. 10); whose kingdom was truly and properly to be an everlasting kingdom (Dan. ii. 44. vii. 11). For the same reason Christ is called by the name of David (Ezek. xxxiv. 23. Jer. xxx. 9. Hos. iii. 5). Justice and righteousness are elsewhere spoken of as the characteristics of Christ's kingdom (see xi. 4. Ps. xlv. 6. lxix. 1. 2.)

The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this.] God shall do this, not out of regard to a man's deserts, but to his own honour; and that there may be always a society of people in the world called by his name, and heirs of the promises which he made to their fathers (compare xxxii. 32). The redemption of the world is always spoken of as an act of God's free grace and mercy (see Rom. iii. 21. Eph. ii. 8. 2 Tim. i. 9).

Ver. 8.] The remainder of this chapter contains a prophecy against Israel (see ver. 9); and was uttered before the carrying away of the ten tribes into captivity.

The Lord sent a word into Jacob, and it hath lighted upon Israel. He speaks here of the judgments that were antecedent to their captivity (see ver. 11, 12), and saith, God hath brought to pass those threatenings which he had before denounced against them by his prophets. The place is parallel to that of Daniel ix. 12. "He hath confirmed his words which he spake against us." Jacob and Israel are synonymous terms here, and so they are used, viii. 17. 18. x. 20. xvi. 2. 4.

Ver. 9.] God's hand shall visibly appear in his judgments. But Abraham a Shultens, in his Critical Observations upon Job, notes, that the Hebrew word yadang, which commonly signifies to know, is sometimes used for suffering punishment, and in this sense he understands the word here, as also Job xii. 19. and Judges vii. 16. where it is said, that with briars and thorns Gideon taught the men of Succoth;" or as the margin reads, "made them know what they had deserved."

Ver. 10.] The words import the people's sighing God's judgments, as if the damage suffered by them might easily be repaired, and therefore they were not worth minding or laying to heart; and men, instead of humbling themselves under his mighty hand, took occasion from thence to indulge their pride and luxury: cedars were proper for stately buildings, such as the temple and the king's palace (see 2 Sam. vii. 2. 1 Kings vii. 15. compare this verse with 1 Kings x. 27).

Ver. 11. Against him.] probably means against Ephraim, and Israel, mentioned ver. 9. Rezin the king of Syria was a great ally and support of the king of Israel (see vii. 1); so his being subdued and slain by Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria (2 Kings xvi. 9) was a great blow to Pekah and his subjects: for when Tiglath-pileser had subdued the Syrians, he made them join with his army in invading Israel (see the following verse).

Ver. 12.] i. e. The Syrians from the east, and the Philistines from the west; so the Septuagint understand it (compare Joel ii. 20). The Philistines were ancient enemies to Israel, and took all occasions to give them disturbance.

Ver. 14.] i. e. Both great and small (see the following verse, and xix. 16).

Ver. 16.] When the blind lead the blind, both fall into the ditch. The margin reads, They that call this people blessed: the expression is the same with that of ii. 12 (see the note there).

Ver. 17. The Lord shall have no joy in their young men, neither shall have mercy on their fatherless and widows.] When the people were in his favour, God is said to "love them over them to do them good" (Dutch xxviii. 62). The quite contrary is said here, that whereas in former times God did, like an indulgent father, take pleasure in seeing their young men grow up and flourish; now he would have no regard for the strength of their nation, nor have compassion upon the weak and helpless part of it, but deliver them up alike into the power of their enemies.

For every one is a hypocrite] The Hebrew word ha'emeph signifies a lewd, or profane person; and so it is used, Job viii. 13. xiii. 16. xv. 34. and the noun hanophah is translated profaneness, by our interpreters, Jer. xxviii. 15.

Ver. 18.] For wickedness burneth as the fire.] Wickedness causeth utter ruin and destruction; it

Chapter X.

Argument.—The first four verses of this chapter should have been joined to the foregoing, as has been already observed in the argument of the ninth chapter. The remaining part of the chapter is a denunciation of God's judgments upon Sennacherib, whom God had made the instrument of his vengeance upon others: but when that end of providence was served, he himself should suffer a more remarkable punishment than that which he had executed upon his neighbours.

Verse 1. A continuation of the subject treated of in the foregoing chapter, wherein the prophet reproves the sins of the ten tribes, particularly their injustice and oppression, and denounces the judgments they should suffer for the same.

Verse 3. What will ye do in the day of visitation? God is said to visit when he punishes (Jer. x. 9), and the time of punishment is called the "day of visitation" (Jer. x. 15, xi. 23). The punishment here threatened is said to come from far, viz. from Assyria (see note on v. 26, compared with viii. 1). The prophets elsewhere mention thus as an aggravation of God's judgments upon his people, that he would suffer them to be subdued by foreigners, with whose language they were unacquainted, so that it would be in vain to try to soften them by arguments or entreaties (see Deut. xxviii. 49, Jer. v. 13).

CHAP. X.

shall devour the briers and thorns, and shall kindle in the thickets of the forest, and they shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke.

19 Through the wrath of the Lord of hosts is the land darkened, and the people shall be as the fuel of the fire: no man shall spare his brother.

20 And he shall snatch on the right hand, and makes men fit fuel for God’s vengeance to take hold of (compare ver. 19, and Job xxxi. 12).

It shall devour the briers and thorns, and shall kindle in the thickets of the forest. It shall make a general destruction of the tall cedars as well as of the lower shrubs (compare x. 17, 18, 31). The Chaldee paraphrast renders the former part of the sentence thus, “It shall consume the sinners and the wicked:” in which sense, briers and thorns are often used in scripture, upon the account of their unfruitfulness, and because as thorns presently catch the fire, so destruction lays hold on sinners. Compare xxvii. 4, xxxiii. 12, Misc. vii. 4. Ps. lvii. 9, where the words may best be rendered, “He shall take them away (the thorns mentioned just before) both green and dry” (see the like expression, Ezek. xx. 47).

Verse 19.] Compare v. 30, viii. 22.

be hungry; and he shall eat on the left hand, and they shall not be satisfied: they shall eat every man the flesh of his own arm:

21 Manasseh, Ephraim; and Ephraim, Manasseh: and they together shall be against Judah. For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still.

Verse 20. He shall snatch on the right hand, and be hungry: &c.] They shall plunder and devour one another without ever being satisfied or giving over. They shall eat every man the flesh of his own arm:] i.e. Those of his own country, and even those of his own blood (compare xlix. 26). This was literally fulfilled, when they were reduced to that extremity, as to “eat the flesh of their own children” (see 2 Kings vi. 25. Jer. xix. 8): a judgment denounced for their sins by Moses (Deut. xxviii. 52).

Verse 21.] When those of the ten tribes had preyed upon one another as long as they could, they should turn their rage upon Judah, whom they looked upon as their common enemy, upon the account of their own separation from God’s public worship established there (see vii. 6).

Far? to whom will ye flee for help? and where will ye leave your glory?

4 Without me they shall bow down under the prisoners, and they shall fall under the slain. For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still.

5 ¶ O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is mine indignation.

6 I will send him against a hypocritical nation, to deposit his honours and possessions! To whose keeping or protection will you entrust them, that they be not exposed as a prey to your enemies?

Verse 4.] The Septuagint and Vulgar Latin join these words with the foregoing verse, to this sense, “Whither will this people fly for refuge to preserve themselves, that they may not bow down, or be subdued among the captives, or destroyed by the slain?” This seems the easiest and most natural sense of the words, taking the particle bilti for lebili; which word is used in this sense, Jer. xxiii. 14.

If we follow our own translation, the words import that it is in vain for the Israelites to trust in their own strength, or in the assistance of their allies, such as the Syrians were, since it is from God alone that they must expect deliverance from the impendest evils, who for their sins are miserably displeased.

Verse 5. O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger,] Here begins a new prophecy which reaches to the end of the chapter, and instructs us in this great and important truth, that God often prospers wicked and tyrannical governments to be his scourge, and the instruments of his vengeance upon others; and when they have done the work which God allotted them, he then punishes them for those very oppressions which they have exercised towards their neighbours, and to which they were carried on purely by their own ambition and covetousness, although providence made them serviceable to better ends and purposes. The prophet directs this discourse to Sennacherib king of Assyria (see ver. 9, 16).
tion, and against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge, to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets.

7 Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so; but it is in his heart to destroy and cut off nations not a few.

8 For he saith, Are not my princes altogether kings?

9 Is not Calno as Carnochish? is not Hamath as Arpad? is not Samaria as Damascus?

10 As my hand hath found the kingdoms of the idols, and whose graven images did excel them of Jerusalem and of Samaria;

11 Shall I not as I have done unto Samaria and her idols, so do to Jerusalem and her idols?

12 Wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon mount Zion and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks.

13 For he saith, By the strength of my hand And the staff in their hand is mine indignation.]

Or, “The staff of mine indignation is in their hand.”

So the wicked are called “a sword of God,” Ps. xvii. 13, and his “weapons of war,” Jer. li. 20.

Ver. 6.) Or, “a profane nation,” as the word hanechah signifies (see note on 17). The like commission God gives to Cyrus (xli. 26, xlv. 1), and to Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxv. 9).

Ver. 7.) The Assyrian’s design was purely to extend his conquests, and thereby gratify his own ambition; although God, that can bring good out of evil, made him instrumental in carrying on the designs of his providence. For which reason God justly punishes those very princes for the cruelties they committed, notwithstanding that they are the instruments of his vengeance in committing them; because that is beside their own intention, the wickedness of the facts being altogether their own, and the good ends served by them to be wholly ascribed unto God. Thus God punished Jeho for his cruelty towards the house of Ahah, although he himself gave him a commission (see 2 Kings ix. 7), to put those very judgments denounced against Ahad’s family in execution (see Hosea i. 4, and the note on Isa. xlvii. 7).

Ver. 8. Are not my princes altogether kings? He makes his boast that kings are his tributaries, and obey his commands. Upon this account Nebuchadnezzar is styled a king of kings (Dan. ii. 37, Ezek. xxvii. 7). The same title is given to Artaxerxes (Ezra vii. 12). And this very king of Assyria, Sennacherib, is called a great king in this prophecy (xxxvi. 4).

Ver. 9.) Have I not been equally successful against all these cities? some of which lay at a greater distance from Judea, upon the river Euphrates, as Calno, called Calneh, Amos vi. 2, and Charchemish, 2 Chron. xxxv. 20. Others, as Hamath, were upon the confines of the Jewish territories, towards Syria, and therefore called the entrance of Hamath. Amos vi. 14 (compare this place with 2 Kings xviii. 33—35, which fully explains the sense of this and the following verses).

Ver. 10.) My power hath subdued them, they have not been able to escape out of my hand (compare ver. 11, and Ps. xxi. 8).

Ver. 11.) The prophet speaks in the person of the king of Assyria, who looked upon the God of the Jews to be no better than the other gods of the countries. I have done it and by my wisdom; for I am prudent: and I have removed the bounds of the people, and have robbed their treasures, and I have put down the inhabitants like a valiant man:

14 And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people: and as one gathereth eggs that are left, have I gathered all the earth; and there was none that moved the wing, or opened the mouth, or peeped.

15 Shall the ax boast itself against him that heweth therewith? or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? as if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up, or as if the staff should lift up itself, as if it were no wood.

16 Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send among his fat ones leanness; and under his glory he shall kindle a burning like the burning of a fire.

17 And the light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame: and it shall burn round about (see 2 Kings xviii. 33), which deities, as he thought, sufficiently discovered their weakness in not being able to deliver their own countries and vassals.

Ver. 12.) Thus Jeremy foretells the destruction of the king of Babylon, as soon as over the seventy years of the Jewish captivity are ended (Jer. xxv. 19—14). And here, in like manner, God saith, he will “punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria;” i.e. those deeds and achievements which were the effects of his pride and ambition. The word fruit is equivalent to work (see Prov. xxxi. 16, 31). So the “fruits of the Spirit” are the effects of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22).

Ver. 13.) He ascribes all his success to his own prowess and wisdom, according to the usual pride of such haughty tyrants (compare Ezek. xxvii. 8—6). This success of his appeared in the new modelling the governments of his new conquests, and destroying many of those cities which were formerly frontier towns, and transplanting the people from one country to another, a common practice with conquerors (see 2 Kings xvii. 6, 24).

Ver. 11. And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the people; &c.) I have made myself master of their substance and treasures, so easily as one takes away a nest of young birds, neither the dam nor the young ones daring to complain.

Or perplexed. It means the same with chirped (see viii. 19).

Ver. 15.) Men are only second causes and instruments in the hands of providence (see note on ver. 9), therefore the glory ought to be ascribed to God alone.

Ver. 16. Send among his fat ones leanness;) Shall consume his principal men for strength and courage (compare Ps. xxxiii. 31).

Under his glory he shall kindle a burning like the burning of a fire.) A sudden destruction is often compared to fire (see ix. 5). The expression here denotes that sudden stroke which destroyed the whole Assyrian army, 2 Kings xix. 35 (compare Isa. xxx. 33).

Ver. 17.) God is called the light of Israel, perhaps in allusion to the pillar of fire which conducted them in the wilderness, and he will now be a consuming fire to devour their adversaries.

Ibid. and ver. 15. It shall burn and devour his and devour his thorns and his briers in one day; 18 And shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field, both soul and body: and they shall be as when a standardbearer fainteth. 19 And the rest of the trees of his forest shall be few, that a child may write them. 20 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the remnant of Israel, and such as are escaped of the house of Jacob, shall no more again stay upon him that smote them; but shall stay upon the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, in truth.

21 The remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob, unto the mighty God.

22 For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the sea, yet a remnant of them shall return: the consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness.

CHAPTER X.

23 For the Lord God of hosts shall make a consumption, even determined, in the midst of all the land.

24 ¶ Therefore thus saith the Lord God of hosts, O my people that dwellest in Zion, be not afraid of the Assyrian: he shall smite thee with a rod, and shall lift up his staff against thee, after the manner of Egypt.

25 For yet a very little while, and the indignation shall cease, and mine anger in their destruction.

26 And the Lord of hosts shall stir up a scourge for him according to the slaughter of Midian at the rock of Oreb: and as his rod was upon the sea, so shall he lift it up after the manner of Egypt.

27 And it shall come to pass in that day, that future conversion of the Jews; but I leave it to him to explain how the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who, according to his own interpretation, "were cooped up by their enemies within that city," can be said to return home upon raising the siege.

The consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness. God's judgments are said to overflow, when they spread universally; the metaphor being taken from an inundation that sweeps all before it (compare viii. 28, xxviii. 15. Dan. ix. 26. xi. 10. 22. 26). The word righteousness signifies here the severity of justice. (see note on v. 16).

Ver. 23. Determined is the same with decreed, or pronounced by the sentence of God, the supreme judge; the word likewise imports that this destruction shall be but for a limited time, not to endure for ever (compare xviii. 22. Dan. ix. 27. xi. 36). This consumption relates immediately to that desolation which Sennacherib should make over the whole land of Judea (see 2 Kings xvii. 13): none but Jerusalem escaping that judgment; but it hath a farther aspect upon that universal desolation which shall overspread that country and people after their rejecting the Messias.

Ver. 24. O my people that dwellest in Zion, be not afraid of the Assyrian! The promises of deliverance from Sennacherib's invasion are made only to the inhabitants of Zion and Jerusalem (see xxxvii. 9, 22): but in this verse the prophet extends the promises, in which God will fulfill the promises made to their fathers (see Rom. xi. 7. 28).

And shall lift up his staff against thee. He shall come against Jerusalem with all his force, to make an entire conquest over the Jews, as the Egyptians endeavored to do, Exod. xiv. 9. The use of the word staff is explained before [ix. 4].

Ver. 25. It shall appear by their destruction that mine anger is turned away from thee.

Ver. 26. The Lord of hosts shall stir up a scourge for him. And shall lift up his rod, as it follows, in opposition to the "rod of the Assyrian," mentioned ver. 24.

According to the slaughter of Midian. See ix. 4. And as his rod was upon the sea, so shall he lift it up! God shall give as evident tokens of his power interposing for the deliverance of his people, as Moses did when he lifted up his rod for a signal of the Egyptians' overthrow (Exod. xiv. 20).

Ver. 27. His burden shall be taken away from off thy shoulders. Compare ix. 4. xiv. 26. And they shall be destroyed because of the amounting for the sake of God's chosen people (especially the remnant mentioned ver. 20, 21), called his anointed.
is his burden shall be taken away from off thy shoulder, and his yoke from off thy neck, and the yoke shall be destroyed because of the anointing.

28 He is come to Aiath, he is passed to Migron; at Michael he hath laid up his carriages:

29 They are gone over the passage: they have taken up their lodging at Geba; Ramah is afraid; Gibeah of Saul is fled.

30 Lift up thy voice, O daughter of Gallim: cause it to be heard unto Laish, O poor Anathoth.

Ps. cv. 15, and likewise for the preservation of the kingdom and priesthood, both which offices were conferred by the ceremony of anointing. But without question the Messias, the anointed in an eminent sense (as the word signifies) and described as such. Ps. xlv. 7, is principally intended here, who was to rise from the stock of Judah, and whose coming is directly foretold in the following chapter. God preserved the kingdom of Judah from utter destruction, because the Messias was to come from that tribe (see note on vii. 10).

Ver. 29—31.] In these verses the prophet describes the march of Sennacherib's army, and the consternation which is raised in all the towns and countries through which it passed in its way towards Jerusalem.

Ver. 32. As yet shall he remain at Nob that day. Or, to-day: the prophet describes the army as coming within sight of Jerusalem so that after one day's march they might sit down before it. Thus the king of Assyria did literally "shake his hand against it," as it follows, and stood in a threatening posture as just ready to assault it.

Ver. 33.] The prophet here, as before (ver. 19), describes the destruction of the Assyrian army by the metaphor of cutting down a forest. Princes and great ones are commonly represented by the tallest trees, as the mean people are by the lower shrubs, or the thicket (ver. 34), compare xlv. 8, xxxvii. 24.

Ezek. xxi. where the same metaphor is pursued throughout the whole chapter, Dan. iv. 10. Jer. xxii. 6. (see Ver. 34.) The flower of the Assyrian army shall fall by the stroke of a mighty angel (2 Kings xix. 35). Might is often ascribed to angels (Ps. ciii. 20. 2 Pet. ii. 11. Rev. xviii. 21). Lebanon was famous for its tall cedars, to which the captains and principal commanders of the Assyrian army are here compared (see xxxvii. 24).

CHAPTER XI.

1 And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots:

2 And the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord:

3 And shall make him of quick understanding

[\textit{A rod out of the stem of Jesse.}] The prophet expresses the family of David by "the stem of Jesse," who was a private man, to imply that the royal-house should then be reduced to a private condition. The Chaldee paraphrase expounds this text of the Messias: "There shall come a king out of the sons of Jesse, and Christ shall arise from his sons' sons."]

It is usual for the prophets to take occasion from some great temporal deliverance, to foretell the blessings of the gospel.

Ver. 2. [\textit{The spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him.}] The Messias, being the great prophet foretold by Moses (Deut. xviii. 15), is described as more plentifully endowed with the gifts of God's Spirit, than any other prophet ever was (see Ps. xlv. 7. Isa. xlii. 1. xli. 1. John iii. 34. Acts x. 38). The gift of sanctification is peculiarly attributed to the Holy Ghost. And since the union of the Logos, or Word, with the human nature of Christ, is ascribed by the sacred writers to the operation of the Holy Ghost, all the extraordinary graces consequent to that union, may upon that account be justly attributed to the same principle.

\textit{Of wisdom and understanding.} The former may be understood of divine things, the latter of natural.

\textit{Of counsel and might.} Of counsel to form good designs, and of might, or courage, to execute them. The word geburat, which our translation renders \textit{might}, signifies courage (compare xxviii. 6). This word is often translated \textit{Á½Ò³Ì·} by the Septuagint, to the same sense; in which sense it is likewise used by in the fear of the Lord: and he shall not judge after the light of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears:

4 But with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.

5 And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins.

6 The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the falling together; and a little child shall lead them.

7 And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox.

8 And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den.

9 They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.

St. Paul, 2 Tim. i. 7, where he saith, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, nor of contempt for the truth of Christ's mission, and laying down his life in the confirmation of what he had preached, were as great instances of constancy and courage, as his sufferings themselves were of meekness and patience. Accordingly he is called "the faithful witness," or martyr, by St. John (Rev. i. 5), and St. Paul speaks of "the good confession which he witnessed before Pontius Pilate," as a pattern to his followers, of adhering constantly to the truth, even to death (1 Tim. vi. 13.).

Of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord: The knowledge of the law or will of God, and a disposition to obey it: the will of God may not improperly be ascribed to Christ, who in all things gave God the glory, and professed that he had received all things from him (see Matt. xii. 26), and was himself the most perfect pattern of an entire submission and resignation to the will of God; and therefore is said by St. Paul to have been "in that he feared," or upon the account of his piety (Heb. v. 7.)

The Septuagint reckon up here seven gifts of the Spirit ascribed to the "seven spirits of God," mentioned Zech. iii. 9, Rev. i. 4.

Ver. 3. And shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord: In things pertaining unto godliness: he shall lay hold of all opportunities of advancing God's honour, and promoting true piety: this exactly answers that character our Saviour gives of himself: that he made it "his meat and drink to do the will of him that sent him, and to finish his work" (John iv. 34).

He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes. "He will not judge according to outward appearance, but will judge righteous judgment," as our Saviour speaks, John vii. 24.

Ver. 4. But with righteousness shall he judge the poor. It is a great sign of the impartial administration of justice, when the poor are equally regarded with the rich, and protected from the oppressions of the great ones. Accordingly this is a constant character of Christ's kingdom (see Ps. lxxii. 2, 12. Isa. xxvi. 6, with these and other passages of the blessings of the gospel are peculiarly promised to the poor (Matt. v. 3. James ii. 5), that is, to those who have the true spirit of poverty, which consists in a contempt of this world, and a humble submission to the dispensations of providence.

He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth. As a rod is often compared to a rod (Ps. cx. 2), and to a "rod of iron" (Ps. ii. 9), because it will, in the end, break to pieces all its adversaries (see Dan. ii. 41. Rev. ii. 27). This rod is said here to proceed out of the mouth of Christ, as it signifies the word of God, containing his threatening and judgments denounced against sinners. This same word is said by St. Paul to be "sharper than any two-edged sword." (Heb. iv. 12), because it cut\erely consume and destroy those that continue disobedient, in allusion to the words here; this sword is described as proceeding "out of the mouth of Christ (Rev. i. 16), because it is like a sentence of condemnation pronounced upon the rebellious by him as the judge of the world (see John xii. 49).

The earth here signifies the ungodly, who are elsewhere called the world (see John vii. 32. xv. 21. xviii. 9, 14.)

Ver. 5. A girdle was a mark of honour (see xxii. 21); and was used both for strength and expedition (see v. 27. Ps. lxxvi. 6. Luke xii. 35.) The expression implies here, that a strict regard to truth, integrity, and justice, will be the honour and stability of Christ's kingdom (compare Eph. vi. 11). On the contrary, antichrist is described as coming "with all deceiv-

Ver. 6-8. These metaphorical expressions note, that everything shall contribute towards a firm and lasting peace, both inward and outward occasions of disturbances being removed; the great and powerful, that use to oppress their inferiors, being disposed to come to terms of accommodation. This may be meant by the "wolf and the lamb's dwelling together," and like expressions that follow (compare Excles. xiii. 17-19). But they further imply that God will protect his people against all persecution and outward violence, which is elsewhere expressed by his "making a covenant for them with the beasts of the field." (Hos. ii. 18. compared with Lev. xxvi. 5. John v. 23. Ezek. xxxiv. 25; see likewise the note on xxxv. 9.)

Ver. 9. They shall not hurt! See note on ii. 2. For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord: These words are a proof that the expressions used in the foregoing verses are metaphorical, and denote that the great change is: the outward face of things, under the flourishing state: Christ's kingdom, shall be chiefly owing to the increase of their knowledge in the duties of religion, which, when it is made the governing principle of men's lives, does tame the roughest tempers, and subdue the most boisterous passions; for whence it follows, that
And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek: and his rest shall be glorious.

And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea.

And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth.

The envy also of Ephraim shall depart, of the Jewish nation; when they shall embrace the gospel, and be restored to their own country from the several dispensations where they are scattered; this remarkable scene of providence, is plainly foretold by most of the prophets of the Old Testament, and by St. Paul in the new (see Deut. xxx. 3—5, xxiii. 43. Isa. xxvii. 12, 13. xlv. 17, &c. xli. 6, &c. liv. lix. lxv. lxv. Jer. xxii. 8. xxx. 8—10, xxxi. 36. 40. 1. 4. Ezek. xi. 17, &c. xx. 31, &c. xxiv. 13. xxvii. 24. &c. xxviii. 21. Hos. 1. 11. iii. 5. Joel iii. 1. &c. Amos xi. 15. Obad. ver. 17, &c. Mic. vii. 14, 15. Zech. vii. 13. x. 6, &c. xii. xiv. 18, &c. Rom. xi. 23. 26. 2 Cor. iii. 16. The Lord shall set his hand again the second time, &c. The words imply that this shall be as great a deliverance as that out of Egypt (compare Ps. lxviii. 23. Mic. vii. 15).

From Assyria, and from Egypt.] See note on ver. 16.

From Pathros.] A country in Egypt (see Jeremiah xliv. 1. Ezek. xxiii. 14)

Cush.] See note on xviii. 1.

Elam.] i. e. Persia.

Shinar.] See note on xxx. 21.

Hamath.] See note on x. 9.

From the islands of the sea.] The Jews call all those places islands that lie upon the seacoast, especially the countries upon the Mediterranean sea, the coast whereof they were best acquainted with. Thus the posterity of Japheth is said to peopled the "islands of the gentiles" (Gen. x. 5); that is, the seacoast of Asia and Greece (see Mr. Mede, book i. discourse 49). So that the expression of the text may very well comprehend even the European nations, and confines that cavil of Mr. White's, in his argument of this chapter, against understanding this part of the chapter of the restoration of the Jews in their own land, and the language of them, to the west of them, and as the scripture lands of England, Holland, Germany, &c. where their number is greatest. And it is observable, that generally where the prophet Isaiah foretells the calling of the gentiles, he makes particular mention of the islands (see xxi. 1. xii. 10. xiii. 1. ii. 5. ix. 9) which many interpreters have looked upon as a plain intimation, that the Christian religion should take deepest root in those parts of the world which were separated from the Jews by the sea, and peopled by the posterity of Japheth, who settled themselves in the island of the gentiles. So that the islands, in the prophetic style, seem particularly to denote the western parts of the world, or the European nations; the west being often called the see in the scripture language. In like manner, some explain the isles afar off, mentioned lxxvi. 19. of the western parts of the world, and suppose them, with the other countries there named, to denote the four quarters of the earth. Ver. 12.] See ver. 10. The gentiles shall not only come into the church themselves, but shall likewise make as it were a couple, as by a signet, restore all the Jews to their own country, and assemble them from the several dispersions whither they have been scattered (compare xlii. 6. xlii. 22. 4. lixi. 10).

Ver. 13.] When the ten tribes made a separation from Judah, Ephraim was looked upon as the principal tribe of that separation, and is often put for Israel, and the adversaries of Judah shall be cut off: Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim.

14 But they shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines toward the west; they shall spoil them of the east together: they shall lay their hand upon Edom and Moab; and the children of Ammon shall obey them.

15 And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea; and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river, and shall snite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dryshod.

16 And there shall be an highway for the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria; like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt.

CHAPTER XII.

1 And in that day thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise thee: though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst me.

2 Behold, God is my salvation: I will trust, and not be afraid: for the Lord JEHOVAH is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation.

3 Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter is a hymn of praise, proper to be used in that triumphant state of the church, described in the foregoing chapter. Of the same use are the hymns recorded xxv. xxvi. and Rev. xxv. 3. Many of the psalms relate to the same glorious time, particularly Ps. xxi. xxvi. xxvii. cxlix. Vol. III. 33—43.

4 And in that day shall ye say, Praise the Lord, call upon his name, declare his doings among the people, make mention that his name is exalted.

5 Sing unto the Lord; for he hath done excellent things: this is known in all the earth.

6 Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion: for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee.

Ver. 3.] From God's mercy and bounty, who is the fountain of life, and of all blessings, both spiritual and temporal (Ps. xxxvi. 9. Jer. ii. 13). The Jews did use to repeat this verse, when, with a great deal of joy and ceremony, they drew water out of the river of Shiloh upon the last day of the feast of tabernacles: to which custom our Saviour is supposed to allude, John vii. 37.
CHAPTER XIII.

ARGUMENT.—Here begins the third part of this prophecy, which reaches unto the end of the twenty-seventh chapter. After the description of those glorious times which should come to pass in the latter days, the prophet foretells the destruction of God's enemies, and begins with Babylon, whither God's people were to be carried captive, and therefore was a type or figure of antichrist, the great enemy of God and his church (see Rev. xvi. 5). And whoever carefully considers several particulars in this and the next chapter, and compares them with the former part of the twenty-first chapter with ch. xlvii. and the fiftieth and fifty-first chapters of Jeremiah, which treat of the same subject, will easily find that these prophecies have an aspect beyond the taking of Babylon by Cyrus; inasmuch as the prophets describe this judgment as a decisive stroke, that should thoroughly vindicate the cause of oppressed truth and innocence, and put a final period to idolatry, and to all the miseries and oppressions of God's people: several of which particulars shall be taken notice of as the text offers occasion.

Ver. 1. A burden, in the language of the prophets, is a burdensome prophecy, threatening ruin and destruction. This word came, in aftertimes, to be used by way of derision of God's threatenings among the profane Jews, upon which account he forbade the use of it (see Jer. xxiii. 33, 34, &c.).

Ver. 2. Lift ye up a banner upon the high mountain, exalt the voice unto them, shake the hand, that they may go into the gates of the nobles. The use of setting up a banner is for assembling of men as the prophet speaks (compare v. 20), which was for that reason set up on a high hill, that it might be more taken notice of (see xviii. 3. xxx. 17), shaking or lifting up the hand was a token that served to the same purpose (compare xix. 29).

Ver. 3. I have commanded my sanctified ones, That is, those whom I have appointed and set apart for this purpose. To sanctify war, in the Hebrew language, is the same as to prepare war (see Jer. vi. 4. xxii. 7. Joel iii. 9). To the same purpose, God calls Nebuchadnezzar his servant and chosen (see xxv. 9), and Cyrus his anointed (Isa. xlv. 1), because they were ordained and set apart by God to be the executioners of his judgments upon those nations whom he had marked out for destruction.

Ver. 4. And they shall be afraid; pangs and sorrows shall take hold of them; they shall be in pain as a woman that travaileth: they shall be amazed one at another; their faces shall be as flames.

Ver. 5. Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate: and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it.

Ver. 6. For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light: the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine.
11 And I will punish the world for their evil, and the wicked for their iniquity; and I will cause the arrogancy of the proud to cease, and will lay low the haughtiness of the terrible.

12 I will make a man more precious than fine gold; even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir.

13 Therefore I will shake the heavens, and the earth shall remove out of her place, in the wrath of the Lord of hosts, and in the day of his fierce anger.

14 And it shall be as the chased roe, and as a sheep that no man taketh up: they shall every man turn to his own people, and flee every one into his own land.

15 Every one that is found shall be thrust through; and every one that is joined unto them shall fall by the sword.

16 Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes; their houses shall be spoiled, and their wives ravished.

17 Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them, which shall not regard silver; and as for gold, they shall not delight in it.

18 Their bows also shall dash young men to pieces; and they shall have no pity on the fruit of the womb; their eye shall not spare children.

19 ¶ And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees’ excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.

forrunners of the last and general judgment, the same expressions are common to both (compare Joel iii. 15. Matt. xxiv. 29. 2 Pet. iii. 10).

Ver. 11.] See xiv. 4—6. 13, 14, and the note upon ii. 11.

Ver. 12.] I will make a man more precious than fine gold.] This expression denotes the havoc that should be made of such men as were fit to bear arms, which should make them become as scarce as gold, and as valuable (see the like calamity described iv. 1), or else the words may import, that the Medes shall spare no man’s life, though he would purchase it with gold (compare ver. 17).

Even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir.] Ophir was a place noted for the best gold, whither Solomon trafficked for it (1 Kings ix. 28), though the place was famous for it long before, as appears by the book of Job, xxviii. 16. Some place Ophir in the East Indies, particularly Renanus, in his dissertation upon this subject. Bochart thinks that there was an Ophir in Arabia Felix, which is the place probably meant in Job, though he supposes the Ophir that Solomon traded with to be in India (see his Phæg. lib. ii. cap. 27). Huetins places Ophir in the eastern coast of Africa, where there is a place still named Sophala, which retains some affinity with Ophir, called Sophor by Polybius, lib. iv. 1, 1 Kings ix. 28 (see his treatise De Navigation. Solomonis, cap. 2).

Ver. 13.] These expressions denote great alteration (see note on v. 29, and compare Hag. ii. 6. Heb. xii. 27).

Ver. 11. It shall be as the chased roe, and as a sheep that no man taketh up.] The inhabitants of the country shall fly from place to place like a roe, one of the most timorous creatures that is pursued; and having lost their leaders, shall wander up and down like sheep that have lost their shepherd (compare 1 Kings xxii. 17).

They shall every man turn to his own people, and flee every one into his own land.] All the auxiliary forces which the Babylonians, shall make what haste they can to get home again, as people do in a general overthrow (compare Jer. i. 16. 1 Kings xxii. 26).

Ver. 15.] All the associates of the Babylonians, though they be foreigners, shall partake of their fate.

Ver. 16. Their children also shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes.] By way of retaliation for the cruelty of the Babylonians against the Jews (see 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17. Ps. cxxxvii. 9. Their houses shall be spoiled, and their wives ravished.] All manner of liberty shall be given to the rapine and lust of the soldiers (compare Zech. xiv. 2).

Ver. 17. I will stir up the Medes against them.] A nation of no account when Isaiah uttered this prophecy: their country being a province under the king of Assyria (see 2 Kings xvii. 6); and not erected into a distinct kingdom till Darius, their first king, took the administration of the government, about the time when several other of the western nations began to advance; and as they grew to be a very considerable people, and made up the principal part of the army which was brought against Babylon by Cyrus (who himself was a Median by the mother’s side); which army is upon that account described as coming from the north (Jer. i. 9. 11), for so Medin lay with respect to Babylon (see Hyghsea Isa. xxiv. 23). The Medes afterward, by Cyrus’s means, came to have the chief share in that empire; which he erected upon the ruins of the Babylonian monarchy, which is therefore called the kingdom of the Medes and Persians in Daniel (v. 28. vi. 8), though afterward the Persians had the precedence (see Esth. i. 3. 9.)(i).

Ver. 18.] If these two sentences are not equivalent, the former may be explained, of their ripping up women with child; a piece of barbarity sometimes used by conquerors (see Hos. xiii. 16. Amos i. 13).

Ver. 19. And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees’ excellency,] The heathen writers give almost an incredible account of the greatness of this city. The most moderate accounts suppose its walls to have been five-and-forty miles in compass. That passage in Jeremy (li. 31), shows it to be of a vast extent, “One host shall run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to show the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one end.” But Aristotle outlines even this account, telling us, that “when one part of the city was taken, it was three days before the other part knew of it” (Polyb. lib. iii. cap. 2). The vastness of the city was what Nebuchadnezzar gloried in, as the height of his greatness (Dan. iv. 30.).

Shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.] See the same threatening denounced against Babylon, Jer. i. 49. 51. 64. Babylon never recovered its ancient place and influence: it was taken by Cyrus; but upon the removal of the seat of the empire from thence, by the Persians, it, by degrees, decayed, till it was at last reduced to an utter solitude (see Strabo, lib. xvi. and Pliny’s Nat. Hist. lib. vi. cap. 26). But this did not come to pass till a considerable time after the taking of the city by Cyrus. From whence we may conclude, that this prophecy (as likewise to another Babylon, mentioned in the Revelation, whose destruction is threatened in the foretold words of Jeremy (Rev. xviii. 21). This is a pregnant instance among many others, that the mystical sense of several prophecies, that is, the sense which is more remotely intended, comes nearer to the letter of the prophetic.
20 It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation: neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there.

21 But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there: and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there.

22 And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces: and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 For the Lord will have mercy on Jacob, and will yet choose Israel, and set them in their own land: and the strangers shall be joined with them, and they shall cleave to the house of Jacob.

2 And the people shall take them, and bringing to go along with them into Judah, there to enjoy the free exercise of their religion: as we find there was a mixed multitude of Egyptians, natives, that accompanied the Jews at their exit (Exod. xii. 38). It appears, too, that Cyrus himself acknowledged the God of the Jews to be the true God (see Ezra i. 2), and Darius gave orders that sacrifice should be offered daily in the temple for the prosperity of himself and his family (Ezra iv. 10). But these were but small beginnings of what should come to pass in the times of the Gospel, to which this prophecy does certainly relate, as will appear by comparing it with lvi. 3-8, and the notes there.

2 And the Lord shall possess them in the land of the Lord for servants and handmaids, &c.] Those that left their own country for the sake of the true religion, would be content to live in an inferior condition among the Jews: and as they became strangers during their captivity, so some of these very people shall become their servants, or, as some understand it, shall become converts to the true religion. This may be the sense of the words, with relation to the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity; them to their place: and the house of Israel shall possess them in the land of the Lord for servants and handmaids: and they shall take them captives, whose captives they were; and they shall rule over their oppressors.
CHAPTER XIV.

And it shall come to pass in the day that the Lord shall give thee rest from thy sorrow, and from thy fear, and from the hard bondage wherein thou wast made to serve,

4 ¶ That thou shalt take up this proverb against the king of Babylon, and say, How hath the oppressor ceased! the golden city ceased!

5 The Lord hath broken the staff of the wicked, and the sceptre of the rulers.

6 He who smote the people in wrath with a continual stroke, he that ruled the nations in anger, is persecuted, and none hindereth.

7 The whole earth is at rest, and is quiet: they break forth into singing.

8 Yea, the fir trees rejoice at thee, and the but, without question, they have a farther meaning in them, and point at those times under the gospel, when those worldly powers, which were great enemies to the truth, shall be converted, and pay a profound submission to the laws of Christianity and the pastors of the church; and having been made "partakers of their spiritual things," shall minister to them in earnest things," as St. Paul speaks, Rom. xvi. 27 (compare xliii. 23. ixi. 5, and see the notes there).

Ver. 4. Thou shalt take up this proverb against the king of Babylon,] Compare Hab. ii. 6. The Hebrew word _sheelah_ signifies not only a proverbial speech, such as was in everybody's mouth, but likewise a parable, or an acute and excellent saying, drawn up with art, and adorned with rhetorical figures (see Job. xxxvii. 1. xxix. 1), such as are the parables of Jotham and others in the Old Testament, and those of Christ in the New. Of the same kind is this which here follows, made up of _sarcasms_ and bitter _remorses_; together with a poetical description of the infernal regions, where all the ghosts of the deceased tyrants are represented as rising out of their places, and coming to meet the king of Babylon, and congratulate his arrival among them (ver. 9, &c.).

Ver. 6.] This was the Lord's doing, none but he could have done it,] (see the note on ix. 1). The meaning of a _staff_ explained in the note upon ix. 4.

Ver. 7.] The people of the earth are at peace, now the great oppressor of the world is gone.

Ver. 8.] Kings and princes are figuratively denoted by these expressions (see note upon x. 33). Kings and princes of lesser note were oppressed and ruined by this great tyrant, as well as the common people.

Ver. 9.] See note on ver. 4. The Hebrew word _sheelah_, which our translation renders _hell_, or the grave, signifies the state of the dead in general (see Job. iii. 14, &c.), and is indifferently applied to the good and bad. Here it is taken in the worst sense, and denotes the infernal mansions of deceased tyrants. So likewise Ezek. xxxiii. 21, &c., a place exactly parallel to this. Sometimes it signifies the regions allotted to the souls of good men, as particularly when Jacob saith (Gen. xxxvii. 35), "I will go down to the grave [ _sheelah_ in the Hebrew] to my son mourning." Where the word cannot be understood of the grave properly so called, because Jacob thought his son to be still alive, but that he meant the place where he supposed Joseph's soul to be lodged. The Greek word _ Adams_, which answers to _sheelah_, is rendered "the place of the dead" by our own interpreters, Ecclus. xlvii. 8. See this subject largely and learnedly handled by Archbishop Pearson, in his works in the Old Testament, ch. 8, and by Bishop Pearson, upon the article Christ's descent into hell.

Ver. 11.] All thy state and glory, thy might and jollity. Thus the destruction of Tyre is threatened (Ezek. xxvi. 13), "I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease:" that is, all that joy and mirth which attend prosperity (see likewise xlii. 2. xxiii. 7. of this prophet).

Ver. 12.] Kings and princes are sometimes represented by the heavenly host (see note on xiii. 10). So by Lucifer, we are to understand the king of Babylon, who outshined other kings and princes, as much as the morning star does the other constellations. But the expression does likewise allude to the fall of Satan, the prince of the apostate angels, who is described as "falling from heaven like lightning" (Luke x. 18). And the title of "son of the morning," is common both to the morning star and to an angel; the angels being styled, morning stars, Job. xxxviii. 7. The fall of the apostate angels, is not directly recorded in the Old Testament; but it is implied in the distinction between good and evil spirits, and is sometimes alluded to by the prophets, when they threaten destruction to proud and insolent tyrants, who, in imitation of the pride of the devil, exalt themselves against God and his truth, and are the instruments of Satan in promoting idolatry and wickedness in the world (see Ezek. xxviii. 2. 13, 14).

Ver. 13. For thou hast said in thy heart, I will ascend into heaven.] Some tyrants have been so extravagant as to affect divine honours (see Ezek. xxviii. 2. Acts xii. 23), and the pretences of Caligula, and other Roman emperors, in this kind are sufficiently known. It is too common among those, whose will is a law, to forget their dependence upon God, and fancy them selves to be all-sufficient, which is in effect to ascribe that honour to themselves which is due to God alone. It was for this crime that Nebuchadnezzar was degraded into a beast (Dan. iv. 30).

I will exalt my throne above the stars of God.] Above the angels (see ver. 12): stars, in the prophetical dialect, signify rulers (see note on xii. 9); and, accordingly, the word is used of monarchs, whether either in church or state (see Dan. viii. 10. Rev. i. 20. vi. 13. viii. 13. ix. 1).
14 I will ascend above the heavens of the clouds; I will be like the most High. 15 Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell, to the sides of the pit.
16 They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms; 17 That made the world a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof; that opened not the house of his prisoners?
18 All the kings of the nations, even all of them, lie in glory, every one in his own house.
19 But thou art cast out of thy grave like an abominable branch, and as the raiment of those that are slain, thrust through with a sword, that go down to the stones of the pit; as a carcass trodden under feet.
20 Thou shalt not be joined with them in burial, because thou hast destroyed thy land, and slain thy people: the seed of the carnage shall never be renowned.
21 Prepare slaughter for his children for the iniquity of their fathers; that they do not rise, nor possess the land, nor fill the face of the world with cities.

22 For I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of hosts, and cut off from Babylon the name, and remnant, and son, and nephew, saith the Lord.
23 I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water: and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the Lord of hosts.
24 ¶ The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand:
25 That I will break the Assyrian in my land, and call them by their own names, thereby to perpetuate their memory. Hence the cities took their rise, which were called by the names of Seleucia, Polemais, Alexandria, &c. Some render the latter part of the verse, "Nor fill the face of the world with enemies," such as should continue a succession of war and bloodshed, and disturb the peace and quiet of mankind.

Ver. 22.] See the note on ver. 31. [Son, and nephew.] Or rather "son and grandson;" the word neked is translated son's son, or grandson, Gen. xxi. 23, so it should be translated here, and Job xviii. 19, as Dr. Prideaux observes, ad an. A. C. 593. This prophecy was fulfilled in the death of Belshazzar, who was grandson to Nebuchadnezzar, and the last of that family. See the note upon Jer. xxvii. 7.

Ver. 23. I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water.] Compare xiii. 21, xxiv. 11. Babylon stood in a low, marshy ground, and the prophet threatens that it shall be as entirely destroyed, as if it were sunk into the bottom of a great lake or pool (see Jer. li. 44). This agrees with what is said xi. 19, that it shall be "as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah," which were swallowed up in a lake of fire and brimstone. Several learned men are of opinion that the same sort of punishment is threatened to mystical Babylon, Rev. xviii. 21, which the prophet hath here all along in his eye.

I will sweep it with the besom of destruction.] I will make a clear riddance of all its wealth and substance (see the like expressions, 2 Kings xxi. 13).

Ver. 25.] Some interpreters understand this verse of Sennacherib, whose army was destroyed in its march towards Jerusalem upon the mountains of Judea (see the note upon iv. 9), and they think that the prophet mentions this as an earnest of the destruction which is here denounced against the Babylonian monarchy, which was all one with the Assyrian, and is called by that name, even after the seat of that empire was removed to Babylon (see 2 Kings xxii. 29, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11). But to make this part of the verse agree better with what follows, "Then shall the yoke depart from thy neck," &c., it implies the final deliverance of God's people; I am apt to think that by the Assyrian, may be meant some remarkable enemies of God's church (note on xi. 14, xxxii. 16), and particularly these which are expressed by Gog and Magog, Ezek. xxxviii. who, as the prophet there tells us (ver. 17), were under several names "spoken of by the prophets of Israel;" and it and upon my mountains tread him under foot: then shall his yoke depart from off them, and his burden depart from off their shoulders.

26 This is the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth: and this is the hand that is stretched out upon all the nations.

27 For the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall dissuad it? and his hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?

28 In the year that king Ahaz died was this burden.

29 If Rejoice not thou, whole Palestina, because of the rod of him that smote thee is broken: for out of the serpent's root shall come forth a cockatrice, and his fruit shall be a fiery flying serpent.

30 And the firstborn of the poor shall feed, and the needy shall lie down in safety: and I will kill thy root with famine; and he shall slay thy remnant.

31 Howl, O gate; cry, O city: thou, whole Palestina, art dissolved: for there shall come from the north a smoke, and none shall be alone in his appointed times.

32 What shall one then answer the messengers of the nation? that the Lord hath founded Zion, and the poor of his people shall trust in it.

he meeteth; and they are called fiery, because they cause an inflammation where they sting (see xxx. 6).

Ver. 30.] The same Hezekiah shall be a mild and gracious governor to his own subjects: he shall take care of them as a shepherd does of his flock, and relieve the poor who were oppressed by the Philistines in his father's time (see 2 Chron. xxviii. 13). The "first born of the poor" denotes those who are remarkably such, as the "first-born of death" (Job xviii. 13) signifies some unusual disease, and such as is distinguished from the common ways of dying.

Ver. 31. For there shall come from the north a smoke, Judea lay northward of the Philistines, from whence this judgment is threatened. Smoke and fire are emblems of God's wrath, and of great calamities (see Gen. xv. 17. Ps. xviii. 8).

"None shall be left alone in his appointed times." The Jews shall all go out as one man against the Philistines, at the time appointed by their leaders.

Ver. 32.] It was usual for neighbouring nations, who were friends and allies, to send ambassadors, and congratulate each other's success (see 2 Sam. xii. 28 Kings xx. 3, xlvii. 2). And how this good success against the Philistines shall be known abroad, it will be a proper answer to give to such ambassadors, that God is the founder of the Jewish kingdom, and the place of his residence, is under his peculiar protection, where all humble and devout persons shall find a safe retreat: and this promise will be more fully verified in the Christian church (see the notes upon xi. 4. xxvi. 8).

CHAPTER XV.

1 The burden of Moab. Because in the night Ar of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence; because in the night Kir of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence;

CHAP. XV.

ARGUMENT.—It is not certain when this prophecy, contained in this and the following chapter, was fulfilled; only thus far, that it was brought to pass three years after the publishing of it (see xvi. 14). Archbiishop Usher, in his annals of the Old Testament, ad. A. M. 3320, supposes it fulfilled by Shalmaneser, two years before the captivity of the ten tribes; but the fourth and fifth verses of the sixteenth chapter, speak of the people of Judas as lately delivered from some very grievous calamity, wherein the Moabites afforded them no assistance: which makes it probable, that this judgment fell upon them some time after Sennacherib's invasion. Without question, this prophecy relates to a different time from that of Jeremiah, ch. xlviii.

2 He is gone to Bajith, and to Dibon, the high places, to weep: Moab shall howl over Nebo, and over Medeba: on all their heads shall be baldness; and every head cut off.

Ver. 1.] Ar and Kir are originally appellatives, and signify a city or a fortified place. There are two cities called by the name of Kir in scripture; this here mentioned belonging to Moab, the other a city in Media, spoken of 2 Kings xvi. 9, and Amos i. 5.

Ver. 2. He is gone to Bajith, and to Dibon, the high places, to weep.] He, that is, the people of Moab, are gone up to Bajith; which word may be taken for an appellative, and signify the house or temple of an idol, which the Moabites worshipped: or it may sig-
ISAIAH.

3 In their streets they shall gird themselves with sackcloth: on the tops of their houses, and in their streets, every one shall howl, weeping abundantly.

4 And Heshbon shall cry, and Eleach: their voice shall be heard even unto Jahaz: therefore the armed soldiers of Moab shall cry out; his life shall be grievous unto him.

5 My heart shall cry out for Moab; his fugitives shall flee unto Zoar, a heifer of three years old: for by the mounting up of Lathith with weeping shall they go it up; for in the way of Horonaim they shall raise up a cry of destruction.

6 For the waters of Nimrim shall be desolate: for the hay is withered away, the grass faileth, there is no green thing.

7 Therefore the abundance they have gotten, and that which they have laid up, shall they carry away to the brook of the willows.

8 For the cry is gone round about the borders of Moab; the howling thereof unto Eglain, and the howling thereof unto Beer-elim.

9 For the waters of Dimon shall be full of blood: for I will bring more upon Dimon, lions upon him that escapeth of Moab, and upon the remnant of the land.

in an extraordinary manner (see Jer. xxiii. 9. Dan. vii. 28. Hab. iii. 16).

His fugitives shall flee unto Zoar, a heifer of three years old:] The sense would run clearer if, instead of adding the words shall flee, as our translation does, the text were supplied from the former part of the verse thus, His fugitives shall cry out unto Zoar, as a heifer, &c. (compare Jer. xliv. 17). A heifer is observed to be more noisy than a bullock. "The particle [az] is frequently understood (see the note upon xvi. 8).

Ver. 6.] Nimrim was noted for good pasture, and meadows well watered (see Num. xxxii. 3, 36), which shall now be quite rood down and destroyed, as if it had been burnt up in a dry season.

Ver. 7. To the brook of the willows.] Or, "to the valley of the Arabian," as our margin reads it, whither the Assyrians, their enemies, carried all the booty they took from the Moabites, it being the direct way from Moab to Assyria, as St. Jerome upon the place informs us.

Ver. 8. Beer-elim.] Grotons guessed this place to be the same which is called Beer, Num. xxii. 16, and that it had the title of Elim added to it, from the prince's digging a well there (ver. 18).

Ver. 9. For the waters of Dimon shall be full of blood: for Dimon is the same with Dibon, ver. 2. It hath its etymology from the Hebrew dam, which signifies blood, and to which the prophet here alludes.

For I will bring more upon Dimon, lions upon him that escapeth, &c.] I will bring more and more calamities; and they that flee to escape the present evils shall fall into worse disasters, as if a man that fled from his enemy should meet with a lion to devour him (compare Jer. xliv. 41. Amos v. 19).

CHAPTER XVI.

1 Send ye the lamb to the ruler of the land from Sela to the wilderness, unto the mount of the daughter of Zion.

2 For it shall be, that, as a wandering bird cast out of the nest, so the daughters of Moab shall be at the fords of Arnon.

3 Take counsel, execute judgment; make thy shadow as the night in the midst of the noonday; exhorts them to renew, as a just acknowledgment to the king of Judah, the heir of David's family: the latter part of the words might be better translated, "from Sela in the wilderness" (see 2 Kings xiv. 7). The wilderness of Moab is mentioned again at the eighth verse of this chapter.

Ver. 2. For it shall be.] Some render it thus: "Or else it shall be," &c. If ye do not comply with the advice I have given you (ver. 1), ye shall be turned out of your habitations, and your daughters shall hide the outcasts; bewray not him that wand-ereth.

4 Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab; be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler: for the exterminator is at an end, the spoiler ceaseth, the oppressors are consumed out of the land.

5 And in mercy shall the throne be established: and he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging, and seeking judgment, and hasting righteousness.

6 ¶ We have heard of the pride of Moab; he is very proud: even of his hightness, and his pride, and his wrath: but his lies shall not be so.

7 Therefore shall Moab howl for Moab, every one shall howl: for the foundations of Kir-hareseth ye shall ye mourn; surely they are stricken.

8 For the fields of Heshbon languish, and the vine of Sibmah: the lords of the heathen have wandered about in a helpless condition, as young birds drove out of their nests, and unable to shift for themselves.

Ver. 3. Take counsel, execute judgment.] The prophet speaks by way of advice, and exHORTS the Moabites to show that kindness to their brethren the Jews in the time of their distress, as in reason and justice they ought to do; but withal doth covertly upbraid them with the neglect of it: Moab and Edom, though they were a people nearly related to the Jews, yet laid hold of all opportunities to aggravate their miseries, and rejoice at their calamities, for which they are severely threatened with judgments in the prophets (see Jer. xlviii. 37. Obad. ver. 16, &c. Amos i. 11. Zeph. ii. 8).

Hide the outcasts; bewray not him that wandereth.] The prophet compares the calamities of the Jews, which they had lately endured, probably under Sennacherib's invasion, to the searching heat of the sun, and puts the Moabites in mind, that they ought to have been a refuge to them during this distress (see the like expressions, iv. 6. xxv. 4).

Ver. 4.] This shows the foregoing expressions to be ironical, as if the prophet had said, To have showed such kindness to us in the time of our distress, would have been thankfully accepted, as a reasonable instance of humanity and brotherly love; but now, they are as thickly charged with the principal need of your assistance, for that sterna is quickly blown over, and it comes to your turn to feel God's affliction hand.

Ver. 5.] Now Hezekiah's throne and kingdom are established, who shall govern his people with an equal mixture of justice and mercy; and therein prefigur-e the Messias, in whom all the promises made to the house of David shall be finally accomplished. The "tabernacle of David" may allude to his having been a shepherd, and dwelling in tents, before he was advanced to a kingdom; but both here and Amos ix. 11 (the only places where the phrase is used) it mystically denotes the church, which is elsewhere called God's tabernacle, as being the place of his especial presence, as the tabernacle of old was in the wilderness (compare Lev. xxvi. 11, with Rev. xxi. 3).

Ver. 6. But his lies shall not be so.] Or rather, "His strength is not so?" Indignatius ejus quam fortuduo ejus, saith the Vulgar Latin, joining the words to the former part of the verse, "His wrath is greater than his strength," or his power does not answer his pretensions, which translation agrees very well with the Hebrew, and makes the sense run plain and easy.

Ver. 7. Moab howl for Moab.] Or, "to Moab:" they shall lament over one another, in this general calamity.

Kir-hareseth] Kir-hareseth was one of the strongest cities of Moab (see 2 Kings iii. 25), whose foundations, or mighty men, as some understand it, were ruined and destroyed. The same place is called Kir-hares, at the eleventh verse.

Ver. 8.] The prophet describes the destruction of a fruitful country of Moab (see Josh. xiii. 17.-19): that was noted for plenty of vineyards: and pursuing the metaphor, he saith, that the "lords of the nations," that is, the Assyrians, have "broken down the principal plants thereof, as if they had cut away the principal inhabitants, and have carried them away, or forced them to leave their own country, and "pass over the sea," i.e. the river of Jazer (a stream of the river Arnon, which is the border of Moab, Numb. xxi. 13), and made them "wander through the wilderness of Moab," concerning which, see Deut. ii. 8. This sense of the verse agrees best with Jer. xlvi. 32, a place which alludes to this, and borrows some expressions from it. At the latter end of the verse, instead of "her branches are stretched out," the margin reads, "her branches are plucked up," which is a better translation.

Ver. 9. I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer the vine of Sibmah. And, "With weeping I will bewail Jazer [and the vine of Sibmah]." "I will bewail Jazer," that is, those that are carried away to Jazer, or forced to fly thither.

Ver. 10.] See note on ix. 3.

Ver. 11.] See note on xv. 5.

Ver. 12.] We read Numb. xxiii. 13, 27, that Balak King of Moab went from one place to another to offer sacrifice with Balaam, thinking his devotions might be more prevalent at one place than another. The same thing is spoken of here, that when the Moabites find their prayers upon the high places ineffectual (see xv. 2), they will then try what success they may have when offered in the sanctuary or temple of their god Chemosh, who was the tutelar idol of their nation. The word sanctuary is applied to idolatrours temples, Amos vii. 9, 13.

Ver. 13. Since that time.] Or rather, "A good while ago," for so the Hebrew meaz signifies (see note on xliv. 8). This judgment, saith the prophet, was denounced against Moab in former times, particularly by Amos i. 1, &c., and is now confirmed by this vision, and the particular time specified when it should be accomplished in the next verse.

that Moab is weary on the high place, that he shall come to his sanctuary to pray; but he shall not prevail.

13 This is the word that the Lord hath spoken concerning Moab since that time.

Ver. 14.] Within that certain and determinate time precisely fixed; see the like expression xxi. 16, and the note upon that place; and compare Job vii. 1. Some servants were bond-slaves during their lives; but hired servants were discharged precisely at the time agreed between them and their master, and they were usually hired for three years (see Deut. xv. 18).

CHAPTER XVII.

1 THE burden of Damascus. Behold, Damascus is taken away from being a city, and it shall be a ruinous heap.

2 The cities of Aroer are forsaken: they shall be for flocks, which shall lie down, and none shall make them afraid.

3 The fortress also shall cease from Ephraim, and the kingdom from Damascus, and the remnant of Syria: they shall be as the glory of the children of Israel, saith the Lord of hosts.

4 And in that day it shall come to pass, that the glory of Jacob shall be made thin, and the fatness of his flesh shall wax lean.

5 And it shall be as when the harvestman gathereth the corn, and reapeth the ears with his arm; and it shall be as he that gathereth ears in the valley of Rephaim.

6 Yet gleaning grapes shall be left in it, as the shaking of an olive tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough, four or five in the outmost fruitful branches thereof, saith the Lord God of Israel.

7 At that day shall a man look to his Maker, and his eyes shall have respect to the Holy One of Israel.

8 And he shall not look to the altars, the work of his hands, neither shall respect that which his fingers have made, either the groves, or the images.

9 In that day shall his strong cities be as a

Ver. 5. And it shall be as when the harvestman gathereth the corn. The word harvest is sometimes metaphorically used to signify an entire destruction, because the harvest makes a clear riddance, and leaves the fields empty and bare (see Jer. li. 33. Hos. vi. 11).

In the valley of Rephaim.] The same words are translated the valley of giants, Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 6. It was a fruitful valley that lay near Jerusalem.

Ver. 6.] The former verse was an illustration of Israel's destruction from the riding of fields in the corn-harvest: in this the metaphor is taken from the vintage, and the gathering in of the summer-fruits, and implies that the desolation shall not be so entire but that a few should be left, like the gleanings of a vine or an olive-tree after the main crop is gathered (compare xxiv. 12). Accordingly we find that some of the ancient inhabitants of the ten tribes were left after Shalmaneser's captivity (see 2 Chron. xxx. 10, 11), and even after the second captivity of that people in the time of Esar-haddon (see 2 Chron. xxxv. 18).

Ver. 7.] God's judgments upon the kingdom of Israel shall have that effect, as to turn many of those that remain from their idolatrous worship to serve the true God (see 2 Chron. xxx. 11, 18).

Ver. 8.] The groves being here called the work of men's hands, the word seems to be taken for an idol placed in a grove, as it is used 2 Kings xxii. 7, compared with xxii. 6. The images here mentioned are translated sun-images in the margin, and are supposed to be such as were erected in honour of the sun (see Ezek. iv. 2. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4, 5).

Ver. 9. In that day shall his strong cities be as a forsaken bough. The cities belonging to the ten tribes shall stand solitary and destitute of inhabitants, all the country about them being destroyed.

Which they left because of the children of Israel:] The sense is here imperfect: most expositors understand the words of the Assyrians, that they left some forsaken bough, and an uppermost branch, which they left because of the children of Israel: and there shall be desolation.

10 Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation, and hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength, therefore shalt thou plant pleasant plants, and shalt set it with strange slips:

11 In that day shalt thou make thy plant to grow, and in the morning shalt thou make thy seed to flourish: but the harvest shall be a heap in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow.

12 Wo to the multitude of many people, cities with a few inhabitants in the kingdom of Israel, that a remnant of that people might be preserved (see ver. 6). But the copy which the Septuagint followed, instead of the Hebrew words ἄκοτρον ἐπὶ ἑπαναμίρ, i.e. "bough and uppermost branch," read ἡ ἄκοτρον τῆς Βηθαμίρ, i.e. "the Vitiites and Amorites;" for they translate the verse thus: "The cities shall be forsaken, as when the Vitiites and the Amorites forsook them, because of the children of Israel." Which reading gives a plain and full sense to the text. We justly esteem the present Hebrew text as a very correct copy; but we need not ascribe such a degree of infallibility to it, as to reject a better reading, when it is suggested by the ancient versions. For such a concession does no more weaken the authority of the Old Testament, than the various readings of the Greek copies invalidate that of the New.

Ver. 10. With strange slips.] Or rather "with foreign slips," such as for their rarity are fetched from foreign parts.

Ver. 11.] The sense depends upon the former verse, and both together import thus much: Because thou hast forsaken the true God, to follow idols, nothing shall thrive with thee: although, like an industrious gardener, thou procurest the choicest plants, and takest the greatest care to make them grow, watering and trimming at all seasons of the day, yet when thou expectest to reap the fruit of thy labours (so ear margin very fitly translates ἐν ἱκετίβα, the day of inheritance, or of enjoying what we have taken pains for), thou shalt find nothing but loss and disappointment. The Hebrew language wants the potential mood, which is often supplied by the future tense, as it seems to be here: so the words might be rendered more plainly, thus: "Thou mayest plant pleasant plants, and mayest set it with foreign slips, in the day thou mayest make thy plant to grow, and in the morning thou mayest make my seed to flourish; but," &c. When the Hebrews would signify doing a thing speedily with care and diligence, they often express it by doing it "in the morning." See 1. 4. Ps. xlv. 5, where our translation reads, "God shall help her, and that right early:" but it is in the Hebrew, "when the morning appeareth."

Ver. 12.] As multitudes are compared to waters (see Rev. xvi. 15), so great armies are resembled to inundations, because they overrun all that comes in their way, and carry everything before them (see note on viii. 7).

Ver. 13.] The Jews used to thrash their corn upon hills, and places exposed to the wind (see xii. 2 Chron. iii. i), which dispersed the chaff, and blew it away. The word galgal, which our text translates, rolling thing, is better rendered thistledown in the margin; the word signifies any straws or motes, which are driven about with the wind. Compare Ps. lxxiii. 13, where our English reads, "make them like a wheel;" but it should be translated, "make them like thistledown:" for the word both there and here is joined with stubble, as an equivalent expression.

Ver. 11.] This fitly represents the condition of Sennacherib's army, which caused great consternation over night, but were all destroyed before next morning (see 2 Kings xix. 35).

CHAPTER XVIII.

1 Wo to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia:

CHAP. XVIII.

ARGUMENT.—Ethiopia and Egypt were the Jews' confederates when they were invaded by Sennacherib (see xx. 5. 2 Kings xviii. 21, compared with 2 Kings xix. 9). But it is a great question among learned men, whether by Ethiopia, called Chush in the Hebrew, be meant Arabia, lying eastward of Egypt, and therefore joined with Sennacherib, or Ethiopia, properly so called, lying westward of it: if we understand it of the latter, as Huetius does (Comment in Origen. p. 43. 50), we must then understand the forementioned text (2 Kings xix. 9), of Tirhakah king of Ethiopia (called Tarkon, in Strabo. lib. i. xv.), coming to fight against Sennacherib, and sending forces to assist the Egyptians and the Jews; and this sense Archbishop Usher follows in his Annales of the Old Testament, ad A.M. 3294. But in which sense sooner we take the word Chush, this prophecy relates to Egypt, in conjunction with Ethiopia, or Arabia; and the prophet shows, that although the designs of the Jews' allies in their favour should prove abortive, yet God will defend his own dwelling-place without their assistance. [Ethiopia and Egypt were united into one kingdom, by Sabacon, the king of Ethiopia, called So, 2 Kings xviii. 4, who slew Booz, 4th of the line of Solomon; and conquered Egypt in the last year of king Ahaz. See Usher's Annales, ad A. M. 3277.]

Ver. 1. Wo to the land shadowing with wings.] It is generally agreed that this is a description of Egypt: some understand the words of their ships, with spreading sails like wings; others of the proand swift messengers, to a nation scattered and peeled, to a people terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the rivers have spoiled!

3 All ye inhabitants of the world, and dwellers on the earth, see ye, when he lifteth up an ensign on the mountains; and when he bloweth a trumpet, hear ye.

4 For so the Lord said unto me, I will take my rest, and I will consider in my dwelling place like a clear heat upon herbs; and like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest.

5 For afore the harvest, when the bud is perfect, and the sour grape is ripening in the flower, he shall both cut off the spires with pruning hooks, and take away and cut down the branches.

6 They shall be left together unto the fowls of the mountains, and to the beasts of the earth; and the fowls shall summer upon them, and all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them.

with formidable armies (see 2 Chron. xii. 3, xiv. 9); and that the purport of the words is to acquaint them, that they should be "scattered and peeled, meted out and trodden down;" that the forces of the Assyrian, compared to an overflowing river (see xvii. 12), should overrun and destroy them; which was fulfilled, as appears from xx. 4. This sense I prefer, because it agrees better with the seventh verse, where the same words are repeated; and with Ezek. xxx. 9, where God saith, "Messengers shall go from me in ships, to make the careless Ethiopians afraid;" which place plainly alludes to these words of Isaiah.

Ver. 3. To set up a banner and to blow a trumpet are usual signals of war; the prophet saith here, that God himself will remarkably expose the cause of his people, and exhorts all people to take notice of his proceedings.

Ver. 4. I will take my rest, and I will consider in my dwelling place. Or, I will have a regard for my set dwelling (as the margin reads), and defend it, though without using any visible means, or the outward assistance of any of my people's confederates, such as to the Mycenaean, which is mentioned by Bochart; "taking his rest;" i.e. not going out with their armies, according to the former interpretation of the words.

Like a clear heat upon herbs. Or, Like a clear heat after rain, as the margin reads; the virescitude of rain and sunshine is very agreeable, and contributes that warmth and moisture which make all vegetables grow and flowers blossom. But God's present judgment will not afford his people in their calamities, and not unlike that which a dripping cloud gives when it falls in a soft drought, and abates the burning heat of the harvest time (see xxv. 32. xxxii. 3).

Ver. 5. For afore the harvest, when the bud is perfect (or while the bud is growing to maturity), and the sour grape is ripening in the flower, he shall cut off the spires with pruning hooks, and take away and cut down the branches; the Hebrew of the passages designs the Ethiopians, and their confederates the Egyptians, could come to maturity, they should prove abortive, just as if one should cut off the bearing branches of a vine, before the grapes are fit to be gathered. The word harvest is applied to the time of gathering in of the summer-fruits, as well as of corn (see xxvi. 17).

Ver. 6. Their armies shall become a prey unto the wild beasts and the birds of prey (compare Ezek. xxxix. 17): as if a garden or vineyard should be destroyed, and laid open to all the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field, to come and feed there all the year round (compare Ezek. xxxii. 13).

Ver. 7. In that time. There is no necessity of supposing this to be meant of the same time specified in the foregoing part of the chapter, as hath been shown in the note upon iv. 2.

Shall the present [for a present] be brought unto the Lord of hosts, &c. Bringing of presents was a solemn expression of that homage which is due from subjects or tributaries to their princes (see 2 Sam. viii. 2. Ps. lxxxii. 16). So here it implies, that the Ethiopians shall make their due acknowledgment to God.

For the Hebrew, tsitsel, which our English renders shadowing, does properly signify a sort of timbrel, called in Latin sistrum, which was an instrument of music peculiar to the Egyptians in their sacrifices to Isis; and the words, tsitsel kenalaphim, are interpreted "a winged cymbal" by Huetius (Demonstr. Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 4. n. 10), which he tells us is an exact description of the sistrum, and supposes the expression to be a periphrasis of Egypt, called here the land famous for its winged symbols. The ingenious Mr. Reeves, in his notes upon Minucius Felix, cap. 21, expounds the phrase, shadowing with wings, of a swallow that used to be pictured over the statue of Isis with expanded wings. Le Moyne, in his Varia Sacra, or Translations, as he calls it, in his book De Osiride, and is called Kneb, by Strabo, lib. xvii.

Which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia: Or rather, Which borders upon the rivers of Ethiopia; the Hebrew signifies indifferently either eis, or trans, the other, or farther side of a river.

Ver. 2. That sendeth ambassadors by the sea, even in vessels of bulrushes! To encourage their confederates, and to prepare for their coming into Egypt, the Egyptians used to carry from place to place by water, in a sort of paper vessel or ship: Lucan, speaking of their little boats, saith, Consertitur bibula Memphis habet; eymba papyro (lib. iv.).

Go, ye swift messengers, to a nation scattered and peeled, &c. These words may be understood of the ambassadors, which the Ethiopians, in conjunction with Egyptians, sent to the Assyrians, by way of bidding them defiance; and then by a land scattered and peeled, must be understood Assyria, which, though formerly they were not sufficiently distracted with foreign wars, and exhausted of its soldiers: if we follow this sense, the latter part of the verse may most properly be rendered as our margin reads it, whose land the rivers despise; that is, the Ethiopians, and those that dwell among the rivers thereabout, are not afraid of the Assyrian power. This sense our translators prefer, and understand sistrum, ambassadors, and auxilium, messengers, as meant of the same persons, and likewise supply the word, saying, to make the following sentence the substance of what the ambassadors were supposed to speak.

But others think that the words are a message from God, to denote judgment against the Ethiopians, which are called "people terrible from their beginning," because they had invaded Judea several times.
CHAPTER XIX.

7 ¶ In that time shall the present be brought unto the Lord of hosts of a people scattered and peeled, and from a people terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trod-as their sovereigns, which is consonant to other prophecies concerning them (see Ps. lxxviii. 21, Zeph. iii.

10.) This we may suppose to have been partly re-tified at the destruction of Samnachrib, the common enemy to them and the Jews, upon which remarkable turn of affairs, many of the neighbouring nations congratulated Hezekiah's victory, and magnified the power of God which so evidently interposed for his deliverance (see 2 Chron. xxvii. 22). But the words are chiefly to be understood of the calling of these nations to the gospel. The conversion of the gentiles deren under foot, whose land the rivers have spoiled, to the place of the name of the Lord of hosts, the mount Zion.

is elsewhere expressed, by their bringing offerings to God's temple or altar, because that was the most solemn part of religious worship that was practised among the Jews (see ix. 6. 9. Ps. lxvii. 29. Mic. iv.

13.) We may observe, that several other prophecies which threaten destruction to nations or cities, conclude with a gracious promise, that God will remember them in due time, and acknowledge them for his people (see xix. 18, &c. xxiii. 18. Jer. xviii. 47. xxix. 39).

CHAPTER XIX.

1 The burden of Egypt. Behold, the Lord rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt: and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence, and the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it.

2 And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians: and they shall fight every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbour; city against city, and kingdom against kingdom.

3 And the spirit of Egypt shall fail in the midst thereof; and I will destroy the counsel thereof: and they shall seek to the idols, and to the charmers, and to them that have familiar spirits, and to the wizards.

4 And the Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord; and a fierce king shall rule over them, saith the Lord, the Lord of hosts.

5 And the waters shall fail from the sea, and the river shall be wasted and dried up.

6 And they shall turn the rivers far away; and the brooks of defence shall be emptied and dried up: the reeds and flags shall wither.

Jeremiah afterward foretold (xxiii. 12). When God excutes his judgments upon a heathen nation, he is said to punish the idols of that people; so particularly it is said of Egypt, Exod. xii. 12; and of Babylon,

Ver. 2.] One province against another: so the Septuagint very properly render it, Ναυς ἐν ἑαυτοῖς:
the several divisions of that country being called nouς; and tribes here (ver. 13.) This was fulfilled after their king was dethroned, when the country was divided into twelve petty governments, and Psammitechus, ruler of one of these, at last subdued all the rest (see note on ver. 4).

Ver. 3. The spirit of Egypt shall fail in the midst thereof; and I will destroy the counsel thereof. Both the courage and the wisdom of the Egyptians shall fail them in the time of their greatest need (see ver.
11. 12, &c.). The wisdom of Egypt was famous in those times all the world over (see 1 Kings iv. 40.
Acts vii. 22), and from thence the Greeks, in after-times, derived their knowledge.

They shall seek to the idols, &c. As it was usual for idolaters to do in their distress (see xvii. 12); and the Jews themselves sometimes did in imitation of the ill customs of their neighbours (see viii. 19).

Ver. 4. A cruel lord.] This most interpreters understand of Psammithicus (see note on ver. 2).

Ver. 5.] Tremellius shows out of Herodotus that this was literally fulfilled under the government of the twelve petty tyrants who ruled Egypt after Sethon. But the expression may the more probably be metaphorical, and denote the decay of the Egyptian strength, by metaphors taken from the decrease of the river Nile; upon the overflowing of which river all the plenty and prosperity of Egypt depended.
Thus the king of Egypt is described, Ezek. xxix. 3, as "a dragon (l. e. a whale, or crocodile) lying in the 7 The paper reeds by the brooks, by the mouth of the brooks, and every thing sown by the brooks, shall wither, be driven away, and be no more.
8 The fishers also shall mourn, and all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish.
9 Moreover they that work in fine flax, and that they that weave networks, shall be confounded.
10 And they shall be broken in the purposes thereof, all that make sluices and ponds for fish.
11 Surely the princes of Zoon are fools, the counsel of the wise counsellors of Pharaoh is become brutish: how any ye unto Pharaoh, I am, the son of the wise, the son of ancient kings?

midst of many waters," and boasting of his strength, by saying, "My river is my own," &c. Scaliger understands it of a great drought which occasioned a dearth, by the failing of the inundation of the Nile (Can. Isagoge, p. 318).

Ver. 6. The brooks of defence shall be emptied and dried up: jerobo Matzor, in the Hebrew: the same expresston, and was first made out of (xxxvi. 9), which is there translated, the "rivers of beloved places:" such as were of use to defend cities against a siege. But Bochart (Phaleg, lib. iv. cap. 21), translates it the "rivers of Egypt," and shows that the word Matzor denotes Egypt sometimes, and may be fully translated so in both these places of Isaiah, and likewise in Mic. vi. 4, "ransom shall be taken out of Egypt." But in translation renders very obscurely, thus, "In that day shall Babylon be come to Assyria, and from Assyria, and from the fortified cities, and from the fortress even unto the river;" but supposing Matzor to signify Egypt, the word runs plainly thus, "They shall come unto thee from Assyria to the cities of Egypt, and from Egypt even to the river" (Euphrates), which was the boundary of Assyria: and the sense is, that the Jews shall return from their several dispersions whither they were scattered; which is often expressed in the prophets by their return from Assyria and Egypt, as hath been observed in the notes upon xi. 15, 16.

Ver. 7. And the paper reeds—by the mouth of the brooks—shall wither. Paper was an invention of the Egyptians (Polyeuct). The papyrus was made of a reed that grew upon the banks of the Nile, which is therefore thus described by Ovid (Metamorph. i.): "

"Papyriferi septemflora flumina Nili."

Accordingly the paper-reeds are said here to grow by the mouth of the brooks, that is, by the shore, or side of the brooks; expressed elsewhere by the lip of the river (Gen. xli. 3. Exod. ii. 2), speaking of the Nile.

Ver. 8. The same metaphor is still continued, to signify, that all sort of trade and business shall cease, by reason of the great commotions which distract the kingdom.

Ver. 9. Fine flax, and linen made out of it, was a principal commodity of Egypt (see 1 Kings x. 28. Prov. vii. 16. Ezek. xxvii. 7), and was the habit of their priests and other great men, both in Egypt and in other countries (see Gen. xli. 12. Esth. viii. 15. Dan. x. 5. Luke xvi. 19). The net-works which follow, or white-works as the margin reads, seem to have been fine woven works made of the same material.

Ver. 11. Zoon—Pharaoh] See the following verses, Zoon or Tanis was one of the most ancient cities in Egypt (see Numb. xiii. 22), and the metropolis of the kingdom in Moses's time (see Ps. lxxxviii. 43). Pharaoh was a name common to all the Egyptian kings.

12 Where are they? where are thy wise men? and let them tell thee now, and let them know what the Lord of hosts hath purpose upon Egypt.

13 The princes of Zoon are become fools, the princes of Noph are deceived; they have also seduced Egypt, even they that are the stay of the tribes thereof.

14 The Lord hath mingled a perverse spirit in the midst thereof: and they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof, as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit.

15 Neither shall there be any work for Egypt, which the head or tail, branch or rush, may do.

16 In that day shall Egypt be like unto women: and it shall be afraid and fear because of the kingdom in Moses's time (see Ps. lxxxviii. 43). Pharaoh was a name common to all the Egyptian kings.

How say ye unto Pharaoh, I am the son of the wise?] It was in vain that the court-flatterers extolled their king for his extraordinary abilities, which were derived to him by a succession of many generations; but now the Lord would not fail in Sodom or Sennacherib, who should be the last king of his family: Egypt was one of the most ancient kingdoms in the world, and pretended that the Chaldeans themselves were derived from thence, as Didymus Siculus affirms (lib. ii.), though these were antiquity with the former: but the Egyptians were not content with such a pretence to antiquity, but sought proofs, and substantial proofs, but would needs have it, that the first man in the world arose out of the mud and slime of the river Nile; as may be seen in the same author (Hist. lib. ii. cap. 2).

[The son of ancient kings?] The kings of Egypt derived their royal dignity from Misraim, the son of Ham; upon which account Egypt is called "the land of Ham," Ps. lxxxviii. 11. (compare xxv. 31, xxxvi. 27.)

Ver. 12.] The wise men of Egypt and the magicians are joined together, Gen. xli. 8, and the prophet tells them here, that with all that skill in the arts of divination they could not foresee the evils impending over their country, nor tell how to prevent them (compare xviii. 19).

Ver. 13. Noph, or Memphis, was better known by the name of Memphis: it is called Moph, Hos. ix. 16, which comes very near that name.

They that are the stay of the tribes] The governors of the several provinces, or nomi (see before on ver. 2).

Ver. 14.] God's judgments are often called the cup of his wrath (see particularly Jer. xxv. 16, 17): because they deprive men not only of their strength, but even of that common prudence and presence of mind, which is requisite for the due management of their affairs; according to that observation, Quos Jupiter perdere vult, demenat.

Ver. 15.] All orders and degrees of men shall fail in the discharge of their duty, from the highest to the lowest (compare ix. 14), more properly calls it here "the shaking of the hand of the Lord of hosts," God's holding his rod over a people, and still threatening them with severer judgments (compare x. 32. xi. 15).
the shaking of the hand of the Lord of hosts, which he slaketh over it. 17 And the land of Judah shall be a terror unto Egypt, every one that maketh mention thereof shall be afraid in himself, because of the counsel of the Lord of hosts, which he hath determined against it.

Ver. 17.] Egypt was subdued by Sennacherib before he besieged Jerusalem, as may be gathered from xx. 5, 6. But before that, we read of Sennacherib's invading Judea, and taking all its fenced cities (2 Kings.xviii. 13), which is placed by Archbishop Usher three years before his besieging Jerusalem. It is this first invasion the prophet here probably alludes to, and saith, that the report of it caused great terror in Egypt, being neighbours and allies to the Jews.

Ver. 18. In that day] There is no necessity this should be understood of the same time spoken of in the foregoing part of the chapter, as hath been already observed in several instances (see note on iv. 3.)

Shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan.] It is a way of speaking in scripture to use a definite common number for an indefinite (see particularly Amos i. 3. 5. 9, &c.). So here five cities denotes several cities: and of these it is prophesied that they "shall speak the language of Canaan," that they shall worship God with the true Ismocolites, and with one heart and one mouth glorify the true God together with them (compare Zeph. iii. 9). Or, as some explain it, they shall be of one mind with the true servants of God; as the phrase is used, Josh. ix. 2, where it is said that the kings "gathered themselves to fight with Joshua with one consent." It is in the Hebrew "with one mouth." As the Christians are the true seed of Abraham, to whom all the promises belong, so they are sometimes even in the New Testament styled by the name of Jews (see Rom. ii. 29. Gal. vi. 16. Rev. ii. 9); but all along in the Old Testament they are described by the titles, the privileges, and the rites of worship, which belong to the Jews (see notes on ver. 19. lvi. 7. lxv. 2).

This place cannot be understood with Grotius, of the Jews going down into Egypt for fear of Sennacherib: for this is what they are severely reproved for, and judgments threatened to both nations upon that account (chap. xxx. xxxi. of this prophecy); whereas what is here said, is spoken as a promise of mercy and comfort (see note on xviii. 7).

Learned men observe from this place, where the Jews' language is called the language of Canaan, that the Hebrew is the same with the old Phoenician language, as appears from many instances (see Bishop Wallace's Prolegomen. iii. 11—13, &c. and Bibliá Polyglott).

Swear to the Lord of hosts:] Swear allegiance and fidelity to him (see Neh. x. 29. Isa. xiv. 23); some render the words, "swear by the Lord of hosts," in opposition to the false gods the heathens used to swear by. Swearing being a religious invocation of the name of God; it is particularly recommended among other religious duties (see Deut. vi. 13, x. 20. Jer. iv. 2. Ps. xlv. 11).

The city of destruction.] Or, "The city of the sun," as our margin reads: for our interpreters and several others suppose, that the Hebrew word Heres may stand for Chereza; so the expression will denote that city which was called by the Greeks Heriopolis, or the city of the sun: as several other cities had their names from the sun's having an image or temple there; such was Kir-haresch among the Maccabites (xvi. 7, 11), and Beth-schemesh among the Canaanites (Josh. xvi. 10). [There was a city in Egypt, called Beth-schemesh, mentioned Jer. xliii. 13.] But still it may be inquired for what reason the prophet should distinguish the name of this city, and not speak it out plain? To which question we may answer, that the way the name was answered, that the prophet would not call the city by its proper name Nir Cheres, as detesting the name of the idol to which it was dedicated, but chose rather to call it, by way of reproach, Nir Heres, implying that the idol they worshipped should be utterly destroyed. The Jews were forbidden to make mention of the names of the heathen idols, if they could avoid it (see Joshua xliix. xvi. 23). So they either changed the names of the places dedicated to idol worship, or else they gave nicknames to them and their idols, and substituted such a word as had some affinity with the true name, but withal expressed their abhorrence and detestation of it. Thus they called Baal Bosketh, that is shange (Jer. xxi. 22. Hos. ix. 10); and when the mount of Olives was defiled with idolatry they called it the mount of Corruption (2 Kings xxii. 13), changing the Hebrew name Har Mischak, into Har Mischith. In like manner Beth-el, which signifies the house of God, when it came to be the seat of idolatry, was called Bethaven, i.e. the house of vanity (Hos. iv. 13. x. 5). So here I suppose the prophet alludes to the city of Cheres, by way of irony, the city of Heres. The Chaldee paraphrase joins both the readings together, thus: "One of the cities shall be called Beth-schemesh which shall be destroyed."

Ver. 19. In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt:] It is a judicious observation of Calvin upon v. 7. that the ancient prophets frequent use of the genitive singular, as a noun of one article, in the construction "altar of the Lord," signifies, that they were speaking up to an image, the usual figure, of the true altar of sacrifice, which the Jews were to set up in Jerusalem, and worship God, as the sacrifice, oblation and vows, mentioned here, and ver. 21, as taken metaphorically, for the worship and service of God in general. Observe this is not an altar to be set up in Egypt, for the use of the Jews, thinking to fulfil this prophecy literally; but it was against the general sense of his own nation, who thought that, according to their laws, no temple ought to be built but in Jerusalem (see Joseph. De Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 30). From whence it appears that they thought this prophecy was to have a mystical, and not a literal, accomplishment. 18 ¶ In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of hosts; one shall be called, The city of destruction. 19 In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord.
20 And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt: and he shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a saviour, and a great one, and he shall deliver them.

21 And the Lord shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the Lord in that day, and shall do sacrifice and oblation; yea, they shall vow a vow unto the Lord, and perform it.

22 And the Lord shall smite Egypt: he shall smite and heal it: and they shall return even to and you, and the generations after us," as it there follows.

Ver. 20.] Egypt was conquered by Sennacherib (see the following chapter); and some understand the saviour and great one here mentioned, of the angel that cut off his forces, which was a general deliverance of all the neighbouring countries from his tyranny: the words may fitly be applied to that tyranny which the devil exercises over the heathen world, "who are led captive by him at will," from whence they can be redeemed only by the great Saviour of the world, Christ Jesus. Many of the gentiles were saved out of their ignorance they lay under, with respect to the things of God, and had some general hopes and desires of being delivered from the "bondage of corruption:" in which respect Christ is called by the prophet Haggai, "the desire of all nations" (Hag. ii. 7), i. e. he who alone can answer all their wants and desires.

They shall vow a vow unto the Lord.] Making vows and dedicating freewill-offerings unto God was a considerable part of religious worship among the Jews (see Lev. xxvii. 1, &c. Num. vi. 1, &c. xxx. 1. Deut. xxxiii. 21, 22). The sense of this expression had been likewise explained on ver. 19. Some explain this of the acknowledgments which the Egyptians, the Jews' confederates, made at the temple upon Sennacherib's defeat (see note on xviii. 7).

Ver. 23.] That is, he shall heal it of those plagues wherewith he had smitten it.

CHAPTER XX.

1 In the year that Tartan came unto Ashdod, (when Sargon the king of Assyria sent him,) and fought against Ashdod, and took it; 2 At the same time spake the Lord by Isaiah the son of Amoz, saying, Go and loose the sackcloth from off thy loins, and put off thy shoe from thy foot. And he did so, walking naked and barefoot.

CHAP. XX.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter foretels the conquest of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, the Jews' confederates, by Sennacherib (see the Argument of chap. xviii.).

Ver. 1.] It appears from ver. 5, 6, that this expedition was made while the Jews were under the apprehension of Sennacherib's invasion; and thereupon, to strengthen themselves, they entered into a confederacy with Egypt and Ethiopia. Tartan is mentioned (2 Kings xviii. 17), as one of the generals of Sennacherib's army, who is probably meant by Sargon here, and when his armies invaded Judea for a considerable time, and "took all the fenced cities of it" (2 Kings xviii. 13,) he might then send a detachment, and besiege Ashdod.

Ver. 2.] Loose the sackcloth from off thy loins, and put off thy shoe from thy foot.] As it was a principal part of the prophetic office to denounce God's judgments, so the prophets commonly wore sackcloth, the habit of mourners, as a dress suitable to their employment (see Rev. xi. 3). Of this kind was that hairy garment by which Elias and John baptist are described, 2 Kings i. 8. Matt. iii. 4, and such a garment is spoken of as the usual habit of the prophets, Zechar. xiii. 3. Going barefoot was likewise a sign of mourning (see 2 Samuel iii. 33). He did so, walking naked and barefoot.] Those are said to be naked, in the scripture-phrase, who go-
3 And the Lord said, Like as my servant Isaiah hath walked naked and barefoot three years for a sign and wonder upon Egypt and upon Ethiopia;

4 So shall the king of Assyria lead away the Egyptiansprisoners, and the Ethiopians captives, young and old, naked and barefoot, even with their buttoks uncovered, to the shame of Egypt.

without their upper garments (see John xxi. 7. Acts xix. 16), or have put off the habit proper to their quality (see 1 Sam. xix. 21. 2 Sam. vi. 20).

Ver. 3.] Egypt was subdued by Sennacherib before he besieged Jerusalem, as hath been observed upon the first verse of this chapter: to this sense Bechah explains that expression (xxxvii. 23). "With the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of Egypt." The Hebrew reads Metzor, which is often taken for Egypt (see note on xix. 6).

Archbishop Usher supposes this war against Egypt, and the rest of the Jews' confederates, to have lasted three years, and to have concluded in the desolation of those countries (see his Annales V. Test. ad A. M. 3291). The prophets foreshewed things by actions as well as by words, which sometimes appeared strange and un帳 in the eyes of the people (see viii. 3. 18. and the notes there, and Ezek. xxiv. 18. 19).

Ver. 4.] See note on iii. 17.

Ver. 5.] The inhabitants of Judea, or Jerusalem, mentioned in the following verse, shall be ashamed of such weak and insignificant allies. The Jews are often upbraided with placing their confidence in an arm of flesh, and particularly for trusting in the shadow of Egypt (see the argument to ch. xix.)

Ver. 6. The inhabitants of this isle shall say in that day, Some understand this isle of Ashdod, mentioned ver. 1, and the sea-coast of the Philistines, called the "isle of Caphtor," Jer. xlvii. 4. But the word may more fitly be expounded of Judea or Jerusalem, for an isle sometimes is taken in a general sense for any country or place (see xxii. 15. 19. Job xxii. 30.).

CHAPTER XXI.

1 The burden of the desert of the sea. As whirlwinds in the south pass through; so it cometh from the desert, from a terrible land.

2 A grievous vision is declared unto me; the treacherous dealer dealeth treacherously, and the spoiler spoileth. Go up, O Elam; besiege, O Media; all the sighing thereof have I made to cease.

CHAPTER XXII.

3 Therefore are my loins filled with pain; pangs have taken hold upon me, as the pangs of a woman that travaileth: I was bowed down at the hearing of it; I was dismayed at the seeing of it.

4 My heart panted, fearfulness affrighted me: the night of my pleasure hath he turned into fear unto me.

oppressor of (or for) the oppressor, and spoiler for the spoiler," that is, it is now come to the king of Babylon's turn to feel that oppression and rage himself, which he before had brought upon others (compare xxxixii. 1). Go up, O Elam [or Persia]; besiege, O Media.] The Babylonian monarchy was to be divided between the Medes and Persians (see Don. v. 28).

All the sighing thereof have I made to cease.] Or, "I have made all sorrow (or sighing) to cease," i.e. the sighing of those who have been oppressed by the Babylonian tyranny (compare xiv. 3). For the termination of the word anchatah, "sighing," seems to be only emphatical, as the grammarians speak, not relative to any person before mentioned.

Ver. 3. Therefore are my loins filled with pain; etc.] This is spoken as in the person of the Chaldeans (see note on xxv. 5). I was bowed down at the hearing of it.] As persons that are under great pain or trouble (see Ps. xxxv. 15. xxxviii. 5).

Ver. 4. When I thought to he at ease, and to have some respite from trouble and anxiety, then the fearful apprehensions of God's judgments seized me (compare Job liii. 13). This is still spoken by the prophet as representing the Chaldeans: some understand the words of that festival night, wherein Belshazzar was slain (Dan. v. 1. 30). The following verse favours this sense,

Ver. 5. Prepare the table, watch in the watchtower, etc.] The verse may be thus translated: "While they prepare a table, while they watch in the watchtower, while they eat and drink, anise ye princes;" &c. While the Babylonians make some faint provisions for
5. Prepare the table, watch in the watchtower, eat, drink: arise, ye princes, and anoint the shield.

6. For thus hath the Lord said unto me, Go, set a watchman, let him declare what he seeth.

7. And he saw a chariot with a couple of horsemen, a chariot of asses, and a chariot of camels; and he hearkened diligently with much heed:

8. And he cried, A lion: My lord, I stand continually upon the watchtower, and I watch; and, behold, there came a chariot of horsemen, with a couple of horsemen. And he answered war, but are more intent upon feasting, and luxury, arise ye princes and leaders of the Persian army, and prepare for war in earnest: it appears by Dan. v. 1. 20. 31, and Jer. ii. 30, that Babylon was surprised and taken the night after a great festival (see likewise Herodot. lib. i. cap. 190, 191).

To make it more beautiful, and more serviceable for war.

Ver. 6.] The prophets are often compared to watchmen, because they foresee evils at a distance, and warn others to avoid them (see lii. 8. lix. 6. Ezek. iii. 17. xxxiii. 7. Hab. ii. 1.) so here God orders the prophet, or somebody for him, to act the part of a watchman, and give notice what enemy is marching towards Babylon, as it was usual for watchmen to do in times of danger (see 2 Sam. xviii. 24. 25. 2 Kings ix. 17).

He answered and said, Some suppose this to be the answer of the prophet, by which he explains the foregoing vision to be meant of Babylon; but there is no necessity of admitting this interpretation, for the word answer is often used in scripture for the continuation of a discourse (see particularly Matt. xi. 25, and elsewhere in the gospels).

Babylon is fallen, is fallen;] The expression is doubled, to denote the certainty of the event (see Gen. xli. 32). It is usual, likewise, for the prophets to represent a thing future, as if it were already accomplished, to signify that it will certainly come to pass (see Jer. l. 2) To the same sense we are to understand those words of Christ (John iii. 18), He that believeth not is condemned already; i.e. will infallibly be condemned, if he persists in his infidelity (see like instances, xii. 3. xviii. 21).

All the raven images he hath broken unto the ground.] See note on xix. 1. Other prophecies speak of the destruction of Babylon, as a decisive stroke, which should give a fatal blow to idolatry (see xxiv. xlv. 1. Jer. l. 2. li. 17. 18. 47); which prophecies will be fully completed in the fall of mystical Babylon.

Ver. 10.] The prophet addresses himself to the Jews, who were nearly concerned in the destruction of the Babylonish empire (though the admonition extends to remote ages. See note on the beginning of ch. xiii. xiv). These he applies himself to, as groaning under the oppressions of that heathen government; whereupon he calls them God's threshing; and the corn of his floor, because they had been so severely oppressed. Although these calamities were intended by God to purge the pure corn from the chaff. To be threshed signifies to undergo great calamities, or be subdued by a potent enemy (see xii. 15. Jer. lii. 33. Mic. iv. 13). [The way of threshing, in the eastern countries, was by leading oxen over the corn lying on the floor, who drew after them a pair of ponderous iron wheels, or else heavy planks stuck full of sharp flints; so that the corn was trodden out by the feet of the oxen, and the straw cast into small parcels by the wheels or flints (see xviii. 27. 28). The same way of treading out the corn was practised by the Romans, as appears by Varro (lib. i. De Re Rust. cap. 52). [Excitut grassa jumentis, juncitis, ac tribulo; id e tabulis lapidibus et aere formis, qua impusco arundo, aut ponderibus grandis, trahitur jumentis jucitis; aut ex asseribus dentatis cum orbiculis] This way of bruising the corn doth fittingly resemble the weak being crushed by the mighty.

Ver. 11. Or Idumea, as appears by the mention of mount Seir, which follows. Watchman, what night? One or other of the Idumeans is inquisitive every night what tidings the watchman brings of the approach of the enemies (see ver. 6) in Arabia shall ye lodge, O ye travelling companies of Dedanim.

14 The inhabitants of the land of Tema brought water to him that was thirsty, they prevented with their bread him that fled.

15 For they fled from the swords, from the drawn sword, and from the bent bow, and from the grievousness of war.

Ver. 12. The morning cometh, and also the night.] This verse hath puzzled all the commentators. Without repeating their several conjectures, one may conceive the sense to be this: "You inquire every night what tidings that brings, but the morning be as dangerous as the night?" (see Ezek. vii. 7, 10).

If ye will inquire, inquire ye: return, come.] Or, "return, and come again," as the old translation reads, which was published under king Henry VIII. (compare Job xviii. 10). If you will inquire indeed, and ask questions in earnest, inquire of God first, ask his mercy, and afterward come again, and ye shall have a more favourable answer.

Ver. 13.] This prophecy threateneth one clan of the Arabians, those who were the posterity of Dedan, the grandson of Abraham (Gen. xxv. 3), and tells them they shall be driven from their tents or habitations, and forced to seek for shelter in the woods and thickets. They are called travelling companies, because most of the Arabians lived in movable tents, and were therefore called Semites, and removed with their cattle from place to place, for the convenience of pasture, like the Nomads in Africa.

Ver. 14.] The words describe the straits the Danites were reduced to, being forced to fly from the enemy without any provisions for their present sustenance; whereupon their neighbours, the Temanites (the posterity of Tema, Ishmael's son, Gen. xx. 15), took pity upon their forlorn condition. To relieve travellers with necessaries, was an instance of hospitality received among all nations (see Deut. xxvii. 1).

Ver. 16. Within a year.] Within that precise time (see xvi. 15). This description of a year is used to distinguish it from a prophetic year, which consists of three hundred and sixty-five years, reckoning every day for a year (see Numb. xiv. 34. Ezek. iv. 6), or from some remarkable time in general; in which sense we read of the "acceptable year of the Lord" (Isa. lx. 2), and the "year of recompense" (xxxiv. 8).

Ver. 17.] The prophet extends this judgment to another division of the Arabians, which descended from Kedar, Ishmael's son (Gen. xxi. 13), who were famous for the use of the bow, at which weapon their ancestor Ishmael was very expert (see Gen. xxi. 20). The same people are said to dwell in "the tents of Kedar" (Ps. exx. 5. Cant. 1. 5), and were remarkable for their swarthy hue (the word Kedar signifying black or tawny), according to that description the church gives of herself in that place of the Canticles, "I am as black as the tents of Kedar, but comely as the curtains of Solomon;" for that is the true order of the words.

CHAPTER XXII.

1 The burden of the valley of vision. What aileth thee now, that thou art wholly gone up to the housetops?

2 Thou that art full of stirs, a tumultuous city, a joyous city: thy slain men are not slain with the sword, nor dead in battle.

3 All thy rulers are fled together, they are bound by the archers: all that are found in thee are bound together, which have fled from far.

4 Therefore said I, Look away from me: I will weep bitterly, labour not to comfort me, because of the spoiling of the daughter of my people.

5 For it is a day of trouble, and of treading

That thou art wholly gone up to the housetop?] To discover the motions of the enemy, or to look out for assistance (compare xvi. 3).

Ver. 2. Thou that art full of stirs, a tumultuous city.] This may be better understood of the time past, as if the prophet had said, Thou hast been full of noise and multitudes, mirth, and jollity (compare xviii. 7. xxii. 13), but now a deep and melancholy silence hath seized thee.

Thy slain men are not slain with the sword.] But are dead with fear.

Ver. 3. They are bound by the archers, &c.] This part of the verse may be rendered more clearly thus, "All that are found in thee have conspired together for fear of the archers, they have conspired together (and) have fled a great way off." The adverb mecha- chok doth not only signify "from afar," but likewise "to a place a great way off" (see xviii. 13. xxiii. 7. lvii. 9).

Ver. 4.] The Hebrew verb shangah is rendered by our interpreters depart, or turn away from me, Job vii. 19. xiv. 6. i.e. let me alone to myself, that I may indulge my grief. The prophet here sympathizes with the afflictions of his people (compare Jer. iv. 19. lx. 1).
down, and of perplexity by the Lord God of hosts in the valley of vision, breaking down the walls, and of crying to the mountains.

6 And Elam bare the quiver with chariots of men and horsemen, and Kir uncovered the shield.

7 And it shall come to pass, that they, thou choicest valleys shall be full of chariots, and the horsemen shall set themselves in array at the gate.

8 ¶ And he discovered the covering of Judah, and thou didst look in that day to the armour of the house of the forest.

9 Ye have seen also the breaches of the city of David, that they are many: and ye gathered together the waters of the lower pool.

10 And ye have numbered the houses of Jerusalem, and the houses have ye broken down to fortify the wall.

11 Ye made also a ditch between the two walls for the water of the old pool: but ye have not looked unto the maker thereof, neither had respect unto him that fashioned it long ago.

12 And in that day did the Lord God of hosts call to weeping, and to mourning, and to baldness, and to girding with sackcloth:

13 And behold joy and gladness, slaying oxen, and killing sheep, eating flesh, and drinking wine: let us eat and drink; for to morrow we shall die.

14 And it was revealed in mine ears by the Lord of hosts, Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till ye die, saith the Lord God of hosts.

15 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God of hosts, Go, get thee unto this treasurer, even unto Shebna, which is over the house, and say,

16 What hast thou here? and whom hast

Ye gathered together the waters of the lower pool.

There were two pools or lakes which supplied Jerusalem with water; the upper pool (see vii. 9, xxxvi. 2), called Gilon, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 30, called likewise the old pool, ver. 11, of this chapter: and the lower pool, mentioned above. Hezekiah made a conveyance to bring down the waters from the upper pool into this lower (2 Chron. xxxiii. 30).

Ver. 10. Ye have numbered the houses Or marked out what houses should be pulled down for the better fortifying the walls of the city.

Ver. 11. Ye made also a ditch between the two walls.

The ditch was a channel to carry off the waters from the upper to the lower pool (see ver. 9). The outer wall of these two seems to have been built now, to fortify the city against the siege which they expected (see 2 Chron. xxxiii. 5, 6, xxxiv. 4).

Ye gathered together the waters of the lower pool.

Gilon and Siloam were both one fountain, which had two streams issuing out of it, called the upper and lower pool. These two streams run in two contrary courses, one eastward, and the other westward. See Dr. Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 667, and his Chronographical Table, at the end of the second volume.

But ye have not looked unto the maker thereof.

In your adversity you have not looked up to God, by whose blessing upon David this city was built, where the house of Israel promised to place his name, and to continue his especial protection over it. God is said to make and to build cities, as well as to destroy them (see xxxvii. 26, Jer. xxxi. 4, 28).

Ver. 12. In that day did the Lord God of hosts call to weeping, &c. God’s judgments did loudly call upon men to humble themselves before him, and try to avert his anger by fasting, and other acts of humiliation.

And to baldness; See note on xv. 2.

Ver. 13. Let us eat and drink; for to morrow we shall die.

The words of desperate persons, expecting nothing but death, who thought it in vain to call upon God, because they looked upon their case as incapable of relief; and therefore resolved to spend that little time they had to live as merrily as they could: such a story is told by Livy, of the senators of Capua; who having revolted from the Romans to Hannibal, and despairing of mercy when the city was retaken, made a feast together, and poisoned themselves at the end of the entertainment (lib. xxvi. cap. 14).

Ver. 14. This your despair of mercy and hardening of heart, your unbelief and false judgments, shall never be forgiven you (compare 1 Sam. xv. 35; 3 Sam. vii. 23, Job. xxvii. 5): but whatever respite you may thou here, that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here, as he that heweth him out a sepulchre on high, and that graveth an habitation for himself in a rock?

17 Behold, the Loyn will carry thee away with a mighty captivity, and will surely cover thee.

18 He will surely violently turn and toss thee like a ball into a large country: there shalt thou die, and there the chariots of thy glory shall be the shame of thy lord’s house.

19 And I will drive thee from thy station, and from thy state shall he pull thee down.

20 And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will call my servant Eliakim the son of Hilkiah:

have at present, you shall at length die in your iniquity.

Ver. 15.] Shebna had the chief management of the king’s household and family; he was removed afterward to be scribe, or secretary, a place of less honour and dignity, and Eliakim was put into his place (xxxvi. 4, 22).

Ver. 16. What hast thou here?] Or, “What hast thou here to do here? or are the expression here is Jer. ii. 18. This Shebna seems to have been a foreigner, and not well-affect ed to the Jewish religion.

Whom hast thou here, that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre] What relations or family hath thou here that thou art ambitious of raising thee a stately sepulchre, or burial-place, for thyself and thine heirs?

That graveth an habitation for himself in a rock?] A monument that should preserve his memory to all succeeding times; the expression denotes security (see Num. xxiv. 21): sepulchres were commonly hewn out in rocks (see Matt. xxvii. 60).

Ver. 17. Carry thee away.] See the following verse. What is the sense of these verses? Persons under disgrace or condemnation had their heads covered (see 2 Sam. xv. 30. Esth. vii. 8. Jer. xiv. 3).

But if we follow our marginal reading, that refers both the sentences of this verse to that robe of state which belonged to Shebna, as ruler of the king’s household (compare ver. 21).

Ver. 18. He will surely violently turn and toss thee like a ball into a large country:] Some interpret the words thus: “He will wrap thee up close like a ball or bundle, and carry thee captive into a large or wide country”; but I am apt to think the Septuagint, with whom the Chaldee paraphrase agrees, have given the best sense of this place, who join the latter part of the foregoing verse with this, and translate both verses to this purpose: Behold, the Lord shall carry thee away with a mighty captivity, and shalt divest thee of thy robe; he shall strip thee of thy glorious coronet, and shall cast thee out like a ball into a wide country.” The grammarians observe, that many verbs in Hebrew have two contrary significations: so shurah signifies to take root and to put up by the roots; chai to sin, and to make an abode for sin; berel to bless, and to curse; nephesh, a soul or living creature, and a dead carcass (see Dr. Pocock’s Not. Miscell. cap. 2), and by the same reason the words used here, natah and tsamaph, may signify both to adorn and to disrobe: we may farther observe, that the verb tsamaph, and the noun derived from it, are in all other places used only for adorning the head with a mitre.

21 And I will clothe him with thy robe, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand; and he shall be a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah.

22 And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open.

23 And I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place; and he shall be for a glorious throne to his father’s house.

24 And they shall hang upon him all the glory of his father’s house, the offspring and the issue, all vessels of small quantity, from the vessels of cups, even to all the vessels of flagons.

Like a ball] According to the interpretation just now given, the expression here is elliptical, and runs thus in the Hebrew, “He shall strip thee of thy coronet, like a ball into a large country; which ellipsis is to be supplied thus: “and shall cast thee like a ball,” &c. See a like instance, Ps. lxxix. 39. “Thou hast profaned the crown of thy servant, by casting it to the ground; so our interpreters do rightly supply the sense (see likewise Pool’s Synopsis upon Isa. vii. 6). There shalt thou die.] Where thou shalt live and die in obscurity.

There the chariots of thy glory shall be the shame of thy lord’s house. The honours thou didst arrive to, shall turn to the reproach of thy lord who preferred thee.

Ver. 19. And from thy state shall he pull thee down.] That is, thou shalt be pulled down, the active being put for the impersonal, by a usual Hebraism. Thus Exod. vii. 13, our translation reads, “He hardened Pharaoh’s heart; but ix. 35, the same words are better translated, “The heart of Pharaoh was hardened” (see xlii. 18).

Ver. 20. Girdle.] A girdle was a mark of dignity, and therefore worn both by priests (Exod. xxviii. 40), and princes (1 Sam. xviii. 4), and designed for both strength and honour (see notes on v. 27. xi. 5).

He shall be a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.] This denotes his tender care of these who were under his government. Princes themselves, in their chivalric kind, have been called by the name of parents: frequent instances of which may be seen in the rescripts of Constantine and his successors to their Prefects Proriorum, in the Theodosian and Justinian codes.

Ver. 22. The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder.] A key is an emblem of trust; and the expression alludes to the fashion of keys in old times, which were long, and made like a hook, and then laid upon the shoulder, and worn there as the badge of an office: concerning which custom, see Huidius Demonstr. Evang. prop. ix. cap. 105.

So he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open.] Herein Elakim was an eminent type of Christ, who, “as a son over his own house,” hath an unlimited authority in the church (see Rev. ii. 7, compared with Matt. xvi. 19). The latter part of the expression is applied to God, Job xii. 14. Indeed, the words imply such a sovereign and absolute power, as cannot belong to any person, but such a one as is God as well as man.

Ver. 23. As a nail in a sure place; Not to be moved as his predecessor was (compare Ezra ix. 8). But and ver. 21. He shall be an honour to his family; they shall all depend upon him for prome-

CHAPTER XXIII.

1 The burden of Tyre. Howl, ye ships of Tarshish; for it is laid waste, so that there is no house, no entering in: from the land of Chittim it is revealed to them.

2 Be still, ye inhabitants of the isle; thou whom the merchants of Zidon, that pass over the sea, have replenished.

3 And by great waters the seed of Sihor, the harvest of the river, is her revenue; and she is a mart of nations.

Ver. 1. Howl, ye ships of Tarshish.] The phrase signifies any merchant-ships, particularly those that trade into Spcm (see note on li. 16). As Tyre was one of the most famous marts in the world in those times; so the destruction of it must be a great loss to all merchant-adventurers.

So that there is no house, no entering in.] Every house or warehouse in Tyre, is shut up, and all trade ceased (compare xxiv. 10).

From the land of Chittim it is revealed to them.] Chittim, in scripture, signifies all the countries lying upon the Mediterranean sea, called "the isles of Chittim," Ezek. xxvi. 6. The words import, that the news of the siege of Tyre should be dispersed into all the trafficking parts upon the Egean and Ionian seas, and so reach the ears of those that trade in the most western parts of the world, even as far as the Spice Islands. For the sense of the latter part of the verse, is easy, and reconcilable with the Hebrew: thus they render it, "It is laid waste, so that none come [to wit] out of the land of Chittim; it is carried away captive." Bochart understands the word Chittim here, and at the twelfth verse, of the Cuthians, or Babylonians: and then taking the verb miglah, for being carried captive, as the Septuagint and Vulgar Latin explain it; the sense runs very easy thus, "From the land of the Cuthians doth their captivity come." Ver. 2. Be still, ye inhabitants of the isle.] Tyre was placed in an island (see Ezek. xxvii. 3. xxviii. 2); and it is here commanded to be still, or silent, to signify that all that noise which is heard in popu-

8 Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre, the crowning city, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth?

9 The Lord of hosts hath purposed it, to stain the pride of all glory, and to bring into contempt all the honourable of the earth.

10 Pass through thy hand as a river, O daughter of Tarshish: there is no more strength.

11 He stretched out his hand over the sea, he in general, other neighbouring places, shall be as much concerned at the ill news of the destruction of Tyre, as they were at the calamity of Egypt, mentioned ch. xix. But there is a difficulty, admitting this sense, because the destruction of Tyre, here spoken of, was before that of Egypt; if we mean that calamity of Egypt which is usually joined with the destruction of Tyre in the prophets (see Jer. xxxv. 19. 22. Ezek. xxix. 18. 19). Therefore others read this verse thus, "As soon as the report of Tyre shall come to, or be heard in, Egypt, they shall be in great pain for it;" viz. because they exported their corn to Tyre, and made a gainful trade by it (see ver. 3). And this sense the Septuagint follows.

Ver. 6. Pass ye ever to Tarshish.] Leave the place of your avocation, and betake yourselves for refuge to some of the ports which lie upon the Mediterranean sea (see ver. 1), where the Tyrians used to traffic, and where they might hope to settle themselves (see ver. 7, 19). The Septuagint understand the place of Carilgae, which was a colony transplanted from Tyre, Tho's, ye inhabitants of the isle.] See ver. 2.

Ver. 7. Is this your joyous city?] Great cities, being the centres of trade and wealth, are usually the seats of all kinds of gaiety and luxury (see note on xxii. 2).

Whose antiquity is of ancient days?] Tyre is spoken of as a strong city in the time of Joshua (Josh. xix. 29). Mira Sidon republicae et Floniam ad extremas partem terrae est. (Strabo, lib. xvii. p. 756), "Next to Zion, Tyre is the greatest and most ancient of all the Phoenician cities." Her own feet shall carry her afar off to sojourn.] The prophet speaks of Tyre as of a tender and delicate woman not used to hardships, who yet should be forced to travel on foot tedious journeys into foreign countries, being driven from her own habitation (compare xviii. 2).

Ver. 8. Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre, the crowning city, &c.] Who but God, whose decrees none can frustrate? Whose purpose it is to bring down the pride of that topping city, who does vaunt itself as the queen of cities (see Ezek. xxvii. 3. xxviii. 2. and compare Rev. xviii. 7). Ver. 10. According to this translation, Tyre is called the daughter of Tarshish, because it was enriched by the sea trade, especially the traffic which came from the Spanish or African coasts, as Huetius interprets the place (Lib. de Navigat. Solomon. cap. 3. numb. 9). So the prophet here exhorts her inhabitants to take heed, being so easily speeded, and with the swiftness of a river to get out of their own country, and from the reach of the enemy. But others translate the words, "Pass into thy land, O daughter of Tarshish," and understand them of the city Tarshish, or the merchants of that place, as if it were an exhortation to them to return home. Their merchandise had shotk the kingdoms: the Lord hath given a commandment against the merchant city, to destroy the strong holds thereof. 12 And he said, Thou shalt no more rejoice, O thou oppressed virgin, daughter of Zidon: arise, pass over to Chittim. there also shalt thou have no rest.

13 Behold the land of the Chaldeans; this people was not, till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness: they set up the towers thereof, they raised up the palaces thereof; and he brought it to ruin. Formerly flowed in like a river into the ports of Tyre, but now that gainful traffic, their strength and support, would entirely cease (compare ver. 14).

Ver. 11. The Lord, mentioned in the latter part of the verse, stretched out his hand over Tyre, called the sea, ver. 4. and the neighbouring kingdoms were astonished at the news of such a terrible judgment.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt no more rejoice, O thou oppressed virgin, daughter of Zidon:] Tyre was probably a colony of Zidonians, and therefore called here the daughter of Zidon. Colonies commonly retained the name of the mother-city: thus Rome was called new Troy, and Carthage the Tyrian city (see Spanheim de Numismat. dissert. iv. p. 436, 437). It is certain, that of the two cities Zidon was much the ancientest, as it was obtained by Moses at the setting of the world after the flood (Gen. x. 19. and again, xlix. 13). Afterward it is called by Joshua, Great Zidon (Josh. xi. 8). Homer, likewise, takes notice of Zidon, but not of Tyre. The authority of Strabo is express to the same purpose (see note upon ver. 7).

The prophet calls Tyre an oppressed virgin, because she was conquered, and, if it were not repeated by her enemies: whereas those cities which never came into a conqueror's hands are styled virgins, as having preserved their integrity (see xxxvii. 22).

Pass over to Chittim; there also shalt thou have no rest.] See notes on ver. 1. 6. Bochart understands the Cuthians by Chittim (which word is here written Chittijm), as he does Chittim in the former verse (see ver. 3). Solomon designates those cities Chittim; there shall be, thou shalt be carried captive to Cutha, or Susiana (see 2 Kings xvii. 24): a province lying upon the east of Euphrates: but "there also shalt thou have no rest:" but God's judgments shall still pursue thee.

Ver. 13. Behold the land of the Chaldeans:] Even the Chaldeans themselves, who are your conquerors, their prosperity will not be perpetual: as their beginning was small, so their destruction will come to pass in due time.

This people was not, till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwell in the wilderness:] Within the memory of man, Baladan, or Nabonassor (see xxxix. 1), founded Babylon, to be the metropolis of the Scenaries, that dwelt in tents before, dispersed through Arabia Felix (see iv. 30); and it came by degrees to be raised to that strength and magnificence in which now we see it. This is Sir John Marsham's interpretation of this difficult text (Chron. Can. p. 178. edit. fol.).

Though Babylon was as old as Nimrod (Gen. x. 10. 11. 9), yet it might underlie under that of Chaldea; for many, as most other cities have done, and after it was gone to decay, be restored by Baladan, as it was afterward rebuilt by Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. iv. 30). Thus Rechoam is said to have built Hebron (2 Chron. xi. 10), which yet was one of the oldest cities in the world (see Num. xxxii. 22).

He brought it to ruin.] The Lord of hosts (see 14 Howl, ye ships of Tarshish: for your strength is laid waste.

15 And it shall come to pass in that day, that Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years, according to the days of one king; after the end of seventy years shall Tyre sing as a harlot.

16 Take a harp, go about the city, thou harlot that hast been made; make sweet melody, sing many songs, that thou mayest be remembered.

Ver. 9.] Some translate the words thus, “It is brought to ruin;” the active being put for the impersonal (see note on xix. 19). The prophet foresees the destruction of Babylon, mentioned ch. xiii. and speaks of it here as already come to pass: a way of speaking usual in the prophets to denote the certainty of the event (see xxii. 9).

[He brought it to ruin.] The people of the Chaldeans, an upstart nation, have brought Tyre to ruin.

Ver. 11. Ships of Tarshish: see ver. 10.

Ver. 15.] The word king is put here for kingdom, as the same word is used, Dan. vii. 17. viii. 21. Thus, Rev. xvii. 10, ten kings are seven governments succeeding one another. So this expression denotes the duration of the Babylonish monarchy, whose dominion over all the neighbouring countries should last seventy years; and when that time was expired, the Tyrians, with other people oppressed by the Babylonian government, should recover their ancient liberty (compare Jer. xxv. 9—19. xxvii. 3. 6. 7).

[Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years.] The destruction of Tyre was some years after that of Jerusalem (see Dr. Prideaux, ad an. A. C. 573). But the prophet Jeremy seems to confine the devastations of all those countries which Nebuchadnezzar conquered, to the space of seventy years, at which time an end should be put to the Babylonish empire (see Jer. xxv. 9. 11. 12). But there are several ways of computing those seventy years. See the note upon Zechar. i. 12.

Ver. 16.] The imperative is here put for the future (see note on ii. 9). Cities are often compared to women (see ver. 12. Jer. vi. 2), and sometimes to harlots, by reason of those vices which too much prevail in great and rich cities, and infect those that resort to them. Lowd women are commonly described in ancient authors as skilful in music, which is one of the arts that they used to inveigle men into their company. The expressions in this verse, as well as those which follow, of “Tyre’s committing fornication with all the kingdoms of the world,” signify the several arts which she had to entice merchants to trade with her, the frauds she made use of in managing her trade, and the luxury which her traffic promoted. Compare Rev. xviii. 3. 9, where the same expressions are applied in a spiritual sense to mystical Babylon.

Ver. 18. Her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the Lord:] The sense of this verse may be, that several of the Tyrians in aftertimes shall become proselytes to the Jewish religion, and shall devote part of their substance to the service of the temple at Jerusalem (see the note upon xlv. 11). But there is no necessity of supposing that this part of the prophecy should be fulfilled just upon the restoration of Tyre; for it is usual for the prophets to join together things relating to the same place or people, though the fulfilling the several parts of the prophecy may belong to several different ages (see iv. 2). And this I take to be the case here. The prophets commonly express heathens and idolaters in general by some remarkable name, as that of Egypt, Babylon, and the like (see the note on xi. 14). In this verse I suppose the name of Tyre to be used in this verse, and in the same sense the daughter of Tyre is understood by most interpreters upon Ps. xlv. 12, not so as to exclude that particular city, but withal to signify that both that place and many others which were strangers to the true religion, should at length be converted, and consecrate a great part of their wealth and substance to the service of God (see notes on xxiv. 12). Her merchandise shall be for them that dwell before the Lord:] Her riches shall be set apart for the maintenance of those that attend upon God’s service: an allusion to the office of the priests and Levites, who by turns gave constant attendance at the temple.

To eat sufficiently:] The expression alludes to those feasts which the Jews made at Jerusalem, of their first-fruits and other holy things: and of which the priests and Levites had a particular share (see Deut. xii. 18, 19, xiv. 23. 27).

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Behold, the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof.

CHAP XXIV.

ARGUMENT.—After the several denunciations of God’s judgments upon the Jews, and all the neighbouring countries, contained in the foregoing chapters, from the thirteenth onward; in this the prophet gives a general description of the state of that part of the world, especially of the ten tribes, whose country was ruined, and themselves carried cap-

2 And it shall be, as with the people, so with the priest; as with the servant, so with his master; as with the maid, so with her mistress; as tive, by Shalmaneser, under these calamities: but withal he uses such expressions as plainly denote the general destruction of the world at the last day: as indeed all God’s particular judgments are earnest and forerunners of the general judgment (see note on xiii. 10).

Ver. 1. The earth empty: The Hebrew word heartis, is promiscuously rendered in this chapter by with the buyer, so with the seller; as with the lender, so with the borrower; as with the taker of usury, so with the giver of usury to him.

3. The land shall be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled: for the Lord hath spoken this word.

4. The earth mourneth and fadeth away, the world languisheth and fadeth away, the haughty people of the earth do languish.

5. The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant.

6. Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein are desolate: therefore the inhabitants of the earth are burned, and few men left.

7. The new wine mourneth, the vine languisheth, all the merryhearted do sigh.

8. The mirth of tabrets ceaseth, the noise of them that rejoice endeth, the joy of the harp ceaseth.

our interpreters, either earth or land: and may be taken in a larger or narrower sense, as the context inclineth you to understand.

Ver. 2. As with the people, so with the priest.] Or, the prince, as the word does likewise signify. This and the following expressions denote, that all orders and conditions shall be equally involved in the same common calamity.

Ver. 3. The land shall be utterly emptied.] Shall be utterly emptied of its wealth and inhabitants.

Ver. 4. The haughty people of the earth do languish.] These suffer most under such calamities, as having most to lose, and not being used to hardships (see ii. 12).

Ver. 5. The earth also is defiled.] The contagion of sin infecteth the very ground, and bringeth a curse upon it (see ver. 6) making it obnoxious to God's judgments (see Gen. iii. 17. Numb. xxxv. 35. Ps. evii. 34).

Because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant.] So the wicked hore in Daniel is said to "change times and laws"; i. e. to abrogate God's laws and the ordinances of his service, and substitute new ones (Dan. vii. 25). By the "everlasting covenant, is meant that covenant which God made with the Jews at mount Sinai (see Exod. xxiv. 7, 8); and the expression alludes to Gen. xviii. 7, where God calls the covenant between him and Abraham, "an everlasting covenant," berith elom, in the Hebrew: because it was to endure for a long succession of years, called also in that language, and to last till the new age, or the age of the Messias (see note on ii. 2): and then was to be more eminently completed in the spiritual seed of Abraham.

Ver. 6. The inhabitants of the earth are burned.] Are destroyed by fire and sword, and entirely consumed (compare xiii. 25).

Ver. 7. The new wine mourneth, the vine languisheth.] There is a destruction of the vineyards, and the fruits of the earth are consumed by hostile invasions (compare xvi. 8, 9. Joel i. 10, 19).

Ver. 8.] There is no place for mirth or the expressions of it when men are under great calamities (compare Jer. vii. 34. xv. 9. xxv. 10. Ezek. xxvi. 13. Hos. ii. 7).

Ver. 9.] Those that can command wine under Vol. III.—36.

0. They shall not drink wine with a song; strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it.

10. The city of confusion is broken down: every house is shut up, that no man may come in.

11. There is a crying for wine in the streets; all joy is darkness, the mirth of the land is gone.

12. In the city is left desolation, and the gate is smitten with destruction.

13. ¶ When thus it shall be in the midst of the land among the people, there shall be as the shaking of an olive tree, and as the gathering of grapes when the vintage is done.

14. They shall lift up their voice, they shall sing for the majesty of the Lord, they shall cry aloud from the sea.

15. Wherefore glorify ye the Lord in the fires, even the name of the Lord God of Israel in the isles of the sea.

16. ¶ From the uttermost part of the earth have we heard songs, even glory to the righteous: But I said, My leanness, my leanness, wo unto me! the treacherous dealers have dealt treacherous this scarcity will have no heart to drink it; nor will it be able to cheer their spirits under such afflictions.

Ver. 10.] The word token, which our English translation renders confusion, signifies likewise desolation (see xxxiv. 11): and this sense of the word is most proper here: as if it had been said, Every city is the image of desolation (compare ver. 12, and xxv. 2). Some understand by the city, Samaria; the head of the kingdom of Israel, which was now ruined by Shalmaneser, and then laid waste (compare xxv. 13.) Compare xviii. 5, 6. When the prophets denounced God's judgments upon his people, they commonly conclude with a promise of still preserving a remnant; though they were to be but few in comparison of those who are involved in the general destruction (see notes on i. 9, iv. 2).

Ver. 11. They shall sing for the majesty of the Lord.] They shall magnify the power of God, which appeared so signal in their deliverance. They shall cry aloud from the sea.] Or, from the isles of the sea, as it is expressed in the following verse; i. e. from the isles of the western or Mediterranean sea, whither many of the Jews were scattered, and from whence they should return into their own country in the latter days (see note on xi. 11). The Hebrew word sathom signifies the west as well as the sea, because the Mediterranean sea lay westward of Judea (see Josh. xxiii. 4); and so the word is rendered by some interpreters here (compare Hos. xi. 10, where the word is translated the west). This verse is to be understood of the final restoration of the Jews, and the chapter plainly relate to the consummation of all things (see ver. 19, 20, 23). The prophets take hints from the state of things in or near their own time, to describe what shall come to pass in the latter times; as hath been before observed upon x. 20 (see likewise note upon xix. 19).

Ver. 15. Glorify ye the Lord in the fires.] In the fiery trials of affliction, out of which the just shall be deliver'd as out of the midst of the fire (compare xliii. 2, and see the note on iv. 2).

The isles of the sea.] See the note upon ver. 14.

Ver. 16. From the uttermost part of the earth have we heard songs, even glory to the righteous:] From the uttermost part of the earth, means the same as from the isles of the sea," in the foregoing verses; 2 A 2 from these utmost regions have we heard the joyful acknowledgment of the righteous, praising God for their deliverance, and for all the glorious things he hath done for them; making them thereby remarkable in the eyes of the world, as his favourites. Some understand the word righteous of God, as if it were glory to the righteous God: but we may observe, the design was to make it appear that all the world was being "the glory of all lands," as Ezekiel speaks, xx. 6, where he uses this very word (compare Dan. viii. 9, xii. 16. 11. Jer. iii. 19). And if we take the word in this sense, the meaning of the place will be, that the substance of their hymns were, that now the promised land should be restored to the righteous seed of Abraham; which confirms the interpretation given of ver. 14, that the context relates to the final restoration of the Jews.

My leanness, my leanness, wo unto me! Leanness sometimes signifies God's plagues or judgments, which are like a consumption of the vitals (see x. 16. xxvii. 4. Ps. civ. 16). prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in the prison, and after many days shall they be visited.

be meant those earthly princes who are influenced by them, and are their instrumentes in abetting idolatry or persecuting God's truth. The evil spirits are sometimes represented as part of the heavenly host, both with respect to the original dignity, and because they are the instruments of providence, and have a command over the inferior world, as far as God thinks fit to permit (see 1 Kings xxii. 19, &c. &c. Job. i. 6. Rev. xii. 7). And in this sense some understand that contest between the angels, mentioned Dan. x. 13, as if it were between the good and bad angels.

Ver. 32. They shall be gathered together, as prisoners are gathered together in the pit (or dungeon: see li. 11, &c.) The verse alludes to the custom of kings, who used to confine the chief commanders of their enemies whom they take prisoners, and reserve them to some extraordinary day of triumph, and then bring them out to public punishment. The word visiting is used for punishing, as well as for remembering with grace and favour. Thus this very phrase, "After many days thou shalt be visited," is used, Ezek. xxxviii. 8 (see likewise Prov. xix. 23). I cannot find any explication of this verse so agreeable to the natural sense of the words, as that of a late learned writer upon the Revelation (xix. 6); who explains it of the kings of the earth who made war with Christ, and his saints at Armageddon (Rev. xvi. 16. xix. 19), and being there disappointed, lay languishing under the sentence of condemnation till after the battle of Gog and Magog (xx. 8—10), when they were, together with Satan their leader, punished with everlasting destruction.

Ver. 33. Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed,] If the expressions of the "moon's being confounded, and the sun ashamed," be understood literally, the sense must be, that the sun and moon should be darkened and give no light; a condition that will certainly attend the last day (see Joel iii. 15. Matt. xxiv. 29). But I rather think the place to be parallel with ix. 19, and Rev. xxi. 23, where it is said, that when the kingdom of God shall come, his glory shall shine out so illustriously, that there shall be no need of the light of the sun and moon: upon which account they are represented here as ashamed and confounded to see their light eclipsed by a greater.

When the Lord—shall reign in mount Zion, &c.] We need not understand this and such-like expressions in a literal sense with the Jews, but are sufficiently warranted, by the authority of the New Testament, to explain them of the triumphant state of the church, when the saints shall reign with God and Christ in glory (see Gal. iv. 26. Heb. xii. 23. Rev. xxi. 2, 3, and the note upon ii. 9).

Before his ancients] Or, "in the presence of his ancients;" an allusion to the elders of Israel, and Moses, and their succeeding kings at the head of them, who were the governors and representatives of the whole nation. In like manner heaven is represented as the general assembly of the saints, with God and Christ at the head of them (see Ps. lxxxix. 7. Heb. xii. 23. Rev. iv. 5. and vii. 9—11). Part of this heavenly company are called by the name of elders or ancients, Rev. iv. 4. and elsewhere, particularly xix. 6. where there is a plain allusion to this place.

CHAPTER XXV.

1 O Lord, thou art my God; I will exalt thee, I will praise thy name: for thou hast done wonderful things; thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth.

2 For thou hast made of a city a heap; of a defended city a ruin: a palace of strangers to be no city; it shall never be built.

3 Therefore shall the strong people glorify thee, the city of the terrible nations shall fear thee.

4 For thou hast been a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy in his distress, a refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat, when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall.

5 Thou shalt bring down the noise of stran-pellation very properly belongs to Babylon, which was built for the strangers and sojourners, who before dwelt in tents, as wanderers in Arabia Deserta (see the notes upon xxiii. 13).

Ver. 3.] The word nes, which is translated strong, does likewise signify fierce, and so it is rendered by our interpreters, xiv. 1. and so it should be translated in Samson's riddle, Judg. xiv. 14. "Out of the fierce came forth sweetness." I take this verse to be parallel to that of Ps. lixvi. 10. "The fierceness of man shall turn to thy praise:" the trembling of these potent cities and terrible nations, or terrible ones, as they are called ver. 4. 5, will be a means of bringing them to give glory to God, and to acknowledge that the "most high rules over the children of men."

Ver. 4.] Compare iv. 6. xxxii. 2. This verse may be applied to the deliverance which God vouchsafed to the Jews from their formidable enemy Sennachereb: but I presume it may more fitly be expounded of the church's deliverance from the tyranny of mystical Babylon (see xiv. 3. &c.), and the insults of all gers, as the heat in a dry place, even the heat with the shadow of a cloud: the branch of the terrible ones shall be brought low.

6 And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined.

7 And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations.

8 He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: For the Lord hath spoken it.

9 And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this her enemies; when they shall sing the song of Moses, as those who are delivered out of a state of bondage and slavery (see Rev. xx. 3).

Ver. 5. Thou shalt bring down the noise of strangers, as the heat in a dry place; even the heat with the shadow of a cloud: Lud. de Dieu hath translated the words more clearly thus, "The noise [or tumult] of strangers is as the heat in a dry place, thou shalt bring down (or abate) the heat with the shadow of a cloud:"

The prophet compares the oppressions of those stranger and infidels to an excessive drought, which parcheth up everything, ver. 1, and here he says, that God will overshadow his people, and protect them till this tyranny be overpast: our English translation adjoins more explicitly to the comparison of the sentences, which the Hebrew accents point out: and we do not find that the ancient versions took any notice of these distinctions: and our own translation in some places neglects them, where the sense is clearer if we divide the sentences otherwise: indeed, the rabbins are not agreed what is the use of these accents, and therefore it seems a needless curiosity to lay any stress upon them.

The branch of the terrible ones. Some render zemi' "the rejoicing of the terrible ones." &c.

Ver. 6. In this mountain Called mount Zion, xxiv. 23 (see the note there, and upon ii. 2).

Shall the Lord of hosts make a feast of fat things, &c. The Lord's calling men by his grace, is often expressed in scripture by the metaphor of inviting them to a feast (see Mic. vi. 1); and the joys of heaven are described by the same figure of people. Luke xxii. 29. Rev. xix. 9. The same representation is used here, and implies that God will bestow his grace in a plentiful manner upon his people, and fill them with spiritual delights, when the Jews shall be converted, and the fulness of the gentiles shall come into the church. The words may likewise allude to those religious feasts which were kept at Jerusalem, when the Jews were commanded to leave the world (Deut. xii. 18. xiv. 26).

Of fat things full of marrow. An expression denoting the richest taste (see Ps. lxxiii. 5. Job xxxvi. 16). Of wines on the lees well refined. Of wines that had been settled on the lees, and thereby enriched, and afterwards brought to a perfect state of mellowness.

Ver. 7. The face of the covering is put for the covering of the face, by a hyphenation usual in scripture: the phrase may signify all symbols of mourning and sorrow, which were expressed by covering the face, or putting a veil upon it (see note on xxii. 17).

If we take the words in this sense, they are equivalent to the words of the tears from off all faces; in the following verse; or they may denote the taking away all ignorance and prejudice from men's minds, which St. Paul compares to a veil (2 Cor. iii. 14), and is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation.

10 For in this mountain shall the hand of the Lord rest, and Moab shall be trodden down under him, even as straw is trodden down for the dunghill.

11 And he shall spread forth his hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim: and he shall bring down their pride together with the spoils of their hands.

12 And the fortress of the high fort of thy walls shall he bring down, lay low; and bring to the ground, even to the dust.

The word covering is used in the same sense in this prophecy (xxix. 10). Mr. White is pleased to slight this interpretation, but I think it is every whit as proper a one as that which he produces out of Grotius, and he hath not thought fit to explain how all people, and all the earth, could be concerned in the terror which Sennacherib brought upon Jerusalem.

Ver. 8. He will swallow up death in victory.] Or, for ever, as the word lanctoch often signifies: St. Paul expounds this text of the general resurrection, and tells us it will not be brought to pass till then (1 Cor. xv. 51): whose authority, I think, ought to oblige every Christian to acquiesce in this interpretation: and they that strain their wits to find out some other meaning of the place, can offer nothing but what is forced and unnatural.

The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces.] This too is applied by St. John to the heavenly state, Rev. vii. 17. xxi. 4. and will never be made good till then.

The rebuke of his people shall he take away] Or, the reproach of his people," as the phrase is translated, Mic. vi. 16. That is, those reproaches which they endured under their several distresses and persecutions in divers parts of the world, which made their enemies scorn them, as persons despised and rejected by God himself (compare Ps. xiii. 10. Joel ii. 17).

Ver. 10. For in this mountain [see ver. 6] shall the hand of the Lord rest.] The church is called the place of God's rest. xii. 10 (the note there); where his power in preserving his people shall visibly exert itself, as the words here import.

And Moab shall be trodden down under him, even as straw is trodden down for the dunghill.] Or in Madmezul, as the margin reads, which was a city of Moab (Jer. xviii. 2). Moab is put here for the enemies of the church in general (see note on xi. 14).

Ver. 11. And he shall spread forth his hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim.] Some understand these words of Moab, and render them thus, "Although he spread forth his hands," &c. that is, though he do all he can to save himself, as swimmers use their utmost skill when they are in danger of drowning, yet God "shall spread forth his hands," &c. (see note on ver. 8). Or, God will spread forth the whole verse of God; that he should stretch forth his hands, and reach his enemies wherever they are. The expression, "in the midst of them," or, "in the midst thereof," as the Hebrew word signifies, favours the latter exposition.

Together with the spoils of their hands.] With the goods which they have unjustly taken from others to enrich themselves. Some render the words, "together with the strength of their hands."
CHAPTER XXVI.

1 In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah; We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks.

2 Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in.

3 Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee.

4 Trust ye in the Lord for ever: for in the Lord JEHOVAH is everlasting strength:

5 For he bringeth down them that dwell on high; the lofty city, he layeth it low; he layeth it low, even to the ground; he bringeth it even to the dust.

6 The foot shall tread it down, even the foot of the poor, and the steps of the needy.

CHAP. XXVI.

See the argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 1. In the land of Judah.] In the church, in which sense mount Zion and Jerusalem are often used (see note on xxiv. 23).

We have a strong city.] The church is called the city of God (see Ps. xlviii. 1. lxxxvii. 3. Heb. xii. 22): and its strength consists in God's protection (see Zech. ii. 5). His salvation will supply the place of the strongest fortifications (compare ix. 18).

Ver. 2. Open ye the gates.] The expression denotes the enlarging the number of believers, and bringing into the church "daily such as should be saved" (compare ix. 11. Rev. xxi. 27). The prophet addresses himself to different persons in this song, and speaks sometimes in the singular and sometimes in the plural number, which is a grateful variety in poetry (see the note upon lixii. 1).

The righteous nation.] The Jews are styled "a holy nation," Exod. xix. 6, which title more properly belongs to the Christian church (2 Pet. ii. 9), especially when it comes to be purged from its dross, and all the members of it to be righteous (see ix. 21).

Ver. 5. He bringeth down them that dwell on high;] God, who shall withstand them in their worldly power and greatness (see the note on ii. 11), or trust in their castles and fortifications (compare xxy. 12).

The lofty city, he layeth it low;] As the church is styled the city of God, so the society of infidels, or enemies to God's truth, is represented by the like similitude of a city, and typified under the figures of Sodom, Babylon, and that Jerusalem, which killed the prophets (see Rev. vi. 8). And this sense I think best agrees with the scope of the place, and with the parallel texts, xxxv. 2, 12: in neither of which places can the expression be understood of any one particular city.

Ver. 6.] The planting of the gospel was a remarkable triumph over the power and wisdom of men, when "God chose the foolish things of the world, to confound the things which were wise; and the weak things of the world, to confound the things which were mighty:"

accordingly, under every advancement of Christ's kingdom, the poor and humble, those who have despised the world, and have been despised by it, are to have a particular share in the glory and success thereof (see xi. 4. and the notes there). xxix. 19. lxi. 1. Zeph. iii. 12). If we understand

7 The way of the just is uprightness; thou, most upright, dost weigh the path of the just.

8 Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee; the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee.

9 With my soul have I desired thee in the night; yea, with my spirit within me will I seek thee early: for when thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness.

10 Let favour be showed to the wicked, yea will he not learn righteousness: in the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly, and will not behold the majesty of the Lord.

11 Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they the words of that last and great triumph of the church over antichrist and all its enemies (as many of the expressions in this and the former chapter look that way), we may fully explain the "poor and needy" here, to be those who shall escape out of the great tribulation which shall precede those times, mentioned Dan. xii. 1. Rev. vii. 14.

Ver. 7. Thou, most upright, dost weigh the path of the just.] Or, "make plain the path of the just." Thou, O God, who art the author of all goodness, dost direct his steps, and keep him from falling (see Ps. xxxvii. 23, 24). To this sense the verb pilleos is used, Prov. iv. 9.

Ver. 8.] We have possessed our souls in patience under thy chastisements (see judgments signify, ver. 9), and have waited thy good time for our deliverance.

The desire of our soul is to thy name.] We desire and endeavour to stir up devout affections in our souls towards thee, to possess our minds with due apprehensions of the greatness of thy majesty, and the dependence we ought to have upon thy promises.

Ver. 9. With my soul have I desired thee in the night.] And these devout affections we stir up within us, both late at night and early in the morning, when others give themselves up to sleep and drowsiness (compare Ps. v. 3. lxx. 6. cxiv. 11. lxxv. 15. 117. cxxx. 6).

When thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants -will learn righteousness.] The afflictions thou sendest have this good effect upon all but hardened sinners (see the following verse), that they engage men to seek God, and turn to him whom they have offended.

Ver. 10.] Though he lives among those who are remarkable for the regularity of their behaviour, among the people of God, or the righteous nation, mentioned ver. 2, yet will he not be prevailed upon by their example, or the many demonstrations God hath given of his power and providence (see ver. 11).

Ver. 11. But they shall see, and be ashamed for their envy at the people.] They shall at last be forced to give God the glory, and take shame upon themselves for the envy and hatred they have shown towards God's people. Some render the words thus, "They shall see thy zeal for the people, and be ashamed:" they shall be seized with confusion, when they see what a care and concern God hath for his people, and how visibly he exerts his power in protecting them, and punishing their adversaries. In this sense the Hebrew word is used in other places (see lxxiv. 15. Zech. i. 14. viii. 2).

Yea, the fire of thine enemies shall devour them.] The ISAIAH.

16 Lord, in trouble have they visited thee, they poured out prayer when thy chastening was upon them.
17 Like as a woman with child, that draweth near the time of her delivery, is in pain, and crieth out in her pangs; so have we been in thy sight, O Lord.
18 We have been with child, we have been in pain, we have as it were brought forth wind; we have not wrought any deliverance in the earth; neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen.
19 Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead.
20 If Come, my people, enter thou into thy

Neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen.] By our means; the "inhabitants of the world" mean the same as the "men of the world," Ps. xviii. 14. The world is often taken for the wicked, who make the greatest part of the world, and have the greatest share in it. See John vii. 7. xii. 31. xv. 18. xvi. 8. xvii. 14. 16. 25.

Ver. 19. Thy dead men shall live.] This and the following verses contain God's answer to the former complex of it, which we have been to present them with a revival, or new life, after all their miscarriages, which had brought them to death's door. The restoration of the Jews, whether after the Babylonish captivity, or after their dispersions in following times, is represented as a rising again from the dead by Ezekiel, xxxvii. 1. &c. And perhaps this verse may in its primary sense mean no more; especially if the last sentence of the verse, "And the earth shall cast out the dead," be thus translated, "but thou wilt cast down the land of the oppressors;" which sense is followed by the Septuagint: the word repahim, which is translated "the dead" in our English version, both here and in the fourteenth verse, signifies originally "gains, and from thence is applied in the LXX. to wicked oppressors. The Greek text of this verse was one of those texts upon which the ancient Jews grounded their belief of the resurrection, the hope of which was founded upon the writings of "the law and the prophets," as St. Paul tells them, Acts xxiv. 14. And the Jews from ancient times have used the words of a text parallel to this, lvvi. 14. as a form over a person interred, at the same time throwing grass into the grave, as in some places with us they do rosemary, to testify their belief of a resurrection: and this is what the true and genuine sense of the words plainly imports.

Together with my dead body shall they arise.] The Hebrew runs thus, "my dead body [or bodies] shall arise:" the noun is in the singular number, and the verb in the plural, so the singular is to be distributed for every dead body; just as it is Ps. xlii. 7, "Thou shalt keep them, O Lord, thou shalt preserve him from this generation for ever;" where the word him is taken for every one of them, as the sense is explained in the margin. These two sentences, "thy dead men shall live," and "my dead bodies shall arise," are equivalent; they are called the "dead" in the former sentence as being members of that mystical body, and God's or Christ's dead in the latter sentence, from the interest he hath in them, and because he hath promised to raise them up at the last day (see John vi. 39).

Ver. 20.] The words are an allusion to that command given to the Israelites in Egypt, "not to go out divine vengeance, which shall consume God's enemies like fire (see Deut. iv. 21. xxxii. 22. Heb. x. 27).

Ver 19.] All the mercies and deliverances we have hitherto enjoyed, proceed only from thee; which encourage us to trust in thee for a happy issue out of all our troubles.

Ver. 13. Other lords—have had dominion over us. &c.] Meaning the Assyrians, Babylonians, and all the oppressors of God's church in after times (compare 2 Chron. xii. 3): but it is by thee only that we have been delivered out of their hands, and therefore upon thee alone will we call as our God and Saviour.

Ver. 14. They are dead, they shall not live.] These oppressors of God's people shall never rise again, but "to shame and everlasting contempt," as it is said, Dan. xii. 2. "The dead shall live and rise again;" see ver. 19 of this chapter. The prophet sees the destruction of the wicked by faith, and speaks of it as a thing already done (see note on xxxi. 9), though it be not yet brought to pass (compare ver. 19, 21).

Therefore hast thou visited.] Or rather, "because thou hast visited," &c. So the particle theken is used, Numb. xx. 41. xxiv. 3.

Ver. 15.] Thou hast spread or enlarged the church called the righteous nation," ver. 2 (compare ix. 3). Here too the expressions are in the perfect-tense, as in the foregoing verse; but the words will be signally verified, when all God's "enemies shall be made his footstool, and the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of God and of his Christ" (Rev. xi. 15).

Ver. 16. In trouble have they visited thee.] Or, "remembered thee:" this and the following verses represent the sense of God's people under their afflictions.

Ver. 18. We have as it were brought forth wind: we have not wrought any deliverance in the earth.] The latter part of the sentence explains the former: We have had no good issue, saith the prophet, of all our pangs and threes; they did not produce ease and deliverance, as in the case of travelling women, but all our own labours proved abortive; in vain we struggled with our enemies, who are still too mighty for us, and it is from God alone we must expect our deliverance. "To bring forth wind," is much the same phrase with "feeding upon wind," and "reaping wind" (Hos. vii. 2. xii. 1), and signifies to take a great deal of pains to no purpose.
chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast.

21 For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity: the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.

22 Wherefore cometh the multitude of waters upon the earth? the Assyrian army destroyed before Jerusalem (xxvii. 36), as Grotius and some others would confine the sense of the words.

The earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.] The number of the slain shall be so great, that the earth can neither give them burial, nor soak up their blood (compare xxxiv. 3. lxvi. 18. Rev. xiv. 20).

CHAPTER XXVII.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter treats of the same subject with the two former, and describes that happy state of the church, when Satan and his agents shall be subdued, the church shall be enlarged and purified from idolatry, and the Jews shall be restored: all which are circumstances attending those glorious days, which the prophets often foretold shall come to pass at or near the end of the world.

Ver. 1. Shall punish Leviathan.] Tyrants and oppressors are often resembled to whales and other sea-monsters, which devour the lesser fry: thus Pharaoh is called the Leviathan, and the dragon or whale in the waters (Ps. lxxiv. 14, 14. Is. ii. 9. Ezek. xxiv. 3): and so the expressions of this verse denote in general those worldly potentates, who have been the noted oppressors of God's people, and are, indeed, the instruments and types of Satan, so often called the serpent in scripture, to whom some interpreters apply the expressions here (see the following note).

The piercing serpent, even Leviathan that crooked serpent; and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea.] The Hebrew word berith, which our English translates piercing, is rendered in the margin crossing; i.e. having his mouth run out in length like a bar: it signifies likewise running away, and so it is rendered here by the Septuagint. But in Job xxvi. 13, where the same phrase occurs, they render it δόξετα των ἀποκτησίων, "the apostate dragon," as if they understood it of the devil. The word serpent is sometimes taken for a water animal (see Amos ix. 13): in which sense it is used here, and ranked with Leviathan, and the dragon or whale that is in the sea. The word tannim signifies any great fish, such as a whale, and so is plainly taken, Gen. i. 21, and Ps. cxliv. 7, "Praise the Lord, ye whales (not dragons) and all deeps." Bochart thinks it sometimes signifies a crocodile, particularly Ezek. xxiv. 3. xxvii. 3. The word is very fitly rendered sea-monsters by our translators. Lam. iv. 5.

Ver. 2, 3. The church is often compared to a vineyard (see v. 1. Jer. ii. 21. Matt. xxii. 33); and red wine was esteemed the best and most generous sort of wine (see Prov. xxxii. 31). The import of these two verses is, that when the enemies of God's people are destroyed, among other songs and thanksgivings to God, this acknowledgment shall be made to the praise of God, and of the church which he protects, that as she is fruitful in all good works, so God continually watches over her and defends her from danger (compare Ps. lxxv. 8, 13).

Ver. 4.] These are still the words of God, who speaks to this purpose: Though fury doth not belong to me, and vengeance be called my strange work (xxvii. 21), yet if the briars and thorns, i.e. the wicked and incorrigible, bid defiance to me, they will find I shall soon destroy and consume them like fire; an instance of which I have given in the judgments mentioned xxvi. 21. xxvii. 1. By briars and thorns are meant sinners (see note on ix. 18).

Ver. 5.] Or rather, let such a one return to me, and make his peace with me, who am a sure refuge and strength to all that fly to me for succour (see xxv. 1).

Ver. 6. He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root.] Compare xxvii. 31. Hos. iv. 5. 6. The words may be rendered, "In times to come he shall cause Jacob to take root." that smote him? or is he slain according to the slaughter of them that are slain by him? 3

8 In measure, when it shooteth forth, thou wilt debate with it: he stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind.

9 By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged: and this is all the fruit to take away his sin; when he maketh all the stones of the altar as chalkstones that are beaten in sander, the groves and images shall not stand up.

10 Yet the defended city shall be desolate,
And fill the face of the world with fruit.] Compare
iv. 2. These, and the foregoing words, are a description of the flourishing state of the Jews after their conversion, which shall be as new "life from the dead," as St. Paul expresses it (Rom. xi. 15), and shall occasion the fulness of the gentiles coming into the church. All that Mr. White will have to be meant by these expressions is, "that the Jews, and Sennacherib's overthrow, shall flourish again, and grow populous." The sense, he owns, must make the expressions very hyperbolical, or else his interpretation will hardly pass for a literal one.

Ver. 7. [Him, that is, Israel: God never makes an utter destruction of his people, but always preserves a remnant (see note on i. 9); whereas his electric thunder and lightning destroy the word, and often times puts the sentence in execution, as in the case of Amalek (Exod. xvii. 11. Numb. xxiv. 20. Isam.
xv. 3).

Ver. 8. In measure, when it shooteth forth, thou wilt debate with it.] The execution of God's judgments is expressed by God's "having a controversy with them" (Deut. xxvii. 22). The Hebrew word, which will be in measure, or with moderation, as the prophet here speaks. Some expositors think that the word beshallehkah, which our English renders, "when it shooteth forth," is a metaphor taken from the art of pruning, as if the prophet had said, God will cut off the superfluous branches, but spare the main body of the tree. groves, as if the Lord, when he seems [the people] into captivity!" and exclaims to it, that God would not utterly destroy them in a for-gien land, but preserve a remnant to return, and repossession their native country.

He stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind.] That is, in the midst of judgment he remembers mercy. The east wind may allude to the shooting forth of the branches, mentioned in the foregoing words; that wind being very prejudicial to tender shoots. The east wind being a dry blasting wind, elsewhere signifies the calamities of war, and such-like wasting judgments (see Jer. iv. 11. Ezek. xvii.

Ver. 9. This is all the fruit to take away his sin for all his breaches. [With all the stones of the altar as chalkstones] This shall be the most remarkable effect of that reformation, which God's chastisements shall produce; viz. the abolishing of all the monuments of idolatry, such as altars, groves, and images (see xvii. 8). The word altar, in the singular number, is taken distributively, for any altar, concerning which elsewhere, see the note on xvi.
19. These altar-stones, the prophet saith, shall be beaten to dust like chalkstones, in order to the aboliishing the very memory of idolatrous worship. So Moses ground the golden calf to powder (see Exod. xxix. 20. Deut. ix. 21.), and Aen stamped his mother's idol to pieces (2 Chron. xv. 16). It hath been already observed, that when the prophets speak of an entire reformation, they always mention the utter abolishing and the habitation forsaken, and left like a wild-derness; there shall the calf feed, and there shall he lie down, and consume the branches therof.
11 When the booths thereof are withered, they shall be broken off: the woman come, and set them on fire: for it is a people of no understanding: therefore he that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will shew them no favour.

12 ¶ And it shall come to pass in that day, of idolatry, especially out of the church, as if that were one of the last enemies of God's truth that should be destroyed (see the note on i. 29).
The groves and images shall not stand up.] Or, "so that the groves and images may not rise again." The Hebrew language wants the potential or subjunctive mood, which is often supplied by the future tense (see a like instance, vii. 25).

Ver. 10. Yet the defended city shall be—forsaken, &c.] The prophet mixes threatenings with the promises, as is usual elsewhere, and tells the Jews, that before these happy days come, great calamities should befall them: Jerusalem and the rest of their fortified cities should be desolate. City is here taken for cities in general (see the verse foregoing, and the notes upon xxvii. 20, ii. 13.), and the houses and groves, &c.
There shall the calf feed.] Desolate places naturally turn to pasturage: so these and the like expressions are used to signify an entire desolation (compare vii.
25. xxvii. 2. xxxii. 14).

Ver. 11. When the booths thereof are withered, they shall be broken off.] The prophet continues to describe the calamities of which he speaks, and foretells that the greater part of the groves where the branches are broken down, and the withered branches of the trees gathered by women make a fire: so should the whole country of Judea be exposed to the ravage and spoil of the weakest and most contemptible enemy (compare iii. 12). Thus the fall of the Assyrian is represented by the lopping of a great tree, and breaking off its boughs, Ezek.
xxxiii. 13. But the whole country of the Jews, in the lab-ter times (consider and compare Ezek. xx. 31. 34. 38.
Amos ix. 8, 9).

From the channel of the river unto the stream of Egypt.] From the river Euphrates, which is upon the border of Assyria, to the river Nile, which is the boundary of Egypt (see the following verse). This expression denotes the several dispersions of the Jews, in the latter times (consider and compare Ezek. xx. 31. 34. 38.
Amos ix. 8, 9).

[Unto the stream of Egypt.] The river of Egypt is to be distinguished from the Nile; it riseth out of mount Paran, and takes its course toward Rhinoccorra" (so the LXX. translates it here, see "Seraphim-ver"); and from thence falls into the Mediterranean
CHAPTER XXVIII.

that the Lord shall beat off from the channel of the river unto the stream of Egypt, and ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel. 13 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the great trumpet shall be blown, and they shall sea. See Gen. xv. 18. Josh. xv. 47. 1 Kings viii. 65.]

Ye shall be gathered one by one.] Each man of you, none of you shall be left behind, or neglected (see the note on liv. 7).

Ver. 13. The great trumpet shall be blown.] A general alarm or summons shall be given. Compare Matt. xxiv. 31; which place some understand of this very restoration of the Jews the prophet here speaks of. The expression is taken from the use of trumpets come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, and the outcasts in the land of Egypt, and shall worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem.

under the law, which was to assemble the congregation together (see Numb. x. 22. Jer. iv. 5. Joel ii. 19), or it may allude to the loud voice of the trumpet which summoned all Israel at mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 19).

And shall worship the Lord in the holy mount.] They shall be joined to the true worshippers of God, and serve him in his church (compare ii. 3. xi. 9. xxi. 23. xxv. 6. 7, 10, and see the note on xix. 19).

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 Wo to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower, which are on the head of the fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine! 2 Behold, the Lord hath a mighty and strong one, which as a tempest of hail and a destroying storm, as a flood of mighty waters overflowing, shall cast down to the earth with the hand. 3 The crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim, shall be trodden under feet; 4 And the glorious beauty, which is on the head of the fat valley, shall be a fading flower, and as the hasty fruit before the summer; which when he that looketh upon it seeth, while it is yet in his hand he eateth it up. 5 ¶ In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people, 6 And for a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment, and for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate. 7 ¶ But they also have erred through wine, was built on a hill (see 1 Kings xvi. 21), having a very rich valley under it.

Ver. 2. The Lord hath a mighty and strong one, which as a tempest of hail, &c. Under these resemblances the prophet represents Shalmaneser the king of Assyria, who should carry the ten tribes away captive, and make an utter destruction of that kingdom. God's severe judgments are often set forth under the emblems of storms and tempests, which are the artillery of heaven (see xxix. 2. xxx. 30. Ezek. xiii. 11. Rev. xvi. 21). Shall cast down to the earth with the hand.] That is, with great force, as when an earthen vessel is dashed to pieces against the ground.

Ver. 4. As the hasty fruit before the summer.] Or, "as the first ripe fruit [which comes] before the other summer-fruits;" for so the word kaita often signifies, and is translated so by our interpreters, xvi. 9 of this prophecy, Jer. xii. 10. 12. xliii. 20. Amos viii. 1, 2. The Hebrew hiccarah properly signifies the first ripe fruits, and is here translated by the Septuagint, in conjunction with kaita, πρόφθοραν σφιγγον, the first ripe fig. the Greek word πρόφθοραν being a term used by those who write about trees and fruit, for the first ripe figs, as Athenæus shows out of Dioscorides, Deipnosophist, lib. iii. and Pliny Nat. Hist. lib. xvi. cap. 28, and Hesychius explains πρόφθοραν, by προφτοφρησα ακτοια, where the printed copies corruptly read προφρησα. Most people are very fond of early ripe fruit, and devour it greedily (see Hes. ix. 10). So shall the Assyrians serve the Israelites.

Ver. 5.] God will then be the glory and protection of the two remaining tribes of Judah and Benjamin; he will raise up king Hezekiah for their defence, and signally protect him against his enemies.

Ver. 6. For a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment.] The same God will direct the king, when he sits upon the judgment seat, to administer and through strong drink are out of the way; the priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment.

9 Whom shall he teach knowledge? and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts.

10 For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little:

justice impartially to all his subjects (compare Prov. xx. 8).

For strength to them that turn the battle to the gate.] Or, "that return the battle to the gate;" that turn it back upon their enemies, and pursue them in the gates of their own cities (see 1 Sam. xvii. 52).

Ver. 7.] The sins of excess are as notorious among the remaining two tribes, as they were in those that are carried away captive: and even among the priests and prophets, persons more immediately dedicated to God's service; although the priests were forbidden so much as to drink wine, during the time of their ministration, that they might more exactly determine between what is holy and unholy, and between clean and unclean (Lev. xix. 7).

Ver. 9.] The prophet here, as elsewhere, upbraids the people's profound ignorance and careless neglect of instructions (see vi. 9, 10. xix. 10, 11). If the teachers, saith he, were never so well qualified to instruct, there are none that will learn: they that are grown to years of discretion, are but children in respect of religious knowledge, and it is to as little purpose to undertake the instructing of this people, as it would be to teach infants that are but just weaned.

Ver. 10.] You must frame your instructions, as if you were to deal with children, repeat the same thing over and over again, and instil good principles into them by easy and gentle degrees, as they are able to bear.

Ver. 11.] The first word, or particle, ki, were better rendered therefore, which interpretation gives the words this turn: God hath dealt with this people as with children; and as nurses teach them to speak by lisping and stammering like them; so he hath condescended to the lowest rudiments of instruction, and hath "fed them with milk, and not with strong meat." But since all this is to no purpose, therefore now he will take a new course with them; he will send other sorts of smarmers among them, viz. the Assyrians and Chaldeans, whose language they understand not, and they shall instruct them by blows and corrections. This is a great aggravation of the miseries that attend a foreign conquest, that there is no more treating or treating with such conquered, nor any moving him to compassion, because they understand not each other's language: accordingly this is threatened as one of the sorest judgments God can send upon a people (Deut. xxviii. 49. Jer. v. 15).

That this is the true meaning of this verse, appears by St. Paul's applying of it to the speaking in an unknown tongue (1 Cor. xiv. 21, 22), and by the use of the Hebrew hang, translated stammering, which is applied to a foreign language, xxxiii. 19 (see the note upon that place).

Ver. 12.] God often admonished this people by his prophets, that his word, and the promises of it, were the only thing that could give true comfort to those that were under any pressure or trouble (see 1. Matt. xii. 28), but they would not hearken to his advice.

Ver. 13. But the word of the Lord was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken.

Ver. 14. Wherefore hear the word of the Lord, ye scorful men, that rule this people which is in Jerusalem.

15 Because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourg"e shall pass through, it shall not come unto us: for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves:

16 ¶ Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation: be that believeth shall not make haste.

17 Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet: and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding place.

18 ¶ And your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourg shall Christ, to whom it is often applied in the New Testament. But it may import thus much, with respect to the time wherein Isaiah lived, that he should never be disappend, who believes in God, whose dwelling is in Zion, and hath made peculiar promises to the Jewish church and kingdom seated there, which shall eminently be fulfilled at the coming of the Messiah, in whom all God's promises made to his people shall receive their final accomplishment.

He that believeth shall not make haste. He that believes God's promises made to his faithful servants, will patiently depend upon God, and not out of distrust of his mercy betake himself to any unlawful means of securing himself, as many did (ver. 15). The sense is, that instead of running to Zion, read, "shall not be ashamed," which makes some think that they read jachish, in the Hebrew, instead of jackish, which is the reading of the present Hebrew copies. But our learned Dr. Pocock has shown that the verb chush still signifies to be ashamed in the Arabic tongue; which makes it probable, that it was formerly used in the same sense in the Hebrew (see his pamphlet on the Agree. of Pepera Mosios, cap. i. 10). In the same sense the verb chush is probably taken, Job. xx. 2, where our English renders the place, "For this I make haste;" but the sense would run much better if it were translated, "for this I am troubled or confounded." Capellus, who would fain suspect the present reading of the Hebrew copy, did not consider that the copies in the son of Sirach's time, read as ours do now, as appears from those words of his (Eccles. ii. 2), "Make not haste in the time of trouble;" which sentence certainly alludes to this text, taking the Hebrew chush in its usual signification.

Ver. 17.] Judgment also will I lay to the line.] The prophet carries on the metaphor of building, and tells those sinners, that God would square his actions by the severest rules of justice, as they should find to their cost.

And the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies. God's judgments, like a storm of rain and hail (see ver. 2. 15), shall destroy all that security in which you place your trust.

Ver. 18. Your covenant with death.] See ver. 15.

Ver. 19. From the time that it goeth forth it shall take you, &c.] The prophet still persists in the metaphor of an inundation, which seizes immediately without giving any warning, and carries all before it without intermission.

Ver. 19. shall be a vexation only to understand the report.] The words may be better translated thus, "And nothing but vexation can make you understand, and that to be vexation only to understand the report."

A consumption, even determined upon the whole earth.] Or rather, the "whole land" (see x. 23). The prophet had, in the beginning of the chapter, foretold the destruction of the ten tribes: and here he disconnects the like judgment upon the two tribes remaining.
23 5 Give ye ear, and hear my voice; hearken, and hear my speech.

24 Doth the plowman plow all day to sow? doth he awake and break the clods of his ground?

25 When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat and the appointed barley and the rye in their place?

26 For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him.

27 For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten off with a staff; and the cummin with a rod.

28 Bread corn is bruised; because he will not ever be threshing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen.

29 This also cometh forth from the Lord of hosts which is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working.

Ver. 23.] The design of the ensuing parable is to show, that as a husbandman hath his set times and methods of manuring the ground, and ordering his grain when it is brought into the barn: so God hath his seasons of mercy and judgment; and even in inflicting judgments he deals in different measures with the righteous and the wicked: he chastiseth the former in order to his amendment, and punishes the latter to his utter destruction.

Ver. 24. Doth the ploughman plow all day to sow? Or, as the words may better be rendered, Doth the ploughman plough every day to sow? Doth he open and break the clods of his ground?* It is there a time not for harrow ing and sowing too!* which are described in the following verse.

Ver. 26. For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten off with a staff; and the cummin with a rod.

CHAP. XXIX.

1 Wo to Ariel, to Ariel, the city where David dwelt! add ye year to year; let them kill sacrifices.

Yet I will distress Ariel, and there shall be heaviness and sorrow: and it shall be unto me as Ariel.

Ariel signifies the lion of God, and was the name of the altar, because it devoured the sacrifices which were offered upon it (see Ezek. xliii. 15). Here it is, by a synecdoche, put for the city of Jerusalem, which David made the seat of the kingdom, and where God, for David’s sake, promised to place his name (see 1 Kings xv. 4). And yet, for the people’s sins, God was now resolved to expose it to the assaults of Sennacherib and his army. Some render the latter part of the sentence thus, The city which David besieged (in which sense of the verb chasah is taken, ver. 3), implying, that the enemy should distress it in the same manner.

Add ye one year to another; let them kill sacrifices. The former part of the sentence may be better translated to this sense, “Add ye one year to another:” as if the prophet had said, For two years you may have liberty to come and offer your sacrifices at the temple, but afterward the city will be so closely besieged, that there will be no admittance for any that live in the country to attend upon the public worship of God at 3 And I will camp against thee round about, and will lay siege against thee with a mount, and I will raise forts against thee.

4 And thou shalt be brought down, and shalt speak out of the ground, and thy speech shall be low out of the dust, and thy voice shall be, as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper out of the dust.

5 Moreover the multitude of thy strangers shall be like small dust, and the multitude of the terrible ones shall be as chaff that passeth away: yea, it shall be at an instant suddenly.

6 Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of hosts with thunder, and with earthquake, and great noise, with storm and tempest, and the flame of devouring fire.

7 And the multitude of all the nations that fight against Ariel, even all that fight against her and her munition, and that distress her, shall be as a dream of a night vision.

the solemn festivals. Then another sort of sacrifices will be offered; concerning which see the following note.

Ver. 3.] When the city is closely besieged and distressed, it shall resemble the altar of burnt-offerings, being every way surrounded with carcases, not of beasts, but of men. The slaughter of men is sometimes called a sacrifice, because it makes some kind of satisfaction and atonement to the justice of God (see xxxiv. Ezek. xxxix. 17. Zeph. i. 7).

Ver. 4.] Mr. White very well observes, that this verse must be understood of the army under Tarchan, Rab-saris, and Rab-shakeh, whom the king of Assyria "sent with a great host against Jerusalem" (2 Kings xvii. 17. xix. 8, 9), intending himself to follow in person, and have the honour of taking the city: but, upon the defeat of that army by a stroke from heaven, he returned homeward without ever making any approach to the city by way of assault (see xxxvii. 33. 34. 37).

Ver. 4. Thou shalt be brought down, &c.] Thou shalt be very humble, and thy king Hezekiah shall send ambassadors to bespeak the favour of the king of Assyria in very submissive terms (see 2 Kings xviii. 14).

[Thy voice shall be.] See note on viii. 19.

Ver. 5.] Strangers and terrible ones are joined here together, as they are xxv. 4. Here they signify the Assyrian army, which, though they made such a dreadful appearance, the prophet foretells they shall be defeated by a sudden stroke from heaven, and vanish in an instant; one hundred and eighty-five thousand being destroyed in one night, xxxvi. 36 (compare xviii. 13).

Ver. 6.] The prophet, applying himself to Jerusalem, calls the army which besieged it, "Thy army," ver. 5, and by the same figure we may understand the words here, "Thou shalt be visited," of the same army, to which he threatens utter destruction in this and the following verses, and that from the immediate hand of God (see the notes on xxviii. 2, and compare xxx. 30. Ps. xviii. 13, 14). Some render the beginning of the sentence thus, "It shall be visited;" and explains the words of the "multitude of strangers," mentioned ver. 5, but the rules of syntax will hardly allow that construction, because the verb taken in the third person will be of the feminine gender, and that noun is of the masculine.

8 It shall be even as when a hungry man dreameth, and, behold, he eateth; but he awakeeth, and his soul is empty: or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and, behold, he drinketh; but he awakeeth, and, behold, he is faint, and his soul hath appetite: so shall the multitude of all the nations be, that fight against mount Zion.

9 ¶ Stay yourselves, and wonder; cry ye out, and cry: they are drunken, but not with wine; they stagger, but not with strong drink.

10 For the Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes: the prophets and your rulers, the seers hath he covered.

11 And the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed:

12 And the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I am not learned.

13 ¶ Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honour me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men:

14 Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people, even a marvellous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid.

15 Wo unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord, and their works are in the dark, and they say, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us?

16 Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter's clay: for shall the work say of him that made it, He made me not? or shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?

which none but the Lamb could open:" that is, unfold or explain (ver. 5). See likewise viii. 16 of this prophecy.

Which men deliver to one that is learned, &c.] Prejudice doth so much hinder the learned from understanding God's word, as ignorance doth the unlearned.

Ver. 13.] One fatal mistake of the Jews, and that which led them into many others, was, that they confined the whole business of religion to the external worship of God, such as sacrifice and other outward ceremonies (see i. 11, &c.). And these religious performances they looked upon as so acceptable to God, that these alone would secure his favour to them, and so long as they were punctual in these observances, they thought they needed not to fear any threatenings denounced against their sins. This opinion, together with their relying upon an external obedience to the letter of the law, and over-valuing the traditions of their rabbies and elders, was a principal cause of their rejecting his gospel, and being themselves rejected by God upon that account.

Ver. 14.] I will proceed to do a marvellous work.] A thing least to be believed (compare Hab. i. 5).

For the wisdom of their wise men shall perish.] The most refined arts of their deep politicians shall not avail their authors, nor he able to preserve them from God's judgments; and their most learned shall lose their judgment and discretion. This threatening was remarkably verified under the gospel, when their crucifying Christ out of fear of the Roman power, brought the Romans upon them: and their learned rabbies ever since have minded little else but fabulous stories, and their cabalists have vented trilles for profound mysteries.

Ver. 15.] Who think they can carry on their projects without the knowledge or interpos of Providence?

Ver. 16.] Your giving things unexpected turns, or false appearances, to hide your true designs, shall signify no more towards the producing the intended effects, than the clay does without the artificer. We and all our works are in the hands of God, as clay is in the hand of the potter, to give what form and fashion he list (see xiv. 9, Jer. xviii. 6). He is as wise as the wisest politician (see xxxi. 2), and when the finest schemes are laid, can work things to a quite contrary end.

Ver. 17. Is it not yet a very little while.] The following promises relate to the times of the gospel (see the note on ver. 18, 23). Nor is this expression any objection against such an interpretation, for the very same is used concerning Christ's coming to judgment, as if it were just at hand, Heb. x. 27.

The fruitful field shall be esteemed as a forest.] A proverbial form of speech, to signify the great changes that shall happen: the high ones shall be blasted, and the meek shall be exalted (compare xxxii. 15): as visible an alteration, as if the mountain Lebanon, famous for its cedars, should be turned into a cornfield or pasture; and the richest meadow-ground should be turned into a forest.

Ver. 18.] That blindness and insensibility, which the prophet complained of at the tenth and eleventh verses, shall be quite removed, and the word of God, which before was a book sealed up, shall become intelligible to ordinary capacities. This relates to the times of the gospel (compare xxxiv. 5), when a plentiful effusion of God's Holy Spirit is promised (see the note on xlv. 3, iv. 13).

Ver. 19.] This is another character of those flourishing dispensations under the gospel; which the prophets often mention, in the glorious of which the meek and humble shall have a particular share (see the notes on xi. 3, xxvi. 6).

Ver. 20.] By the "terrible ones" we are to understand the foreign enemies of God's people (see ver. 5, and xxvi. 4, 5): and by the scorners, those sceptics and infidels that lived among them, and made a mock of God's messengers, and what they said (compare xxxvii. 14, 92).

All that watch for iniquity are cut off.] Who are continually employed in devising evil, and very industrious in bringing it to pass: "Who devise iniquity upon their beds? when the morning is light they practise it," as the prophet Micah speaks (Mic. ii. 1).

Ver. 21.] That make a man an offender for a word.] Who condemn men for speaking the truth, as they often served the prophets, or for so slight a matter as an unwary expression.

And lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate.] Who punish the judges that sit at the city gates to distribute justice; that so they may without control oppress the righteous, and deprive him of his right (compare Amos v. 10, Mal. iii. 5).

And this they will do upon the meanest considerations
CHAPTER XXX.

sancitify my name, and sanctify the Holy One of Jacob, and shall fear the God of Israel.

24 They also that erred in spirit shall come to to gain a piece of bread, as Solomon speaks (Prov. xxviii. 21). It was the custom for the judges to execute their office at the gates of the city (see Deut. xxi. 19, xxii. 15, Ruth iv. 1, 11).

Ver. 22.] Abraham and Jacob, as fathers of the family, are taken here for the whole stock of true Israelites: and as God had often been their deliverer, so when he should free them from enemies without and evil-doers amongst themselves (see ver. 20), then the right time had arrived for the unrevealed. For their understanding, and that they that murmured shall learn doctrine.

shall be added to the church, called elsewhere the "work of God's hands" (see xliv. 11, lx. 21, and compare Eph. ii. 19). When these shall be called or regenerated by that extraordinary measure of grace which is promised, ver. 18, they shall with one mind and one mouth sanctify my name, and give me all honour and reverence.

Ver. 24. They also that erred in spirit] See xxviii. 7, and the tenth, eleventh, and eighteenth verses of this chapter.

They that murmured shall learn doctrine. They that murmured at, and found fault with God's dispensations, shall now submit their own judgment to the will and wisdom of God.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 Wo to the rebellious children, saith the Lord, that take counsel, but not of me; and that cover with a covering, but not of my spirit, that they may add sin to sin:

2 That walk to go down into Egypt, and have not asked at my mouth; to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt!

3 Therefore shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion.

4 For his princes were at Zoan, and his ambassadors came to Hanes.

CHAP. XXX.

ARGUMENT.—The Egyptians were the Jews' confederates at the time of Sennacherib's invasion (see 2 Kings xviii. 21): and are often reproved for that confederacy, and placing their chief trust in an arm of flesh (see xx. 5, xxxi. 1). This is the subject of the former part of this chapter. Then follow some gracious promises, which have a plain aspect upon the gospel times: and from the twenty-seventh verse to the end of the chapter, there is a lively description of God's vengeance devouring the Assyrian army like fire, and consuming them all at once.

VER. 1. That cover with a covering, but not of my spirit.] This covering may either signify their seeking for refuge and protection from Egypt without any directions from God (see ver. 2): or else it may mean their forming schemes to secure themselves against the calamities that threatened them, by unholy methods, which are called a "covering" or "hiding place of falsehood," xxviii. 15, 17 (see likewise xxix. 13).

That they may add sin to sin.] Thereby adding this iniquity to their former transgressions.

VER. 2.] It was usual in affairs of great consequence, especially in matters of war, to ask counsel from God by his prophets (see Josh. ix. 4, 1 Kings xxvii. 7, Jer. xxi. 2). This the Jews neglected now, because they apprehended that the prophets would not give them such an answer as they liked (see ver. 16, and the argument of the chapter).

5 They were all ashamed of a people that could not profit them, nor be a help nor profit, but a shame, and also a reproach.

6 The burden of the beasts of the south: into the land of trouble and anguish, from whence come the young and old lion, the viper and fiery flying serpent, they will carry their riches upon the shoulders of young asses, and their treasures upon the backs of camels, to a people that shall not profit them.

7 For the Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose: therefore have I cried concerning this, Their strength is to sit still.

VER. 3.] See xx. 5, xxxi. 3.

VER. 4.] King Hezekiah's ambassadors came to apply themselves to the king of Egypt and his great men, for succour and assistance; to which purpose they arrived at the two principal cities of Egypt, Zoan, or Tanis (concerning which, see note on xix. 11), and Hanes, called Tahapanes, Jer. ii. 16. xiii. 7, Ezek. xxx. 18.

VER. 5.] The Egyptians, in conjunction with the Ethiopians, did assist the Jews, by giving a diversion to Sennacherib's forces (see the arguments of the seventeenth and nineteenth chapters): but were both entirely routed (see xx. 4): so that, in effect, the Egyptians were rather a burden than a help to them, and are therefore compared to a broken reed (xxxvi. 6), which not only fails the hand that leans upon it, but pieces and wounds it.

VER. 6.] The burden of the beasts of the south.] The word burden hath an ambiguous sense: for, besides its usual signification, it denotes likewise a flattering prophecy: so the words imply, that the burdens of presents, which the Jews sent upon the backs of asses and camels, to make friends with all in Egypt (a country lying southward of Judea), should meet with but little success.

From whence come—the viper and fiery flying serpent.] The wildeness that lies between Egypt and Judea, is described after the same manner by Moses (Deut. viii. 15). The fiery serpent is called, in the Hebrew, seraph, and hath its name from its bright and flaming colour: for the same reason the angels are called seraphims, because when they attended upon the divine Shechinah, they appeared like flames of 8 ¶ Now go, write it before them in a table, and note it in a book, that it may be for the time to come for ever and ever:

9 That this is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the law of the Lord:

10 Which say to the seers, See not; and to the prophets, Prophesy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things, prophesy deceits:

11 Get you out of the way, turn aside out of the path, cause the Holy One of Israel to cease from before us.

12 Wherefore thus saith the Holy One of Israel, Because ye despise this word, and trust in oppression and perverseness, and stay thereon;

13 Therefore this iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall, swelling out in a high wall, whose breaking cometh suddenly at an instant:

14 And he shall break it as the breaking of the potters' vessel that is broken in pieces; he shall not spare: so that there shall not be found in the bursting of it a sherd to take fire from the hearth, or to take water withal out of the pit.

15 For thus saith the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel; In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength: and ye would not.

16 But ye said, No; for we will flee upon horses; therefore shall ye flee: and, We will ride upon the swift; therefore shall they that pursue you be swift.

17 One thousand shall fall at the rebuke of one; at the rebuke of five shall ye flee: till ye be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain, and as an ensign on a hill.

18 ¶ And therefore will the Lord wait, that he may be gracious unto you; and therefore will he be exalted, that he may have mercy upon you: for the Lord is a God of judgment: blessed are all they that wait for him.

Vang. uters a further threatening to those that despise what he now speaks from God.

Ver. 13. This vain confidence in your own conduct, or in the strength of Egypt, shall end in a sudden and final ruin: like the breach in a high wall, which, when it begins to bulge, falls down without giving any warning, and the higher it is, the greater the downfall.

Ver. 14. An earthen vessel, when it is once broken, can never be mended, or put to any use (see Jer. xiv. 11). So it shall be in this case, there shall be nothing left or saved, that can be put to any further use.

Ver. 15. In returning from your evil purposes, and resting or relying upon God's promises, you shall be saved from your enemies (see ver. 7).

Ver. 16. Egypt was famous for their breed of horses (see note on li. 7): from whence the Jews were desirous to furnish themselves with horses, the better to engage the enemy (see xxxvi. 9). But the prophet tells them, that the chief use they should make of them would be to serve themselves a retreat.

Ver. 17. One thousand shall fall at the rebuke of one. As God had promised them, that if they continued obedient to him "one of them should chase a thousand" of their enemies (Deut. xxxii. 39); so here he threatens the quite contrary upon their disobedience (see Deut. xxviii. 25).

Till ye be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain. Till ye be scattered one by one upon the mountains, as beacons stand solitary there.

Ver. 18. Therefore will the Lord wait. The sense would run clearer, if the place were translated thus, "Nevertheless the Lord will wait;" or "yet surely the Lord will wait," &c. So the particle laken is rendered by our interpreters, Jer. v. 2, and so it should be translated in several other places where the prophets alter their style, and yet usher in the translation with this particle: so particularly it should be translated Hos. ii. 14, and Mic. v. 3, (see Dr. Pocock upon that place). The seeming incoherence of the prophetic style would be avoided in many places, by regarding the various sense of the Hebrew particle more carefully than interpreters have generally done; a subject that hath been treated of with great exactness by Noldius, in his Concordantia Particularum Hebraearum.

That he may be gracious unto you. God will wait till the judgments he hath threatened (ver. 15, 16)
CHAPTER XXX.

19 For the people shall dwell in Zion at Jerusalem: thou shalt weep no more: he will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry; when he shall hear it, he will answer thee.

20 And though the Lord give thee the bread of adversity, and the water of affliction, yet shall not thy teachers be removed into a corner any more, but thine eyes shall see thy teachers:

21 And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left.

22 Ye shall cast also the covering of thy graven images of silver, and the ornament of thy molten images of gold: thou shalt cast them away as a menstrual cloth; thou shalt say unto it, Get thee hence.

23 Then shall he give the rain of thy seed, that thou shalt sow the ground withal; and bread of the increase of the earth, and it shall be fat and plenteous: in that day shall thy cattle feed in large pastures.

24 The oxen likewise and the young asses that car the ground shall eat clean provender, which hath been winnowed with the shovel and with the fan.

25 And there shall be upon every high mountain, and upon every high hill, rivers and streams of waters in the day of the great slaughter, when the towers fall.

When ye turn to the right hand.] When ye are never so little out of the way (compare Deut. v. 32. Josh. i. 7. Prov. iv. 27).

Ver. 22.] Hezekiah's zeal for God's worship, incited his subjects to destroy all the monuments of idolatry in the land (see 2 Chron. xxix. 1). The coverings here mentioned may be understood of silver or gold plates, with which their images were overlaid; though the more usual place was in the temple, on the high places, and rich attire (see Jer. x. 9. Baruch vi. 57, 59). The destruction of idolatry is another mark of the flourishing state of the gospel (see the notes on i. 29).

Ver. 25. Then shall be upon every high mountain, and upon every high hill, rivers.] God's blessings are sometimes represented under the emblems of fruitfulness and plenty (see notes on iv. 2. xxxi. 20).

Ver. 29. This place I take to be parallel to that text (xlii. 5). "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed," &c. (compare likewise xxxiv. 6. 7. xlii. 18. xliii. 19. lv. 1. Joel iii. 18. Zech. xiv. 8). Mr. White is pleased to call this a strange sort of interpretation; but I must put him in mind, that it is the interpretation of Christ himself (see John iv. 10. 14. vili. 28, 29); and of St. Paul, who interprets the "waters flowing from the rock" in the wilderness, as mystically denoting Christ, and the benefits of the gospel (1 Cor. x. 4). And that plentiful communication of grace and glory, when the happiness of heaven consists, is described by the same metaphor, Rev. vii. 9. 17.

In the day of the great slaughter, when the towers fall. This shall be remarkably fulfilled at the time when there shall be a terrible destruction of God's enemies (see Rev. xiv. 20. xix. 21): when the great
ISAIAH.

26 Moreover the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound.

27 Behold, the name of the Lord cometh from far, burning with his anger, and the burden thereof is heavy: his lips are full of indignation, and his tongue as a devouring fire:

28 And his breath, as an overflowing stream, shall reach to the midst of the neck, to sift the nations with the sieve of vanity: and there shall be a bridle in the jaws of the people, causing them to err.

29 Ye shall have a song, as in the night when ones of the earth shall fall, denoted here by high towers (compare ii. 15): or, by towers, we may understand the fortifications of the city, which is the mystical Babylon (see the notes on xxvi. 5).

Ver. 26. The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun. &c.] Light is the emblem of joy and happiness: accordingly, happy times are expressed by bright and pleasant days, when God's candle shines upon our heads," as Job expresseth it xxi. 3. But the words seem to describe that glorious state of the church, when there shall be no night (see Zech. xiv. 6, 7, compared with Rev. xxii. 5); nor any resemblance of it, no degree either of sorrow or ignorance.

In the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people,] When he shall fully pardon their sins, and remove the punishments of them (compare i. 6).

Ver. 27. The name of the Lord cometh from far.] The name of God is the same with God himself, and it is said to come from afar off, as coming unexpectedly. So Christ is described as coming "from a far country" at the day of judgment, because of the unexpectedness of his coming, Luke xix. 13. 15. Buring with his anger.] When anger or any other passion is ascribed to God in scripture, it is a very good rule which the schoolmen give for the explaining such expressions, affectus in Deo denotantia effectus; passions in God denote that the effect is answerable to the highest emotion of passion which we can conceive." Thus, when God is described as full of anger and fury, and his indignation as flaming out into revenge, we are to conceive the expressions as implying, that the effects of his displeasure will be as terrible as we could suppose them to be if they proceeded from the most passionate resentment. But I think we may carry our notions a little further in this matter, and venture to affirm, that since God's love and hatred do necessarily result from his wisdom, which improves or dislikes things according as they agree or disagree with his own infinite perfections, it must follow from hence, that although God be not subject to that turbulency and inconstancy which attend human passions, yet his favour and aversion must be as strong and powerful as his wisdom and permanency, as the highest expressions in scripture concerning this matter can be supposed to import.

His lips are full of indignation.] So Christ is described as consuming sinners with the breath of his lips (xli. 4), because, whenever he pronounces sentence upon them, it is immediately put in execution: all things observed in his word and decree (see the note there).

Ver. 28. His breath, as an overflowing stream.] God's anger is often called the breath of his nostrils (see Job iv. 19. Ps. xviii. 15). The expression is a holy solemnity is kept; and gladness of heart, as when one goeth with a pipe to come into the mountain of the Lord, to the mighty One of Israel.

30 And the Lord shall cause his glorious voice to be heard, and shall shew the lighting down of his arm, with the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire, with scattering, and tempest, and hailstones.

31 For through the voice of the Lord shall the Assyrian be beaten down, which smote with a rod.

32 And in every place where the grounded staff shall pass, which the Lord shall lay upon him, it shall be with tabrets and harps: and in battles of shaking will he fight with it.

Taken one from of the symptoms of anger, which is breathing quick and short.

The midst of the neck,] See the note on viii. 8. To sift the nations with the sieve of vanity:] Vanity sometimes signifies destruction: so, liv. 13, "vanity shall take them; i.e. they shall be destroyed. And here the "sieve of vanity" is such a one as doth not separate the chaff in order to save the corn, but makes an entire riddance, as when chaff is scattered before the wind (compare xxix. 4. Hos. xiii. 3. Ps. i. 4). By the nations are chiefly meant the Assyrians and their confederates.

There shall be a bridle in the jaws of the people.] See the same phrase xxxvii. 29. In both places the expression implies that God would stop these people in the midst of their career, and make all their designs prove abortive, like those that miss their aim, or lose their way.

Ver. 29. Ye shall have a song, as in the night when a holy solemnity is kept:] The Jewish festivals were always kept from even to even; so the sábado began on the Friday evening (see Lev. xxiii. 39); and the eve before any festival was part of the festival (see Judith viii. 6); from whence the same observation was derived into the Christian church. But the feast of the passover is chiefly alluded to here, which was always kept in the evening, and the upper concluded with hymns (see Matt. xxvi. 30).

As when one goeth with a pipe to come into the mountains of the Lord] The Aramaic festivals, when the people came from all parts of Judea to worship at the temple, were observed with the greatest expressions of joy (see Deut. xvi. 11. 14. Ps. xiii. 4). Such joy will there be, saith the text, at Jerusalem, for their deliverance from Sennacherib's army.

Ver. 30.] This destruction shall be from the immediate hand of God, in which he shall as visibly appear as if he had discomfitted the army by a tempest of thunder, and lightning, and hailstones, as he formerly destroyed the Canaanites and Philistines (see Josh. x. 10. 1 Sam. vii. 10. compare likewise Ps. xliii. 14. xxix. 6). of this prophecy, and see the note on that place.

Ver. 31. Compare x. 5. 21.

Ver. 32. In every place where the grounded staff shall pass— it shall be with tabrets and harps:] This is a very obscure translation of the words; the old translation published under king Henry VIII. renders them much plainer, thus, "Whithersoever he goes, the rod shall cleave unto him, which the Lord shall lay upon him." Or the place may be understood more exactly to the Hebrew, "And every place where the terrible stroke shall pass which the Lord shall lay upon him, shall be [filled] (or shall sound) with ta-
CHAPTER XXXI.

1 Wo to them that go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are very strong; but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord!

2 Yet he also is wise, and will bring evil, and will not call back his words: but will array against the house of the evildoers, and against the help of them that work iniquity.

3 Now the Egyptians are men, and not God; and their horses flesh, and not spirit. When the Lord shall stretch out his hand, both he that helpeth shall fall, and he that is holpen shall fall down, and they all shall fail together.

4 For thus hath the Lord spoken unto me, Like as the lion and the young lion roaring on his prey, when a multitude of shepherds is called forth against him, he will not be afraid of their voice, nor abase himself for the noise of them: so shall the Lord of hosts come down to fight for mount Zion, and for the hill thereof.

of the text is, that nothing extraordinary is to be expected from the Egyptian auxiliaries. Both he that helpeth shall fall, and he that is holpen.

Both the Egyptians and they that rely upon their aid (compare xx. 4-6. 2 Kings xviii. 15).

Ver. 4.] An elegant similitude, representing God's almighty power, which no human strength is able to withstand; and exactly parallel to those verses in Homer, where Sarpedon is described as going against the Greeks (liad i. ver. 299, &c.).

Which verses are thus rendered in the late English translation copied from the French: As some fierce lion on the mountains bred, Stung with keen hunger, searches for his prey, Springs o'er the fences, and o'erleaps the fold: For though the shepherds and the watchful dogs On every side defend the woolly flock; Yet his undaunted soul disdains to fly, Till he hath seized his prey.
5 As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem; defending also he will deliver it; and passing over he will preserve it.

6 ¶ Turn ye unto him from whom the children of Israel have deeply revolted.

7 For in that day every man shall cast away his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which your own hands have made unto you for a sin.

8 ¶ Then shall the Assyrian fall with the sword, not of a mighty man; and the sword, not of a mean man, shall devour him: but he shall flee from the sword, and his young men shall be discomfited.

9 And he shall pass over to his strong hold for fear, and his princes shall be afraid of the ensign, saith the Lord, whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem.

Ver. 5. As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem: [God's protection of his servants is commonly expressed by "covering them under his wings," in allusion to the wings of the cherubims which covered the mercy-seat (compare Deut. xxxii. 11).]

Passing over he will preserve it.] As he did when he passed over the Israelites' houses in Egypt (Exod. xii. 23.)

Ver. 7.] See the note on xxx. 22.

Ver. 8. Then shall the Assyrian fall with the sword, not of a mighty man, &c. [He shall not fall by any mortal power, but by the hand of an angel (see xxxvii. 36). If we follow the common opinion, that the Assyrian army was destroyed by a pestilential disease, which was the immediate stroke of heaven; the expressions here exactly agree with the description of the angel, who smote the Jews with a pestilence, 1 Chron. xxi. who is there represented as standing with a "sword in his hand" (ver. 16).

His young men Or, "his choice men," as the word likewise signifies, the very flower of his army.

Ver. 9. He shall pass over to his strong hold for fear. [He shall betake himself to the fortified places within his own dominions, as those do who are afraid that an enemy is pursuing them (see xxxvii. 37).

His princes shall be afraid of the ensign. [His chief commander shall be afraid of those visible tokens of God's presence in, and protection over, Jerusalem, which were like so many standards lift up in defence of his people (compare lx. 19).

Whose fire is in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem.] Who hath placed his altar and his sanctuary there: and from thence will issue forth like fire, and consume all those who shall presume to violate that place of his especial presence (compare Obad. ver. 15. Zech. ii. 5. xii. 6).

CHAPTER XXXXII.

1 Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment.

2 And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

CHAP. XXXXII.

ARGUMENT.—Whosoever carefully considers the ninth, tenth, and following verses of this chapter, will find that they relate to the calamities which the Assyrian invasion brought upon Judah; under those afflictions the wisdom and piety of king Hezekiah was one of the chief supports and comforts to his subjects, and consequently we may suppose that the beginning of the chapter doth contain a character of that excellent prince. But yet there are several expressions, particularly those in the third and fourth verses, that relate to happier times than Hezekiah ever lived to enjoy: and therefore upon the whole matter we may justly say, that the reformation which Hezekiah made was but a shadow or image of those greater improvements in grace and holiness which properly belong to the gospel-times, under the government of Christ, and the assistance of his Spirit. Mr. White objects against this interpretation, that none of the writers of the New Testament have applied any part of this chapter to our Saviour; but we are not to expect a particular application of all the prophecies of the Old Testament in the writings of the New. And we may observe, that many important prophecies, such as are particularly Daniel's weeks, are never distinctly mentioned there. Jacob's prophecy concerning Shiloh (Gen. xlvi. 10), may be added as another remarkable instance of a prophecy concerning Christ, not mentioned in the New Testament. It is sufficient to justify such an interpretation, if the full import of the words look that way, and such an application be agreeable to those methods of interpreting prophecies which are observed in the New Testament: for those are to be looked upon as a public rule or standard for interpreting the scripture prophecies.

Ver. 1.] Under the government and example of so good a king as Hezekiah, inferior princes and magistrates shall execute their office with integrity and faithfulness (compare Ps. lxxii. 2. 3).

Ver. 2.] And this prince shall be a refuge to us when the storms of calamities overtake us, or the oppressions of our enemies, like excessive heat, doth consume us (compare iv. 6. xxv. 4).

Ver. 3.] God shall plentifully afford men the light of his truth, and give them grace to make a good use of the instructions he vouchsafo unto them. When men are stupid and careless, they are said, by a contrary way of speaking, "to have eyes and see not, and to have ears and hear not" (vi. 9. Jer. v. 24).

That this promise chiefly relates to the times of the gospel, will appear by comparing it with xix. 18. xxxv. 5). If it be objected that other prophecies foretell the binding of the Jews under the gospel; we may answer with St. Paul, that "the children of the promise are accounted" for the true seed of Israel, in whom the promises are to be fulfilled

3 And the eyes of them that see shall not be dim; and the ears of them that hear shall hearken.

4 The heart also of the rash shall understand knowledge, and the tongue of the stammerers shall be ready to speak plainly.
5 The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful.
6 For the vile person will speak villany, and his heart will work iniquity, to practise hypocrisy, and to utter error against the Lord, to make empty the soul of the hungry, and he will cause the drink of the thirsty to fail.
7 The instruments also of the churl are evil: he deviseth wicked devices to destroy the poor with lying words, even when the needy speaketh right.
8 But the liberal deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand.
9 ¶ Rise up, ye women that are at ease; hear my voice, ye careless daughters; give ear unto my speech.
10 Many days and years shall ye be troubled, (Rom. ix. 8), and farther, the same divine author assures us, the time will come when "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 20).

Ver. 4. The heart also of the rash shall understand knowledge. The word nunbarim, "rash," translated "foolish" xxxv. 4, may signify, that those that are weak in faith shall come to more perfect degrees of knowledge.

The tongue of the stammersers shall be ready to speak plainly.] The most rude and illiterate, such as could not speak so as to be understood, shall discourse clearly and intelligibly of God and of their duty. The verb naliq is near akin in sound and signification to lanag, which signifies speaking in a barbarous and unknown language, xxviii. 11. So the text here may be fully expounded of the conversion of barbarous nations, and their giving praises to God in their several languages.

Ver. 5. The vile person shall be no more called liberal.] or, "shall not have the style and title of prince bestowed upon him;" for so the words in the original import. Under a prince that loves and honours virtue, unworthy persons shall not be advanced to degrees of honour and dignity.

Ver. 6-8.] The words show the different temper and spirit of God and a good prince and narrow-souled man, and of him that is truly generous and public-spirited. The former hath no true sense, either of honour or conscience, but makes it his business, under specious pretences, to pervert judgment and justice: whereas the designs of the latter are truly great and worthy of his character, and it is by these only that he seeks to support his dignity.

Ver. 9.] The prophet returns to the description of those calamities which should follow upon Sennacherib's invasion: and he addresses himself to the nice and delicate women, who would feel the greatest share in these hardships, not being used to any such matters.

Ver. 10. Many days and years shall ye be troubled.] Some render the words, "days above a year shall ye be troubled," &c. and understand them of Sennacherib's invasion; who came up against Judea in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 13), and in the year following God promised the king a recovery from his sickness, and that he would deliver him out of the hand of the king of Assyria, and prolong his life fifteen years (2 Kings xx. 6). Now Hezekiah reigned but nine-and-twenty years in all, so this promise of deliverance must have been made in the fifteenth year of his reign. But Archbishop Usher supposes that there were two invasions by Sennacherib; the first mentioned 2 Kings xviii. 13, the ye careless women: for the vintage shall fail, the gathering shall not come.
11 Tremble, ye women that are at ease; be troubled, ye careless ones: strip you, and make you bare, and gird sackcloth upon your loins.
12 They shall lament for the teats, for the pleasant fields, for the fruitful vine.
13 Upon the land of my people shall come up thorns and briers; yea, upon all the houses of joy in the joyous city:
14 Because the palaces shall be forsaken; the multitude of the city shall be left; the forts and towers shall be for dens for ever, a joy of wild asses, a pasture of flocks;
15 Until the spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest.

other spoken of in the seventeenth verse of the same chapter, and xix. 9, and thinks that Hezekiah's sickness happened between these two invasions, about three years before the total defeat of the Assyrian army, (see Annal. V. Testim. ad. M. 3291, and 3294).

Ver. 12.] The sense would run easier and more agreeable to the original, if we alter the stops, and join the first sentence of this verse with what goes before, and the latter part of it with what follows, translating it thus, 'Gird sackcloth upon your loins, and upon your mourning breasts. Upon the pleasant fields, upon the fruitful vine, upon the land of my people, shall come up briers and thorns.' The word sophedim, which our English translates "they shall lament," is in the masculine gender, and therefore cannot be understood of the women mentioned ver. 11.

Ver. 13.] See the notes on xxii. 2. xxvii. 7.

Ver. 14. The palaces shall be forsaken.] See v. 9. The multitude of the city shall be left.] Or, "the city shall be forsaken of its multitude:" this may relate to Jerusalem; or else the word city may be taken collectively for cities in general (see xxiv. 10. 12. xxv. 2. xxvii. 10).

The forts and towers shall be for dens for ever, &c.] Expressions of the same sense (see xxii. 13. xxv. 2. xxvii. 10). For ever is as much as for a long time; and it may be extended to the present condition of Judea and its cities, which have now lain desolate for many ages (see the notes upon the following verses, and upon xxvii. 10).

Ver. 15. Until the spirit be poured upon us from on high.] Until God gives us new life, and recovers us out of this forlorn condition, which may fitly be compared to the shadow of death (compare Ps. civ. 30), "Pouring out of God's spirit" does likewise signify the plentiful effusion of his grace (see Joel ii. 28. Zech. xii. 10). And if we take the phrase in this sense, the prophecy will belong to that restoration of the Jews, which we are to expect in the latter ages of the world.

The wilderness be a fruitful field.] A proverbial expression denoting great alterations, that the places which were desolate before (see ver. 12), shall again become fruitful: and those which were fruitful shall turn barren. It may mean, that the Israelites shall flourish again, and the Assyrians and other enemies of the church (see note on xi. 14), shall be humbled: see an expression parallel to this, xxv. 17. only there the word Lebanon is used, as equivalent to the wilderness here; both words being opposed to grounds cultivated and managed by art and care.

Ver. 16.] Judgment and righteousness are often 16 Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness remain in the fruitful field.

17 And the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever.

18 And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places; and shall cease to spoil, and thou shalt not be spoiled; and dealt not treacherously with thee; when thou expressed by the forest, or wilderness (ver. 15, 16).

19 When it shall hail, coming down on the forest; and the city shall be low in a low place.

20 Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, that send forth fithur the feet of the ox and the ass.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

1 Wo to thee that spoilst, and thou wast not spoiled; and dealtst treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee! when thou under the immediate protection of the Almighty, and thereby secured from receiving the least damage in the midst of so many dangers. I have given so particular an account of the contents of this chapter, because I am persuaded, that if a translation could be made of it that should come up to the original, it would appear to be as noble a piece of poetry as is to be found among the most admired writings of the ancients.

Ver. 1. Wo to thee that spoilst, and thou wast not spoiled? It is the practice of the great oppressors of the world to make war upon their neighbours without any just provocation, or having received any real injury from them; this is very fitly expressed in the known fable of the lion and the lamb, and it is against such practices that this wo is denounced.

And dealtst treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee! We read, indeed (2 Kings xviii. 7), that Hezekiah "rebelled against the king of Assyria:" but the meaning of that text is no more but that he would not stand to those dishonourable terms of slavery to which his father Ahaz had submitted, when he professed himself the servant of the king of Assyria (2 Kings xvi. 7).
2 O Lord, be gracious unto us: we have waited for thee; be thou their arm every morning, our salvation also in the time of trouble.

3 At the noise of the tumult the people fled; at the lifting up of thyself the nations were scattered.

4 And your spoil shall be gathered like the gathering of the caterpillar: as the running to and fro of locusts shall he run upon them.

5 The Lord is exalted; for he dwelleth on high: he hath filled Zion with judgment and righteousness.

6 And wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times, and strength of salvation: the fear of the Lord is his treasure.

7 Behold, their valiant ones shall cry without: the ambassadors of peace shall weep bitterly,

8 The highways lie waste, the wayfaring man ceaseth: he hath broken the covenant, he hath despised the cities, he regardeth no man.

When thou shalt cease to spoil.] See xxii. 2.

Ver. 2. Be thou their arm every morning.] “Their arm,” i.e. our arm: it is usual in the prophets to change their style from the first to the second or third person, in speaking upon the same subject (see ver. 6 of this chapter, and the note upon xiii. 1). “Every morning,” or, “in the morning,” i.e. speedily; see the expression Ps. xlv. 5, “God shall help her, and that right early;” the Hebrew reads, “At the appearing of the morning” (so Ps. xc. 14, and exilii. 8). Some suppose that the phrase alludes to the overthrowing the Egyptians when the morning appeared, Exod. xiv. 37.

Ver. 3.] At the confusion and utter which was in the Assyrian army upon that sudden stroke, whereby a hundred and eighty-five thousand men were struck dead upon the place, the remaining part of those forces get away as fast as they could; this execution is called God’s lifting up himself, or exercising his power (compare ver. 10).

Ver. 4.] The Jews shall plunder the Assyrians’ camp, till they leave it as bare as the locusts or caterpillars leave the trees, when they have eaten up the leaves (compare Nah. iii. 15). Some explain the verse thus: ye shall be as easily overcome, as the husbandman destroys the locusts and caterpillars; but I do not think that sense so proper, because locusts and caterpillars are elsewhere described like a formidable army, which nothing can withstand (see Joel ii. 3, 4, &c.).

Ver. 5.] The prophet applies himself to Hezekiah of whom he speaks, in the third person, at the end of the chapter: and tells him, that those divine graces of wisdom, knowledge, and the fear of God (see xi. 2, 3), will be the support of his time and government, and stand him in more stead, than all the forces and treasure in which other princes place their confidence.

Ver. 7. Behold, their valiant ones [or messengers], shall cry without, &c.] Or, “shall cry in the streets.” The words describe the ambassadors, or messengers, which Hezekiah sent out to Rab-shakeh (2 Kings xviii. 18), returning sadly disappointed, with tears in their eyes, and “their clothes rent” (thid. ver. 37).

Ver. 8. The highways lie waste, the wayfaring man ceaseth.] There is no travelling the public roads for fear of the enemy (compare Judg. v. 6).

He hath broken the covenant.] Hezekiah bought peace of Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii. 14—16), but he would not stand to his agreement: such a haughty conqueror as he will not be obliged by his treaties any longer than he pleases, and glories in the destruction that he makes both of men and cities (see x. 10, 11).

Ver. 9. The earth [or land] mourneth and languisheth, &c.] The whole land is under a consternation, and the most ancient and fruitful parts of the country seem to languish and wither at the approach of the enemy, and look upon themselves as already destroyed. Lebanon was beautiful for its cedars: Sharon for its flowers and gardens (see Cant. ii. 1): Bashan and Carmel for their rich ground and fat pastures (compare xxv. 2, 3. Mic. vii. 14).

Ver. 10.] When things are come to this extremity, and the case seems desperate, then is the time for God to interpose, and make his strength more eminently conspicuous in the midst of man’s weakness.

Ver. 11. Ye shall conceive chaff.] Your designs shall all prove abortive (compare ix. 4. Ps. xvii. 14, xvii. 13, xviii. 5).

Your breath, as fire, shall devour you.] Or rather, “your war against my people shall be the vengeance of God’s people, shall turn to your own destruction.”

Ver. 12. The people shall be as the burnings of lime:] They shall be perfectly consumed, as when chalk-stones are reduced to lime: calcining, or reducing to ashes, being one of the last effects of fire (compare Amos ii. 1).

As thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire.] Sinners are often compared to thorns, which the fire catches presently; so do God’s judgments lay hold on such who have made themselves “vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction” (see note on ix. 18).

Ver. 13.] So remarkable a judgment as this deserves to be known and laid to heart by all men, both far and near.

Ver. 14.] This and the two following verses describe the different apprehensions of the good and bad under their present circumstances. They that did not rely upon God for help, were ready to cry out, Who can bear the approach of the Assyrian, who devours all things like fire? These words may, in a secondary sense, be applied to the terror of hell torments, which, when the consciences of sinners begin to be awakened, give them just cause for having dreadful apprehensions of the divine vengeance. And they that could not bear the thoughts of a mortal enemy’s falling upon them with all his force; how will they bear the weight...
sions, that shaketh his hand from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shuttest his eyes from seeing evil;
16 He shall dwell on high: his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks: bread shall be given him; his waters shall be sure.
17 Thine eyes shall see the king in his beauty: they shall behold the land that is very far off.
18 Their heart shall meditate terror. Where is the scribe? where is the receiver? where is he that counted the towers?
19 Thou shalt not see a fierce people, a people of deeper speech than thou canst perceive; of a stammering tongue, that thou canst not understand.
20 Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities: thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; of God's wrath, when he shall declare himself their enemy, and set his "terror in array against them."

Ver. 15. That stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood
That will not give ear to any bloody designs formed against the life of the innocent. To "shut the ears" at the mention of a thing, is to show the utmost detestation of it (see Acts vii. 57).

That shuttest his eyes from seeing evil.] As persons turn away their face from any sight they loathe, and have an aversion for. So God is described as of "purer eyes than to behold iniquity" (Hab. i. 13).

Ver. 16. His place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks:] God shall place him out of the reach of danger, and shall be unto him a rock and a fortress (compare Ps. lxi. 2).

Bread shall be given him:] He shall not want any of the necessaries of life, even in the midst of the siege.

Ver. 17.] The king will appear in public, dressed in his royal robes, and with usual state and splendour, after the defeat of the Assyrian; not covered with sackcloth, as when he went to the temple in the time of his distress (xxxvii. 1). The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall no longer be confined by their enemies within the city, but shall have liberty to look abroad, and visit the distant parts of the country.

Ver. 18.] Every one shall with pleasure reflect upon the dangers they have escaped, and shall ask, in a triumphant manner, Where is the scribe, or master master? Where is the collector of the taxes? Where is the master of the artillery or ammunition? How are they of a sudden vanished, and disappear?

not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.

21 But there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams; wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby.

22 For the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king; he will save us.

23 Thy tackslings are loosed; they could not well strengthen their mast, they could not spread the sail: then is the prey of a great spoil divided; the lame take the prey.

24 And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick: the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity.

Ver. 19.] The very looks and habit of a foreign and insulting enemy carry something of terror in them (compare Deut. xxvii. 49). Their language is perfect gibberish, and unintelligible, and this makes it a vain thing to try to soften them with good words (see the notes on xxviii. 11). The Hebrew expresses a foreign language by a deep lip or speech: our translators render it a strange speech, Exod. iii. 5, 6.

Ver. 20.] You may now view Zion in perfect peace, and freed from all fears of hostile invasion. God hath chosen it to be the place set apart for his solemn worship, and the temple of his own residence, and not a "stake of it shall be removed," or "a cord of it broken;" i.e. no part of its walls or houses shall receive any damage from the enemy (compare xxxvii. 33. liv. 2).

Ver. 21.] God will be as great a security to this city as any broad river or deep stream, which is both an ornament and a defence (compare Ps. xlvi. 4, 5), and none of our enemy's taller or lesser ships shall be able to annoy us (see the following note).

Ver. 22.] Having compared the Assyrian army to a naval force (ver. 21), he persists in that metaphor and describes them as in a shipwrecked condition; the spoil of which wreck shall be divided among the citizens of Jerusalem, and the weakest of them should have share in it.

Ver. 24.] The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall not be sensible of those maladies under which they lately languished: but the removal of those evils shall give them comfortable assurance that God hath forgotten their former iniquities.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

1 Come near, ye nations, to bear; and hearken, ye people: let the earth hear, and all that is therein; the world, and all things that come forth of it.

CHAP. XXXIV.

ARGUMENT.—We may distinguish this prophecy into several parts, or sections, as hath been observed at the beginning of this work. The foregoing section ended with a description of the general judgment and some of the remarkable circumstances that do attend it (ch. xxiv.); and then follow the songs and grateful acknowledgments of the church (ch. xxv.

2 For the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon all their armies: he hath utterly destroyed them, he hath delivered them to the slaughter.

—xxvii). This chapter seems to treat much of the same subject with the twenty-fourth, and the following chapter entertains us with a new scene of the church's glories which should succeed.

Ver. 1.] A summons to all the world to this description of the general judgment, which concerns them all (compare Ps. 1. 1).

Ver. 2, 3.] These two verses may very fitly be ap-3 Their slain also shall be cast out, and their stink shall come out of their carcasses, and the mountains shall be melted with their blood.

4 And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree.

5 For my sword shall be bathed in heaven: behold, it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse, to judgment.

6 The sword of the Lord is filled with blood, it is made fat with fatness, and with the blood of lambs and goats, with the fat of the kidneys of rams: for the Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea.

7 And the unicorns shall come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls; and their land shall be soaked with blood, and their dust made fat with fatness.

8 For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance, 16 ¶ Seek ye out of the book of the Lord, and read: no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate: for my mouth it hath commanded, and his spirit it hath gathered them.

17 And he hath cast the lot for them, and his hand hath divided it unto them by line: they shall possess it for ever, from generation to generation shall they dwell therein.

Deut. xxxii. 34. Ps. lvi. 8. Dan. vii. 10. Mal. iii. 16. In like manner, saith the text, this prophecy is a register of the fate of Idumea (see ver. 6), and whosoever, in aftertimes, will compare the event with this prophecy, will find every circumstance here foretold to be punctually fulfilled.

No one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate: No one of the creatures mentioned in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth verses.

Ver. 17.] God hath appointed to each of these animals its particular share of the land, with the same exactness as he divided Judea by lot among the children of Israel (compare Ps. lxxviii. 55. Josh. xviii. 8).

CHAPTER XXXV.

1. The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose.

2. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing: the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God.

3. ¶ Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees.

CHAP. XXXV.

ARGUMENT.—That there is no necessity of confusing the judgments denounced in the last chapter to the single country of Idumea, but they may belong to later times and occurrences, hath been shown in the argument and notes upon that chapter. And by the same reason the new face of things here described, may be applied to the flourishing state of the church, or the golden age of the gospel, to commence from our Saviour’s appearing, and to be more fully completed when all his enemies “shall be destroyed.” Indeed, Mr. White tells us, that “interpreters would never have dreamed of this sense, had they consulted the prophet’s words;” but I must put him in mind, that both Christ and the apostles have applied several passages in this chapter to the gospel times, as will appear in the following notes; nay, our Saviour appeals to this very prophecy to prove himself the Messiah described by the prophets (see Matt. xi. 3—5). And if Mr. White does not think Christ’s argument to be good, he himself ought to be reckoned among the dreamers of the circumvention, whom he so much despiseth.

Ver. 1.] That is, for the judgments inflicted upon God’s enemies. When the prophets denounced God’s judgments against incorrigible sinners, they often speak of them as matters of rejoicing to the righteous, that they take satisfaction in seeing the divine justice made manifest (see Ps. lvi. 9, 10. Jer. ii. 10. 49. Rev. xviii. 20). By the wilderness is meant the church which before was in a desolate and forlorn condition, but now shall spread and flourish. So the church is described as dwelling in the wilderness, Rev. xii. 14, thereby to denote its obscure and afflicted state. Both places, perhaps, allude to the Israelites sojourning in the wilderness, who are called the “church in the wilderness,” Acts vii. 37.

Ver. 2. It shall blossom abundantly.] Spiritual blessings are often set forth under the emblems of fruitfulness and plenty (see note on ver. 2, and compare xxx. 23. xxxii. 15. xii. 19. lxx. 14. lxv. 10).

The glory of Lebanon] See xxxviii. 9.

Ver. 3.] The prophet exhorts those that are strong to “comfort the feeble minded,” such as by reason of the continuance of their afflictions began to despair of God’s mercy.

Ver. 4.] The destruction he brings upon your enemies will be the means of your deliverance (compare 2 Thess. i. 6, 7). This may be applied to Christ, who is God as well as man (see the note on vii. 14, and compare lxi. 2).

Ver. 5.] Our Saviour proved himself to be the Messiah to John’s disciples, by appealing to this prophecy, as literally fulfilled in the miracles which he wrought (Matt. xii. 2, 3), so that they certainly relate to the times of the gospel. And yet this does not hinder but that the words may be capable of a farther accomplishment; viz. that God will remove all that blindness and prejudice which hindered men from coming to the acknowledgment of the truth (compare xxix. 18. xxxii. 3. xlii. 7. Acts xxvi. 18). The gospel promises have different degrees and seas-
CHAPTER XXXVI.

7 And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water; in the habitation of dragons, where each lay, shall be grass with reeds and rushes.

8 And a highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.

9 No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there:

10 And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

1 Now it came to pass in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah, that Sennacherib king of Assyria came up against all the defenced cities of Judah, and took them.

2 And the king of Assyria sent Rabshakeh from Lachish to Jerusalem unto king Hezekiah with a great army. And he stood by the conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field.

3 Then came forth unto him Eliakim, Hilud's son, which relate to the restoration of the Jews, and their return into their own land. For the same reason, the history of the taking Jerusalem by the Babylonians is annexed to Jeremiah's prophecies, because it helps to explain and confirm several passages in them (see Jer. lii.).

I shall be the shorter upon these chapters, because the greatest part of them is fully explained by Bishop Patrick in his commentary upon the second book of Kings.

Ver. 2. The king of Assyria sent Rabshakeh from Lachish: Arch bishop Usher supposes this attempt upon Jerusalem to have been three years after the former expedition mentioned at the first verse (see his Analecta Vet. Test. ad A.M. 2191 and 2191).
kiah's son, which was over the house, and Shebah the scribe, and Joah, Asaph's son, the recorder.

4 ¶ And Rabshakeh said unto them, Say ye now to Hezekiah, Thus saith the great king, the king of Assyria, What confidence is this wherein thou trustest?

5 I say, sayest thou, (but they are but vain words) I have counsel and strength for war: now on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against me?

6 Lo, thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt; whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it: so is Pharaoh king of Egypt to all that trust in him.

7 But if thou say to me, We trust in the Lord our God: is it not he, whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away, and said to Judah and to Jerusalem, Ye shall worship before this altar?

8 Now therefore give pledges, I pray thee, to my master the king of Assyria, and I will give thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them.

9 How then wilt thou turn away the face of one captain of the least of my master's servants, and put thy trust in Egypt for chariots and for horsemen?

10 And am I now come up without the Lord against this land to destroy it? the Lord said unto me, Go up against this land, and destroy it.

11 ¶ Then said Eliakim and Shebna and Joah unto Rabshakeh, Speak, I pray thee, unto thy master, the king of Assyria; this people is confidence in Egypt, wherein they put their trust.

12 But Rabshakeh said, Hath my master sent me to thy master and to thee to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men that sit upon the wall, that they may eat their own dung and drink their own piss with you?

13 Then Rabshakeh stood, and cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and said, Hear ye the words of the great king, the king of Assyria.

14 Thus saith the king, Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you.

15 Neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the Lord, saying, The Lord will surely deliver us: this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.

16 Hearken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, Make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me: and eat ye every one of his vine, and every one of his fig tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his own cistern;

17 Until I come and take you away to a land like your own land, a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards.

18 Beware lest Hezekiah persuade you, saying, The Lord will deliver us. Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?

19 Where are the gods of Hamath and Arpad? where are the gods of Sepharvaim? and have they delivered Samaria out of my hand?

20 Who are they among all the gods of these lands, that have delivered their land out of my hand, that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of my hand?

21 But they held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's commandment was, saying, Answer him not.

22 ¶ Then came Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, that was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and Joah, the son of Asaph, the recorder, to Hezekiah with their clothes rent, and told him the words of Rabshakeh.

By the conduit of the upper pool] See note on vii. 3.

Ver. 6.] See xx. 5, 6, xxx. 2, &c. xxxi. 1. Ezek. xxix. 6, 7.

Ver. 8. Give pledges.] Or, "give hostages," so a word from the same original signifies, 2 Kings xiv. 14. Rab-shakeh directs his discourse to king Hezekiah, as if he were present, and bids him offer any pledge, pawn, or wager, which he would be willing to forfeit, if he could not provide riders for two thousand horses, which the king of Assyria was to furnish him with. Horses were scarce in Judea, which was the cause that few of the natives were trained up to that sort of military discipline: but they relied upon Egypt for horsemen, as it follows (see the note on li. 7).

Ver. 10.] He interprets his former successes, as if they were an argument that heaven was on his side (see ver. 19, 20. x. 9, 10), or he may mean that some oracle, or idol, in request among the Assyrians, had promised him success: and this pretended deity he impiously calls by the name of the true God.

Ver. 11. Speak—in the Syrian language; The Syrian tongue is what we now call Chaldee (see Dan. ii. 4. Ezra iv. 7).

Ver. 12. That they may eat their own dung, &c.] He threatens them with the utmost extremity of famine which a strait siege would produce, in case they refuse to comply with his master's proposals.

Ver. 16. Make an agreement with me by a present.] This was a token of homage which conquered nations paid to their conquerors (see 2 Sam. viii. 3, 6).

Ver. 22. With their clothes rent.] It was the custom of the Jews, when they heard the name of God blasphemed, to rend their clothes (see 2 Kings v. 7. Matt. xxvi. 65). This crime Rab-shakeh had been guilty of, in speaking of the true God in as contemptible a manner as he did of idols (ver. 7. 19, 20).
CHAPTER XXXVII.

1 And it came to pass, when king Hezekiah heard it, that he rent his clothes, and covered himself with sackcloth, and went into the house of the Lord.

2 And he sent Eliakim, who was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and the elders of the priests covered with sackcloth, unto Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz.

3 And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and of blasphemy: for the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth.

4 It may be the Lord thy God will hear the words of Rabshakeh, whom the king of Assyria his master hath sent to reproach the living God, and will reprove the words which the Lord thy God hath heard: wherefore lift up thy prayer for the remnant that is left.

5 So the servants of king Hezekiah came to Isaiah.

6 ¶ And Isaiah said unto them, Thus shall ye say unto your master, Thus saith the Lord, Be not afraid of the words that thou hast heard, wherewith the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed me.

7 Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumour, and return to his own land; and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.

8 ¶ So Rabshakeh returned, and found the king of Assyria warring against Libnah: for he had heard that he was departed from La-chish.

9 And he heard say concerning Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, He is come forth to make war with thee. And when he heard it, he sent messengers to Hezekiah, saying,

10 Thus shall ye speak to Hezekiah king of Judah, saying, Let not thy God in whom thou trustest, deceive thee, saying, Jerusalem shall not be given into the hand of the king of Assyria.

11 Behold, thou hast heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands by destroying them utterly; and shalt thou be delivered?

12 Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph, and the children of Eden which were in Telassar?

13 Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arphad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah?

14 ¶ And Hezekiah received the letter from the hand of the messengers, and read it: and Hezekiah went up unto the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord.

15 And Hezekiah prayed unto the Lord, saying:

16 O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, that dwellest between the cherubims, thou art the God, even thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth: thou hast made heaven and earth.

17 Incline thine ear, O Lord, and hear; open thine eyes, O Lord, and see: and hear all the words of Sennacherib which hath sent to reproach the living God.

18 Of a truth, Lord, the kings of Assyria

Ver. 13.] We find this expressed, with some little variation, xxxvi. 19. "Where are the gods of Hamath and of Arpad? where are the gods of Sepharvaim?" From whence Dr. Spencer ingeniously conjectures, that the word meteech, king, was the name of an idol, called elsewhere Moloch, and worshipped by these people (lib. ii. De Legib. Hebrew, cap. 10. sect. 1).

Ver. 16. O Lord of hosts,—that dwellest between the cherubims.—Who hast declared thyself in a peculiar manner the God of Israel, by choosing this temple for the place of thy residence, where thou woulsafest thy appearance from between the cherubins, and givest favourable answers to us, when we humbly beg thy assistance (see Numb. vii. 89). The two titles, the "Lord of hosts," and "he that dwells upon," or "inhabits the cherubim," as some render the phrase, are usually joined together (see 1 Sam. iv. 2. 2. Sam. vi. 2): because God's sitting upon the cherubins in the temple, did signify his being attended with the host of heaven, as always in a readiness to obey his commands (see 1 Kings xxii. 9).

Thou art the God,—of all the kingdoms of the earth:—Hezekiah here asserts God's sovereignty, in opposition to the blasphemies of Rabshakeh and his master, who esteemed the God of Israel but as Lord, or ordinary genius of the particular country of Judæa, and thereby levelled him with the pretended gods of other nations (see ver. 10—12, of this chapter, and xxxvi. 19. 20. compare likewise 1 Kings xx. 28).
have laid waste all the nations, and their countries,

19 And have cast their gods into the fire: for they were no gods, but the work of men's hands, wood and stone: therefore they have destroyed them.

20 Now therefore, O Lord our God, save us out of his hand, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the Lord, even thou only.

21 Thus saith the Lord, which formed the earth, Hezekiah the son of Ahaz, saying, Thou hast said, What shall I go up against the Assyrians, with whom I shall war, and what shall I do to the ablest of them? But now the Lord will bring the captivity of Assyria before thy face.

22 Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, concerning Sennacherib king of Assyria:

23 For though thou trusting in thy works, and sayest, I have the power: but thou shalt see such as thine eyes shall not see; and shall hear such as thine ears shall not hear:

24 For the eyes of man see not as the eyes of the Lord; nor is the judgment of men, with the judgment of the Lord. For the Lord will have respect unto him that feareth Him, and knoweth His commandments;

25 Who is he that slayeth me, or w企s me, but the wood and the stone? one cutteth these, and another taketh them away.

26 Moreover the Lord will render the captives of Assyria before him, as a reed taken in a swimmer's hand, and as a flag over a potter's wheel, and as a reed that bendeth out of the water:所以他 will lift up against Sennacherib the archer, the骄傲 of his highness, and the excellency of his power.

27 For this is the word that the Lord hath spoken concerning him; The virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn; the daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head at thee.

28 Whom hast thou reproached and blasphemed? and against whom hast thou exalted thy voice, and lifted up thine eyes on high? even against the Holy One of Israel.

29 By thy servants hast thou reproached the Lord, and hast said, By the multitude of my chariots am I come up to the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon; and I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir trees thereof: and I will enter into the height of his border, and the forest of his Carmel.

30 Thou shalt be a sign unto the Lord, and an ensign of his highness, against all the kingdoms of the earth. For I will make thee a wonder among all the peoples, and a horror among all nations.
CHAPTER XXXVIII.

1 In those days was Hezekiah sick unto death. And Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz came unto him, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Set thy house in order: for thou shalt die, and not live.

2 Then Hezekiah turned his face toward the wall, and prayed unto the Lord, saying,

3 And said, remember now, O Lord, how I have walked before thee in truth and in a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight. And Hezekiah wept sore.

4 ¶ Then came the word of the Lord to Isaiah, saying,

5 Go, and say to Hezekiah, Thus saith the Lord, the God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold, I will add unto thy days fifteen years.

6 And I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria: and I will defend this city.

7 And this shall be a sign unto thee from the Lord, that the Lord will do this thing that he hath spoken:

8 Behold, I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down in the sun dial of Ahaz, ten degrees backward. So the sun returned ten degrees, by which degrees it was gone down.

9 ¶ The writing of Hezekiah king of Judah, when he had been sick, and was recovered of his sickness:

10 I said in the cutting off of my days, I shall go to the gates of the grave: I am deprived of the residue of my years.

11 I said, I shall not see the Lord, even the

Ver. 6.] From hence it appears, that Hezekiah's sickness was before the destruction of Sennacherib's army, though it be not mentioned till afterward, because the present writer would not interrupt the thread of that story (see the note on xxxii. 10).

Ver. 8. So the sun returned ten degrees.] It is the common opinion that the sun itself went back, but the heavenly bodies were restored again to their regular position, as much being deduced from the next night as was added to this day. But some think this a particular miracle wrought by the shadow's going back upon the sun-dial of Ahaz, and not taken notice of in other countries, which occasioned an embassy from Babylon to inquire about the truth of it (2 Chron. xxxii. 31).

By which degrees it was gone down.] These ten degrees are supposed to be marks of so many hours by which the shadow went down; as the text expresses it both here and 2 Kings xx. 11. But there is no need Lord, in the land of the living: I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world.

13 Mine age is departed, and is removed from me as a shepherd's tent: I have cut off like a weaver my life: he will cut me off with pining sickness: from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.

14 Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter: I did mourn as a dove: mine eyes fail with looking upward: O Lord, I am oppressed; undertake for me.

15 What shall I say? he hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it: I shall go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul.

16 O Lord, by these things men live, and in all these things is the life of my spirit: so wilt thou recover me, and make me to live.

we should understand it of the declining part of the day, or the afternoon, for the word may be understood in general of a progressive motion; and Bishop Patrick tells us from Dr. Alix, this miracle was wrought about ten o'clock in the morning: nor can we be certain what portion of time is meant by these degrees, for the division of the day into hours seems not to have been so ancient an invention: that is commonly ascribed to Anaximander or Anaximenes, who flourished about two hundred years after, and probably by this philosopher we may observe, that Daniel is the only writer of the Old Testament that mentions an hour as a division of time, and there is no Hebrew word that signifies such a portion of time.

Ver. 11. The good men under the law had but imperfect notions of a future state, and thought it a great unhappiness to be deprived by death of the communion of saints here upon earth. Hezekiah might also be concerned to think, that the public worship of God might be less frequented, after it had lost so zealous a patron as himself.

Ver. 12. Mine age (or life) — is removed from me as a shepherd's tent: Shepherds do not pitch their tents long in one place, but remove for the convenience of pasture (see the note on xii. 20).

I have cut off like a weaver my life: My sirs are the cause that the thread of my life is cut off, like that of a weaver.

From day even to night] I concluded I should die before night (compare Job, vi. 20).

Ver. 13. I reckoned till morning, that, as a lion, so will he break all my bones: When night came, I reckoned I should die before the next morning, my pains were so great as if the whole frame of my body were just ready to be dissolved.

From day even to night] The second day of my illness I had the same expectations of death, which I had the day before: upon the third day he recovered (see surmises).

Ver. 14. Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter: My pains sometimes made me cry out aloud; at other times my strength was so low, I could only inwardly groan and bemoan myself.

Mine eyes fail with looking upward: I had scarce strength to lift up mine eyes to heaven, I even despised of any help from thence, but yet I could not forbear crying out, O Lord, thou seest that death is come like a cruel executioner to seize me, and it is thou only canst relieve me, and deliver me out of his hands.

Ver. 15. What shall I say? he hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it: The suddenness of my deliverance surprises me, so that I want words to express my thankfulness: all I can say is, that no sooner did God promise to restore my health, but I immediately found the effects of his goodness.

I shall go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul: Hezekiah in this sense is more intelligible in our old translation, which renders the words thus, "I will, so long as I live, remember this bitterness of my life:" that is, the remembrance of the misery I endured, shall continually excite me to renew my thankfulness for this thy mercy.

Ver. 16. As all men's lives are thy gift; so shall I always acknowledge the preservation of mine to be owing to thy goodness in promising, and thy faithfulness in making good thy promise.

Ver. 17. Behold, for peace I had great bitterness: The words may be translated, "Behold, my grievous anguish is turned into ease."
CHAPTER XXXIX.

1 At that time Merodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present to Hezekiah: for he had heard that he had been sick, and was recovered.

2 And Hezekiah was glad of them, and shewed them the house of his precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominion, that Hezekiah shewed them not.

3 ¶ Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah, and said unto him, What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, They are come from a far country unto me, even from Babylon.

4 Then said he, What have they seen in thy house? And Hezekiah answered, All that is in

CHAP. XXXIX.

ARGUMENT.—The king of Babylon sending ambassadors to congratulate Hezekiah's recovery, the king received them with great kindness, and with some degree of vanity showed them all his treasures and rarities: to reprove this piece of pride, Isaiah by God's direction acquaints him, that the time will come when all these boasted riches shall be carried to Babylon, and even the heirs of the royal family should be treated as slaves and captives there. This history is inserted here as a proper introduction to the succeeding prophecies, many of which relate to the Babylonian captivity, and the return of the Jews from thence.

Ver. 1. Merodach-baladan, the son Baladan.] Merodach was the name of an idol worshipped by the Babylonians, and Balass or Bel was another (see Jer. 1. 2). And these two idols, with the addition of Adan, or Adon, which signifies lord, gave a name to this king of Babylon. It was usual for the Babylonian kings to take their names from the idols they worshipped. Thus we find one of their kings was called Evil-merodach (2 Kings xxv. 27). Nebu was another idol of the Babylonians (see xlv. 1 of this prophecy): from whence Nabonassar, Nebuchadnezzar, and several other kings of Babylon, took their names. And Daniel had the name of Belshazzar given him, "according to the name of my god," saith Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iv. 8. This king is here called "the son of Baladan," which Baladan Archbishop Usher supposes to be the same person who is called in profane authors Belseis, or Beltesis, and Nabonassar, or

5 Then said Isaiah to Hezekiah, Hear the word of the Lord of hosts:

6 Behold, the days come, that all that is in thy house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store until this day, shall be carried to Babylon: nothing shall be left, saith the Lord.

7 And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away; and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon.

8 Then said Hezekiah to Isaiah, Good is the word of the Lord which thou hast spoken. He said moreover, For there shall be peace and truth in my days.

from whence the famous computation of time called

Era Nabonassari took its name (see Annales Ver. Test. ad A. M. 3257).

Sent letters and a present to Hezekiah.] As many other princes did (see 2 Chron. xxxii. 23). One reason of sending this embassy was, to satisfy himself about the prodigy of the sun's going backward upon the king's recovery (ibid. ver. 31). The Babylonians were famous for the study of astronomy, which made their king the more inquisitive about so extraordinary a phenomenon.

Ver. 2. The precious ointment.] The balsam that grew near Jericho was reckoned the very best of that kind (see Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 6, and De Bello Judæis, lib. v. cap. 4).

Ver. 3.] See the note on v. 26.

Ver. 4. There is nothing among my treasures that I have not shewed them.] This he did in "the pride of his heart," as we read, 2 Chron. xxxii. 26, 31, which occasioned the prophet to denounce the following judgment.

Ver. 7.] Even some of thy posterity and of the royal family, shall they put into servile offices in the king of Babylon's court (see this fulfilled in Daniel and his companions, Dan. i. 3, &c.).

ISAIAH.

And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

6 The voice said, Cry. And he said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field:

7 The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: because the spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it: surely the people is grass.

predictions we find in the succeeding chapters of this prophecy, relating to the life and death, the character and offices of the Messiahs, and the flourishing state of the church under him, can never be supposed to receive their due accomplishment, unless we assert that the prophet was carried on from his first subject to a farther view of the enlargement of the church under the gospel, and the bringing forth of the Gentiles into it. And these prophecies are so worked in many places, that the literal sense of the text does better agree with the gospel-times, than with those that were nearer the prophet's view; as may be particularly observed in some passages of this very chapter. 1. I shall conclude this argument with that judicious observation of our learned Mr. Thorndike (De Jure Eun. Lect. iv. pp. 90, 91), "Equidem quod Judaeos post reditum a captivitate magna et gloriosa promissa sunt, cepisse quidem imploer fa- teor sub Macabaeis, liberoque ex postliminio ejus populi statut. Etenim tamen de idolo destruendis, et de proselysis aggregandis ibi practicantur, sive Evangelio impenditum non fuisset, sese nolens nulli facili cum ejus tempore, et populi firmissimo corde, et qui praedolotarum aut Man- huhedismi fercunditate millius momenti sit."

Ver. 1.] The prophet addresses himself to God's messengers, whose office it was to publish the glad tidings of peace and salvation (see 2. 7.). The Sept- urchint understand the words of the priests, and read the Greek verses so as to say, "O ye priests, speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem."

[Comfort ye my people.] Compare xli. 13. li. 9. The times of the Messiahs are called the "consolation of Israel" (Luke ii. 25), and one of the names of the Messiahs was to be Mesaphem, i.e. the Conforter, according to the cubins (see Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 309). The prophet here speaks to those that were to "bring glad tidings to Zion," ver. 9, as the words should be there translated.

My people.] Mr. White, in his preface, p. 11, makes it a difficult question to resolve whom the prophet here means, if the words be applied to the gospel-times. Now I think it is very easy to give an answer to this question out of the gospel, viz. that the prophet speaks of those who were called for the consolation of Israel, and looked for redemption in Jerusalem "(Luke ii. 25, 28). Of which kind were all the priests and well-disposed persons who lived at the same time of our Saviour's appearing. Mr. White indeed affirms, "that the greatest part of the people thought themselves to stand in no need of comfort;" but this is so far from being true, that we find by many passages of the gospels, that the main body of the Jewish nation were in great expectation of the Messiahs at that time, and much pleased with the thoughts of his being near at hand; though afterward many of them were disappointed at the meanness of his outward appearance, and therefore took up an incredible prejudice against him.

Ver. 2. Cry unto her, that her warfare is accom-
8 The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: but the word of our God shall stand for ever.
9 ¶ O Zion, that bringest good tidings, get thee up into the high mountain; O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!
10 Behold, the Lord God will come with strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him: behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him.
11 He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.
12 ¶ Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?

restoration of the Jewish nation, after a seventy years' captivity, was not to be brought to pass by any human wisdom or means, but merely by the power and goodness of God (see Zech. iv. 6). Which observation is still more remarkably verified in the revelation of the gospel, the great design of which is to exalt God, and to humble man; whose promises are the only foundation of a lasting happiness, and these are wholly owing to the mercy of God, and shall be effected without any human means or assistance, "that no flesh may glory in his presence" (see 1 Cor. i. 29-31. 1 Pet. i. 25).

Ver. 7. Because the spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it:— Or, "because the wind of the Lord bloweth upon it" (compare Ps. ciii. 16). As wind and storms deface the beauty of the grass and flowers; so the breath of God's displeasure blasts the counsels of men, and brings them and their designs to nought (see ver. 2).

Ver. 8. But the word of our God shall stand for ever.] See note upon ver. 6.

Ver. 9. O Zion, that bringest good tidings:—O Jerusalem, that bringest good tidings?] The marginal reading here is very common, and is uniformly adopted as the true one by every ancient version, and by the Vulgate, the Syriac, and the Arabic, the last forming its word teleost good tidings to Zion! O thou that telllest good tidings to Jerusalem!" and this reading agrees better with what follows, "Say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God" (compare likewise xii. 27. lii. 7). The Hebrew mebasshereth, though of the feminine gender, yet is masculine in sense, and so it is used Ps. lxvii. 11. Just as kohedeth, of the same gender, is used for Solomon the Preacher, Eccles. i. 1.

Get thee up into the high mountain:] They that were to publish any proclamation, used to get up to the top of some high hill, from whence their voice might be heard a great way off (see lii. 7. Judg. ix. 7. 2 Chron. xiii. 1). The same ceremony was used among the Jews in giving notice of their solemn festivals.

Lift it up, be not afraid:] For God will certainly make his words good.

Behold your God:] See the note on xviii. 10.

Ver. 10. His arm shall rule for him:] He will visibly exert his power, and establish the kingdom of the Messias, without calling in any human assistance (compare lx. 26, and see the note upon ver. 6).

His work before him:] Or rather, according to the marginal reading, "His recompense before him" (compare xlix. 4. xlii. 11). The gospel does in the 13 Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or being his counselor hath taught him?

11 With whom took he counsel, and who instructed him, and taught him in the path of judgment, and taught him knowledge, and shewed to him the way of understanding?
15 Behold, the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance: behold, he taketh up the isles as a very little thing.
16 And Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof sufficient for a burnt offering.
17 All nations before him are as nothing; and they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity.
18 ¶ To whom then will ye liken God? or what likeness will ye compare unto him?
19 The workman melteth a graven image, and the goldsmith spreadeth it over with gold, and casteth silver chains.

The clearest manner set forth the different rewards of the righteous and the wicked (see Matt. xvi. 27. Rev. xxii. 13).

Ver. 11. He shall feed his flock like a shepherd:] As the care which God took in providing for, and protecting, his people, is resembled to the office of a shepherd (see Ps. xxiii. 1. lxxx. 1. xv. 7. c. 2): so the office of the Messias is often described by the prophets under the same metaphor (see Ezek. xxiv. 29. xxxii. 24). In allusion to which places our Saviour calls himself the "good shepherd" (John x. 11), and describes himself as "coming into the world to seek and save that which was lost, and bringing home the wandering sheep upon his shoulders rejoicing."

He shall gather the lambs with his arm, &c.] As a shepherd gathers his lambs together, that none of them be lost, carries those in his bosom that are not able to go, and gently drives the ewes that cannot hear the fatigue of travel: such gentleness shall Christ use towards the weak ones of his flock, giving them instruction according as they were able to bear it, and taking all possible care to reduce the strangers into his fold (see John x. 16. xvi. 15. 16. Mark vi. 33, 34). They have some relation to God's care in conducting his people into their own country from Babylon (compare xlix. 10), but do more eminently belong to Christ, as appears by the many allusions in the New Testament to this and such-like passages in the Old (see Heb. xii. 20. 1 Pet. ii. 25. v. 4. Rev. vii. 17).

Ver. 12.] Here begins a lofty description of God's almighty power, showing that he is great above all his works, and able to do beyond what we can think or conceive; and the design of it is to persuade the people to place their whole trust in him, and to rest assured what he hath promised he is able to perform (see ver. 27. 28), and withal to arm them against idolatry (see ver. 18. &c.).

Ver. 13. &c.] These two verses inform us, that God's wisdom is as great as his power, that he "works all things after the counsel of his own will," without asking advice of any, or acquainting them with the measures of his proceedings.

Ver. 15. He taketh up the isles:] The Hebrew language calls all those countries islands, which we go to by sea (see note on xi. 11). From thence it comes to signify any place or country (see xx. 6. lix. 18).

Ver. 16.] If we were to make an obligation suitable to the greatness of the divine majesty, the forest of 20 He that is so impoverished that he hath no oblation chooseth a tree that will not rot; he seek-eth unto him a cunning workman to prepare a graven image, that shall not be moved.

21 Have ye not known? have ye not heard? hath it not been told you from the beginning? have ye not understood from the foundations of the earth?

22 It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grass- hoppers; that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in:

23 That bringeth the princes to nothing; he maketh the judges of the earth as vanity.

24 Yea, they shall not be sown; yea, they shall not enter into the vineyard: and they shall whither, and the whirlwind shall take them away as stubble.

Lebanon would not suffice for wood, nor the heavens that live in it for an offering (compare Ps. 1, 10—12).

Ver. 18.] The Jews, being to live among the idolatrous Babylonians during their captivity, were by all means to be cautioned against practising their idolatries. This makes the prophet so frequently enlarge upon the vanity and folly of idol-worship, in this last part of his prophecy. Jeremiah is given to use the same caution (x. 2, 3), and especially in those remarkable words (ver. 11, of that chapter), "The gods that have not made the heavens and the earth, even they shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens." which are written in Chaldee, that the Jews might be able to understand the idolaters in their own language.

What likeness will ye compare? See note on xlv. 13.

Ver. 19. Casteth silver chains. By which the idols are fastened to walls or pillars.

Ver. 20.] He that cannot but at the charge of a costly image overlaid with gold or silver, provides himself with a wooden one, and gets an artillerist to make it for him, and fasten it with nails that it should not fall down.

Ver. 21. Have ye not known? There was a general tradition of the creation of the world still conveyed from one age to another, even among the heathens, which, together with the arguments which natural reason suggested to them, that all things must derive their original from one principle, was sufficient to instruct them in the knowledge of the one true God, to preserve them from idolatry, and convince them that God could not be like the work of men's hands (see Rom. i. 19, 20, &c.).

Have ye not understood from the foundations of the earth? The words run thus in the original: "Have ye not understood, or, considered, the foundations of the earth?" i.e. by whom they were laid, even by "him that sitteth upon the circle of the earth." &c. as it follows. The verb ludo signifies to consider (see note on xxviii. 19).

Ver. 22. It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth.] As supreme Lord and governor of the world, "That stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain." Like the curtain of a tent (compare Hab. iii. 7). The heavens are described in scripture as God's taber- nacle, or the seat of his glorious presence (see Ps. civ. 2, and lxvi. 1 of this prophecy).

Ver. 23.] He removeth one prince or monarchy, and setteth up another (see Ps. lxxv. 7, Dan. ii. 21):

and will put an end to the Babylonish monarchy, and set up the Persian, in order to return the captivity of his people.

Ver. 24.] Either he never suffers them to thrive, or, if they make a figure for some time, a sudden blast of his displeasure (see ver. 7) makes them wither, and puts an end to their flourishing condition.

Ver. 25.] Ye sons of men, henceforward, and behold who hath created these things.] A man cannot lift up his eyes to heaven, and view the exact order and regular motions of the heavenly bodies, but he must be convinced that there is a wise author of nature, who at first created, and still preserves this system of things. Thus, Tully expresses the natural sense mankind hath of this matter (Tuscul. Quest. lib. 1): "Cum vidimus speciem primam cannoreseae usit, unde conversiones celerintem, tum viscissitudines dienum abscap noctium, commutationesque temperum quadrarum, erumeo omnium moderatorem solum, lamanae et stellarum cédem cœrns constantissimam servi- vantes—hae omn carninums, possuus consolationis quia his præcipient exactus efficacit?" The heavenly bodies are called God's hosts, because he preserves over them, and places them in their proper rank and order, and they exactly keep those stations that he hath appointed them, and fulfill those commands which he hath given them (compare Ps. cxlvii. 4.)

For that he is strong in power; not one faileth.] God's works have this remarkable pre-emience above men's, that they never wear out or need repairing (see Ps. cxxxix. 9, 10. The words of Seneca are observable to this purpose (Epist. viii.): "Manent cuncta, non quia aeterna sunt, sed quia defenduntur cura regentis: immortalia tutore non egent, habe conservat arifex, fragilitatem materiem vi su viventes." Ver. 27.] These are the following words of the people, or princes, placed under captivity, and who were apt to think that God did not regard their condition.

Ver. 28.] We cannot fathom the depths of his pro- vidence, nor assign the reasons of all his proceed- ings; but this we may be sure of, that his delaying to deliver his people does not proceed from want either of ability or knowledge, since he "upholds all things by the word of his power," and his wisdom extends itself to all the parts of the creation.

Ver. 29.] Those that make the greatest boast of their strength, as young men are apt to do, shall fail it fail them, whenever God withdraws his support:

2 Who raised up the righteous man from the east, called him to his foot, gave the nations before him, and made him rule over kings? he gave them as the dust to his sword, and as driven stubble to his bow.

3 He pursued them, and passed safely; even by the way that he had not gone with his feet.

4 Who hath wrought and done it, calling the generations from the beginning? I the Lord, the first, and with the last; I am he.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.—In this and the five following chapters, God is introduced as pleading his own cause against the false gods of the heathen, and challenging the idols to show such instances of their power and goodness in protecting their votaries, as might be alleged in his behalf with respect to his care and providence over the Jews. These instructions were very proper to confirm that people in their religion, and preserve them from being drawn aside to comply with the Babylonish idolatry; and they likewise contain in them a plain prediction of the calling of the gentiles, and their turning from idols to serve the true and living God.

Ver. 1. Keep silence before me, O islands;] God summons the heathen nations to plead their cause before him, and to show that silence could be kept, according to the form observed in solemn courts of justice. By islands are meant those heathen nations that were parted from Judea by the sea (see the note on xi. 11). In this sense, those that live upon the Mediterranean sea are called the "islands of the gentiles," Gen. x. 5. Accordingly the word is rendered Phery by, gentiles, by the LXX. in the fifth verse of this chapter, and xlv. 4.

Let the people renew their strength.] Let them muster up the whole strength of their cause, and make the best plea they can for themselves (see ver. 21).

Ver. 2. Who hath raised up the righteous man from the east,] Many expositors understand this of Abraham, whom God called from the other side of Emathaeas, which lay eastward of Judea; but I think it is rather meant of Cyrus, as appears by comparing this place with the twenty-fifth verse of the chapter, and with xlv. 13, xlvii. 11. And Cyrus is here described as typically representing Christ (see the note on xlv. 1); being first of all styled righteousness (the righteousness of God, which is one of the titles of Christ (see Jer. xxiii. 5, 6); and then is said to come from the east, by which name Christ is also described Zech. iii. 8, where the word is emah, which the earth, and called thee from the chief men thereof, and said unto thee, Thou art my servant; I have chosen thee, and not cast thee away.

9 If fear thou not; for I am with thee: be not dismayed; for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.

10 Behold, all they that were incensed against thee shall be ashamed and confounded: they shall be as nothing; and they that strive with thee shall perish.

11 Thou shalt seek them, and shalt not find them, even them that contended with thee: they that war against thee shall be as nothing, and as a thing of nought.

12 For I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee.

13 Fear not thou worm Jacob, and ye men of Israel; I will help thee, saith the Lord, and thy redeemer, the Holy One of Israel.

15 Behold, I will make thee a new sharp threshing instrument having teeth: thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff.

16 Thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away, and the whirlwind shall scatter them: and thou shalt rejoice in the Lord, and shalt glory in the Holy One of Israel.

17 When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them.

18 I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water.

19 I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box tree together:

20 That they may see, and know, and consider, and understand together, that the hand of the Lord hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it.

21 Produce your cause, saith the Lord; bring forth your strong reasons, saith the king of Jacob.

[Note: This passage is from Isaiah 34:1-11. The translation is approximate, as the original text is challenging to interpret due to its poetic and metaphorical language.]
CHAPTER XLII

22 Let them bring them forth, and shew us what shall happen: let them shew the former things, what they be, that we may consider them, and know the latter end of them; or declare us things yet to come.

23 Behold, the things that are to come hereafter; for that we may know that ye are gods: yea, do good, or do evil, that we may be dismayed, and behold it together.

24 Behold, ye are of nothing, and your work of nought: an abomination is he that chooseth you.

25 I have raised up one from the north, and he shall come: from the rising of the sun shall he be called upon my name: and he shall come upon princes as upon mortar, and as the potter treadeth clay.

Ver. 22.] Let the idols plead their own cause, or do you their worshippers do it for them, and prove they ever gave any true oracles or prophecies relating to things to come, so that the very event might exactly answer the prediction, and this will give credit to any predictions they shall make relating to things future.

Ver. 23. Slave the things that are come! God only can certainly foreknow future events, especially such as depend upon contingent causes, and the determinations of men's free will. But this does not hinder but that some of the predictions of the heathen Idols or oracles might be true, or else they would hardly have been able to have kept up their credit. But the event answered their predictions in such cases chiefly, where prudent conjecture might go a great way; such might be the prediction of Saul's death by the evil spirit at Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 19). Evil spirits, being very nimble and active, may likewise forecast in one place what they see in another. This account Athanasius gives of the oracle, which foretold the overflowing of the Nile; which he supposes the evil spirit might do, by having seen the rains which fell in Ethiopia some time before, and cause that inundation (see Athanas. Life of Anthony the Herm. p. 456, tom. ii. edit. Cambr.). But there is no exact answer between such predictions and the prophecies recorded in scripture, where there is a series of remarkable events foretold, relating from the beginning of the world to the end of it: together with a punctual prediction of names and other circumstances several ages before the event (see xlii. 10). You are but slaves of the heathen. The heathens worshipped some of their gods, in hopes to receive good from them, and others for fear they should do them a mischief, who were, for that reason, called, by the Greeks and Romans, di avvercarm, and Αρηνάφοροι. The prophet, alluding to this opinion saith, that the evil spirits the heathens worshipped can neither do good nor hurt; they cannot do good because they are naturally evil; neither can they do hurt any farther than God is pleased to permit them: beside that the images, to whom their exterior worship is paid, are dead and insensible things, that cannot help themselves, much less any body else (see Jer. x. 5). And therefore, as it is God only that can "make peace and create evil" (Isa. xlv. 7), all worship is due to him alone.

Ver. 24. Behold, ye are nothing. Of no use or value: so the phrase is used Job xiii. 6, where we read "physicians of nothing" in the Hebrew; but our translation rightly renders the words, "physicians of no value." Idols are often called in the Old Testament elîlîm, i. e. nothings, and vanities and lies, to show that they are not what they pretend to be, but are only senseless images, and the representations for dead men (see 1 Cor. viii. 4).

Ver. 25.] Cyrus is described as coming from the east, ver. 2, and here he is represented as coming from the north and the east too, because his father was a Persian, and his mother a Median (see the note on xxi. 7). Media lay northward of Babylon; accordingly the army which Cyrus led against Babylon is described as coming out of the north (Jer. i. 5. 41), because it chiefly consisted of Medes (see note on xiii. 17).

Shall he call upon my name? Cyrus made public profession of his belief in the great "God of heaven and earth" (Ezra i. 2).

He shall come upon princes as upon mortar, and as the potter treadeth clay. The words may better be rendered, "He shall come and tread down princes like mortar, and as a potter treadeth clay" (see ver. 3. xlv. 1, &c. compare Ps. xlv. 42).

Ver. 26. Who hath declared from the beginning, that we may know? Upon such an evident prediction of an event that was not to be fulfilled till near two hundred years afterward, God, in a triumphant manner, demands whether the Idols could show any such token of his divinity.

That we may say, He is righteous? i. e. His claim to divinity is just (see xliii. 9).

Yes, there is none that sheweth. None of the idols can give you an answer, or seem to regard what you say: just as the prophet gave no answer to the impertinent clamours of his priests (see xvii. 20).

Ver. 27.] The verse may be better translated thus "I that am the first [i. e. the author and disposing of all things; see ver. 4] will give unto Zion and unto Jerusalem one that bringeth good tidings, saying, Behold them;" i. e. Behold the wonderful works which God hath wrought for you; or, Behold thy people returning to their ancient habitations (compare xl. 9).

Ver. 28.] If one were to look about and make the strictest inquiry, there would not be found a man among the idol-priests or prophets, that was able to return an answer to any question that is asked him. Images are elsewhere called dumb idols (see Hab. ii. 18. 1 Cor. iv. 20).

Ver. 29.] See ver. 24. The Septuagint render the latter part of the sentence, "they that make you are vain; for the true reading in the Greek is σαρκίς, as the common editions have it; but σαναριτές as the learned Dr. Grabe hath observed in his dissertation, De Viditis LXX. Interp. p. 55.
CHAPTER XLII.

Argumet. — The chapter begins with a character of Christ, of his meekness and gentleness, and his success in calling the Gentiles. Afterward the prophet upbraids the Jews for their blindness and incredulity, and foretells the judgments that they should bring upon them.

Ver. 1. Behold my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment unto the Gentiles.

5 ¶ Thus saith God the Lord, he that created the heavens, and stretched them out; he that spreadeth the earth, and that which cometh out of it; he that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein:

6 I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thy hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles;

7 To open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house.

Mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth;] Christ is emphatically styled God's beloved, and the son of his love (Matt. xvi. 17. John iii. 35. Eph. i. 6. Col. i. 13.) I have put my spirit upon him.] See the notes on xi. 2. xii. 1.

He shall bring forth judgment unto the gentiles.] He shall make known God's laws and judgments to them (see ver. 4.).

Ver. 2. He shall instruct those that oppose themselves with all meekness and gentleness; he shall patiently endure the contradictions of sinners against himself, and in angry or clamorous manner vindicate himself against their calumnies.

Ver. 3. A bruised reed shall he not break.] He will have a tender regard for afflicted consciences, and such as are bowed down under the burden of their sins: and where the least spark of grace appears, he will not quench it, but take the utmost care to keep it alive and improve it. After this example, St. Paul, in writing to the ministers of the church to "restore those who have been overtaken in a fault with the spirit of meekness" (Gal. vi. 1.), He shall bring forth judgment unto truth.] By this method he shall make the truth and justice of his cause appear against all gain-sayers, and obtain a complete victory over his adversaries; to which sense St. Matthew reads the sentence, till he send forth judgment unto victory; expressing the sense rather than the words of the original.

Ver. 4. He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth:] We may reasonably suppose, that this prophecy relates to the propagating of the gospel in the world, as that work was carried on, not only by Christ, but also by messengers. For Christ himself was "not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xxi. 24): and consequently, could be a "light to the gentiles" only as he commissioned others to preach the gospel to them (see Eph. ii. 17.). And taking the words in this comprehensive sense, they import, that our Saviour would not be discouraged at the difficulties he or his successors were like to meet with in the discharge of their office, but would still continue unwearyed in well-doing, till at last they should surmount all opposition, plant judgment and truth in the earth, and make the remotest parts of the world own their dependence upon him as their Lord, and submit to his laws.

The isles shall wait for his law.] By the isles are meant the gentiles (see the note on xi. 11.). In what sense they may be said to wait for Christ's law, see the note on ix. 9.

Ver. 6. I, the Lord have called thee in righteousness, &c.] I, who am God almighty, have called thee to this high dignity, to fulfill my righteous purposes (see xlii. 2.). And in order to that end, I will sustain and defend thee (see the note upon ver. 1.): and I
CHAPTER XLII.

8 I am the Lord: that is my name: and my glory will I not give to another, neither my praise to graven images.

9 Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare: before they spring forth I tell you of them.

10 Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise from the end of the earth, ye that go down to the sea, and all that is therein; the isles, and the inhabitants thereof.

11 Let the wilderness and the cities thereof lift up their voice, the villages that Kedar doth inhabit: let the inhabitants of the rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains.

12 Let them give glory unto the Lord, and declare his praise in the islands.

13 The Lord shall go forth as a mighty man, he shall stir up jealousy like a man of war: he shall cry, yea, roar; he shall prevail against his enemies.

14 I have long time holden my peace; I have been still, and refrained myself: now will I cry like a travailing woman; I will destroy and devour at once.

15 I will make waste mountains and hills, and dry up all their herbs; and I will make the rivers islands, and I will dry up the pools.

16 And I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them.

17 ¶ They shall be turned back; they shall be greatly ashamed, that trust in graven images, that say to the molten images, Ye are our gods.

am able to make my words good, because all things subsist by my word and decree, and all men owe their being and preservation to me (ver. 3).

And give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentilest. This can in no tolerable sense be applied to any but Christ, who is called the 'Angel of the covenant,' Mal. iii. 1, and was the 'Mediator of the new covenant,' into which both Jews and gentiles were to be admitted (see Jer. xxxi. 31).

Ver. 7. To open the blind eyes.] Compare Acts xvii. 18, which place seems to be a paraphrase upon this verse.

To bring out the prisoners from the prison, &c.] To free those from chains of their sins who were the captives of Satan (compare xxi. 1, Rom. viii. 21, 2 Tim. ii. 26, 2 Pet. ii. 19). To the same sense we may best explain that difficult text in St. Peter (1 Pet. iii. 19), concerning the 'spirits in prison,' to whom Christ is said to have preached by the ministry of Noah: understanding it of those wicked people of the old world who were under the bondage of sin and corruption, and whom the spirit of Christ, who was in the prophets from the beginning of the world (see 1 Pet. i. 11), endeavoured to reclaim by the ministry of Noah; who was 'a preacher of righteousness' (2 Pet. ii. 5), and in whose face of a hundred and twenty years (see Gen. vi. 3), 'while the ark was preparing,' exhorted the world to repentance, for fear the 'flood should come and sweep them all away:' God's spirit all that time 'striving with men,' and trying to reclaim them.

Ver. 8.] My name Jehovah denotes me to be the only true God, and I will assert my honour by vindicating the cause of my church and people, and not suffer my truth to be extinguished, nor false gods and false ways of worship to usurp that glory which is due to myself alone (compare xviii. 11). And this God did in an extraordinary manner, by the publishing of the gospel, which gave a fatal blow to the heathen idolatry. By another is meant a strange or false god, the word god being understood (see Ps. xvi. 4, and compare Isa. xlviii. 12).

Ver. 9.] The punctual accomplishment of my former predictions, ought to give credit to what I foretell now, though it seem a new and a strange thing to you.

Ver. 10.-12.] An exhortation to all the inhabitants of the earth, both far and near, and even the most barbarous people, such as were the Arabians who dwelt in Kedar (see Ps. cxxx. 5): all of them are exhorted to give glory to God, for his wonderful mercy in making himself known to the gentle world by the gospel (compare xlviii. 23, xlix. 13, lv. 12, Ps. xcvii. 11, &c. xviii. 4, &c.). The expressions here, and in the parallel texts, denote the joy to be so great and universal, that even the inanimate parts of the creation are partakers thereof, and are expected to bear a part in this general chorus.

Ver. 13. He shall stir up jealousy for his zeal like a man of war.] God is described here as rousing his indignation against his enemies, which had for some time lain asleep, and whetting his courage like a man of war, through a sense that his honour now lies at stake (compare 1 Pet. ii. 12), and falling upon his adversaries with the utmost fury.

Ver. 14.] God had been long silent, and not interposed in behalf of his own cause (compare Ps. lxviii. 1): and this his forbearance had increased the preemption of his enemies; he declares now that he could no longer contain himself, no more than a woman in the pangs of travail can forbear crying out; but he must give vent to his just resentment for the injuries offered to himself and his oppressed people, by bringing some exemplary punishment upon their oppressors. When men's provocations come to a great height, God is represented, in scripture, as if his patience were quite tired out, and he could no longer forbear punishing them (see Jer. xv. 3, xlv. 22).

Ver. 15.] As God's mercy is represented by "pouring water upon the thirsty ground" (see xxxvi. 6, 7, xlv. 3): so his wrath is described as if it were a consuming fire, which parches up everything, and reduces it to barrenness (see ver. 30 of this chapter, and l. 2, and Zech. x. 11). This was literally fulfilled in Cyrus's taking Babylon; when, in order to it, he drained the river Euphrates, by cutting several new channels to carry off the water, and marched his army through it into the city (see the note on xlv. 27).

Ver. 16.] If we understand the words of the people's return from captivity, they import, that God would provide means for their restoration which they did not think of, and would remove all impediments that might lie in the way of their return (compare xl. 4, Jer. xxxi. 9). In like manner God will enlighten the world by his gospel, and reduce men into the ways of truth, notwithstanding all the opposition that invertebrate error and prejudice can make to the contrary.

Ver. 17.] This must relate to that destruction of the heathen images and idolatrous worship which followed upon the settlement of Christianity in the Roman empire; and may receive a further accomplishment, as the truth of the gospel shall more and more
Isaiah

18 Hear, ye deaf; and look, ye blind, that ye may see.
19 Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I sent? who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord's servant?
20 Seeing many things, but thou observest not; opening the ears, but he heareth not.
21 The Lord is well pleased for his righteousness' sake; he will magnify the law, and make it honourable.
22 But this is a people robbed and spoiled; they are all of them snared in holes, and they are hid in prison houses: they are for a prey, and prevail in the world (see the note on i. 29). The words cannot be said to receive their just completion, in the destruction of the Babylonish monarchy by the Persians: for that turn of affairs gave no check to idolatry, the Persians being as much strangers to the true God as the Babylonians. Indeed, Strabo gives this testimony to the Persians, "Peripsi orizomeni Kai eis ton an蒯maton, "the Persians set up neither images nor altars" (lib. xv. Geograph.); but yet they represented the divine majesty by the external symbol of fire.

The phrase of being "turned back," signifies any disappointment, being a metaphor taken from the discomfiture of forces in war (see Ps. lxx. 3).

Ver. 18.] The prophet, speaking still in the person of God, now turns his discourse to the Jews, and upbraid them with their blindness and incorrigibility under all the means of instruction which had been afforded them. 'To this evil temper they were to ascribe all those judgments God had already inflicted upon them, which should at last end in a total captivity; and should have still more astonishing effects upon their rejecting the Messiah (compare vi. 10, 11, and see the notes upon that place).

Ver. 19. Who is blind, but my servant?] The prophets often upbraid the Jews with blindness, in not considering and laying to heart what they said to them from the mouth of God (see Jer. v. 21, Ezek. xiii. 2).

Or deaf, as my messenger that I sent?] This may be understood of some of the prophets (compare xlv. 16); several of whom were unfaithful in their office, and irregular in their lives (see xiii. 17. Jer. v. 31, xxiii. 14). The expression may comprehend the priests too, who are called likewise the "messengers of the Lord" (Mal. ii. 7).

Who is blind as he that is perfect.] That should be so by his profession. The word is mesehulam in the Hebrew; from whence the Arabic Musulman is derived, a title the Mahometans give to themselves.

Ver. 21.] The verse might be translated plainer thus: "The Lord took delight in this people for his righteousness' sake; he hath given them an excellent law, and their prophets made them an enviable (compare Deut. iv. 8—5). Their law, if they would have kept close to it, would have been both their ornament and defence.

Ver. 22.] A description of their miserable condition, when their city was taken, their country left, desolate, themselves made captives and slaves, or else forced to hide themselves in dens and caves, and even there in danger of being laid wait for, and caught by the enemy, without any body to plead for them, or assert their liberty.

Ver. 23.] Who among you captives, will take warning by the judgments you feel already!

Ver. 24. Who gave Jacob to the spoil, and Israel to the robers?] First to the Assyrians, and afterward to the Babylonians, who are called spoilers, xxi. 2, xxxii. 1.

Ver. 25.] This was literally fulfilled when the Chaldean army took their city, and burnt both that and their temple, 2 Kings xxx. 9 (compare likewise the 13th verse of this chapter). To know signifies sometimes the same as to consider (see Hos. vii. 9, and the note upon xxviii. 19).

CHAPTER XLIII.

I But now thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine.

not:] "God created thee for his glory," as it is explained ver. 7, 21, to be his peculiar people: so God's elect are called "the work of his hands," xxix. 23, xlv. 11, lx. 21. And those God "will not utterly forsake" (Ps. cxxxviii. 8). By Jacob and Israel are meant the two remaining tribes of Judah and Benjamin in the first place, as below ver. 22, 28, and above xli. 8, though it is probable that many of the promises mentioned here and in the following chapters, relate to that general restoration of the Jews so often spoken of by the prophets.

I have redeemed thee.] Out of the house of bondage, to be my peculiar people; and have ever since exercised a peculiar providence over you; and have abundantly testified my care of you.

I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine.] I have made a particular choice of thee for my peculiar-
CHAPTER XLIII.

2 When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee.

3 I will give Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee.

4 Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee; therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life.

5 Fear not: for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west;

6 I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth;

7 Even every one that is called by my name: for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him.

8 I will bring forth the blind people that have eyes, and the deaf that have ears.

9 Let all the nations be gathered together, and let the people be assembled: who among them can declare this, and shew us former things? let them bring forth their witnesses, that they may be justified: or let them hear, and say, It is truth.

10 Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, and my servant whom I have chosen: that ye may know and believe me, and understand that I am he; before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me.

11 I, even I, am the Lord; and beside me there is no saviour.

12 I have declared, and I have saved, and I have shewed, when there was no strange god among you: therefore ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God.

13 Yea, before the day was I am he; and there is none that can deliver out of my hand: I will work, and who shall let it?

14 ¶ Thus saith the Lord, your redeemer, the Holy One of Israel: For your sake have I sent to Babylon, and have brought down all their ships, and singed thee out from the rest of the world (see Exod. xxxi. 2); and ever since have treated thee with uncommon instances of kindness and familiarity. When a person of great dignity calls an inferior by his name, it is a token of a particular intimacy, and doing him a great deal of honour (compare xlv. 22).

Ver. 2.] I will deliver thee when thou art in the greatest straits and difficulties. To "pass through fire and water," is a proverbial expression, to signify being exposed to all kind of dangers (see Ps. lxvi. 12).

Ver. 3. I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee. This most interpreters understand of that diversion which the Egyptians, the Jews' allies, in conjunction with Tirshakah king of Ethiopia, gave to Sennacherib's forces, when they were just ready to fall upon the Jews (see xxxvi. 9, and notes upon xviii. 1). If we take the words in this sense, we must understand the Cush, or Ethiopia, mentioned in the thirty-seventh chapter, of Arabia, because it is joined here with Seba, which is part of that country (see likewise xlv. 14). It is certain that Cush sometimes signifies Arabia, though not always, as Bochart maintains. If we do not approve of this explication, this verse must relate to some historical passage not recorded elsewhere in scripture. Some, indeed, would refer the place to the destruction of the Ethiopians under Amon (2 Chron. xiv. 12); but I take those not to have been Ethiopians (and such probably are meant here), but Ethiopians properly so called, because they are joined with Lubims, 2 Chron. xvi. 8, who certainly are Africans.

Ver. 4. Therefore will I give men for thee. This the Chaldeans and their forces (see ver. 14).

Ver. 5. This may have partly been fulfilled in the return of the Jews from Babylon, and other countries under that monarchy; but withal they import some more general restoration of that nation (see xi. 11, 12); or else we may interpret the words of the gathering together of God's elect into one body (see Eph. i. 10, and the following verse here, and the following verse upon iv. 7).

Ver. 6. Every one that is called by the name of God's servant (see lxiii. 10, James ii. 7). The expressions denote the bringing the gentiles into the church, and making them "fellow-heirs, and of the same body" with the Jews; for he "hath created them too for his glory, and to show forth the praises of him that hath called them out of darkness into his marvellous light" (1 Pet. ii. 9, and compare xlix. 14, Amos. ix. 12; John xii. 29). The conversion of the Jews, and the bringing the gentiles into the church, will be coincident in time, and each of these events will help to advance and carry on the other (see the notes on lxvi. 12, 19).

Ver. 8.] The old translation, published under king Henry VIII. expresses the sense more plainly thus, "Bringing forth the people which is blind, and yet hath eyes; which are deaf, although they have ears." By which are meant the heathen idolators, who, like the images they worship, "have eyes and see not" (Ps. cxv. 7).

Ver. 9. Who among them can declare this? God makes the same challenge to the idolaters and their gods, which he did xlii. 21, 22.

Or let them hear, and say, It is truth.] If they cannot make good their own pretensions, let them hear what proof I have to allege on my side, and acknowledge that what I say is truth.

Ver. 10. Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, and my servants.] God's people and his prophets will always bear witness to his truth, who have received such poignant proofs of his divinity (see 1 John v. 10). By "my servant" is eminently meant the Messias (see xli. 1); who is expressly called "God's witness," lv. 4 (compare Rev. i. 5), although all God's messengers are in an inferior degree his witnesses, being "set for the defence and confirmation" of his truth (see John i. 7, Acts i. 5).

Before me there was no god formed.] An ironical expression, alluding to the forming or making of idols (see ver. 12).

Ver. 11. I have showed, when there was no strange god among you.] The sense might be plainer expressed thus, "I have shown [these things] and not any strange god among you." The word god is here understood, as it is in xlii. 8, and Ps. xvi. 4.

Ver. 12. Before the day was I am he.] Before all time, I am the same (compare Ps. xc. 2).

Ver. 13. For your sake I have sent to Babylon, and have brought down all their nobles.] The preter-pernibles, and the Chaldeans, whose cry is in the ships.
15 I am the Lord, your Holy One, the creator of Israel, your King.
16 Thus saith the Lord, which maketh a way in the sea, and a path in the mighty waters;
17 Which bringeth forth the chariot and horse, the army and the power; they shall lie down together, they shall not rise: they are extinct, they are quenched as tow.
18 Remember ye not the former things, neither consider the things of old.
19 Behold, I will do a new thing; now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it? I will even make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert.
20 The beast of the field shall honour me, the dragons and the owls: because I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, to give drink to my people, my chosen.

Ver. 18, 19.] The new wonders I will do for you shall obscure the memory of the old ones (see Jer. xxxii. 7, 8).

Ver. 19.] As of old I conducted my people through the wilderness, so that they wanted no sort of accommodation, either for meat or drink (see Deut. viii. 15, 16), so now I will give as proof of my presence with them, when I return their captivity (see xli. 18, 19).

Ver. 20. There shall be such plenty of water, that the beasts which dwell in the wilderness shall be refreshed by it, and shall join with my people in making their thankful acknowledgments for these miracles of my mercy (see the note on xiii. 10, 11). The dragons and owls are elsewhere joined together, as creatures which frequent solitary and desolate places (see Job xxx. 29, Mic. ii. 1, 8, and the notes upon xiii. 22 of this prophecy). The verse alludes to God's manner of supplying the Israelites with water in the wilderness (see note on xii. 17, 18).

Ver. 21.] See above, ver. 1, 7.

Ver. 22.] The prophet in this and the following verses, assigns the causes of the Jews' captivity, which were chiefly their forsaking the worship of the true God; not calling upon him in their trouble, but applying themselves to idols for help, and performing God's service in a careless manner, as if it were a tedious and unprofitable burden (see Mal. i. 13).

Ver. 23, 24. Thou hast not brought me the small cattle of thy burnt offerings; neither hast thou filled me with the fat of thy sacrifices.] The burnt-offerings were those which were all burnt or offered upon the altar, called here the lambs (our English reads the small cattle) of thy burnt-offerings, a lamb being always offered for the daily burnt-offering (Exod. xxix. 35). The sacrifices, properly so called, were those offerings, part of which belonged to the priest, or was eaten by those that offered the sacrifice, after the fat had been offered upon the altar (see Lev. iii. 16, iv. 31, vii. 23, 33). God complains here that he had not been honoured either of these ways: the meaning of which complaint is, that although the Jews were punctual in offering sacrifice (for, i. 11, he speaks of the multitude of their sacrifices as a burden to him), yet they did not perform this service with a devout mind; just as God saith (Amos v. 23), "Have ye offered to me sacrifices for forty years in the wilderness? That is, did you do it out of a religious principle, or a sincere regard to my honour? No; because, as it follows, you were fond of the idolatry you brought with you out of Egypt. To the same sense are those words of Zechariah (vii. 9), "Did ye at all fast to me, even to me?"

Or else the words of the text may relate to those idolatrous times, in the reigns of Ahaz and Manasseh, when the temple-service quite ceased, and the house of the Lord was shut up (see 2 Chron. xxiii. 24), or else profaned by having an idol set up in it, and idolatrous worship performed there (2 Kings xxii. 7).

I have not caused thee to serve with an offering, nor rewarded thee with incense.] My service has not been burdensome or expensive to thee. The offering here spoken of is the minchah, or bread-offering, for so the word should rather be rendered than meat offering, as our English translates it; for it answers to the ἄλωματα, and the μνήμα, or sacrifices, of the Greeks and Romans. This offering always accompanied the other sacrifices, and had frankincense laid upon it (see Lev. ii. 2, 15). These expressions countenance the latter interpretation of the foregoing words, and seem to import the discontinuance of the public worship in the temple; for to the same purpose it follows,

Ver. 24. Thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money.] To make the sweet incense; which was daily offered upon the altar, set apart for that purpose (see Exod. xxx. 7, 8, 34, 36, xl. 27, Eclesius. xxiv. 15).

But thou hast made me to serve with thy sins.] Instead of the service due to me from thee, thou hast
CHAPTER XLIV.

27 Thy first father hath sinned, and thy teachers have transgressed against me.

28 Therefore I have profaned the princes of made me undergo a sort of bondage by thy wicked practices, which have brought an ill report upon my name and religion (see Ezek. xxxvi. 30), and have quite tired out my patience (compare Amos ii. 13, Matt. xxii. 13).

Ver. 26. Put me in remembrance.] Put me in remembrance of thy good deeds, if thou hast anything to allege in thy own behalf; I should be glad if thou couldst acquit thyself of the crimes laid to thy charge.

Ver. 27. ] Your ancestors, reckoning from Adam downward, have been sinners, and you have trod in their steps (compare Ezek. xvi. 3). And your prophets and teachers, who ought to have been guides to the people, have led them into sin and error (see the note upon xlii. 19).

Ver. 28. Therefore I have profaned the princes of the sanctuary; I have suffered the Babylonians to profane my sanctuary, to abuse the chief priests, and pollute whatsoever is sacred (compare xlvii. 6, Lam. ii. 6, 7, iv. 14).

And have given Jacob to the curse, and Israel to reproaches. ] Made them a proverb of execration and reproach to all the neighbouring nations (compare Psalms lixix. 4, Jer. xxiv. 9, Daniel ix. 19, Zechar. viii. 13.) The words are addressed to the Jews, as if they were already in captivity (see ver. 14).

CHAPTER XLIV.

1 Yet now hear, O Jacob my servant; and Israel, whom I have chosen:

2 Thus saith the Lord that made thee, and formed thee from the womb, which will help thee: Fear not, O Jacob, my servant; and thou, Jesurun, whom I have chosen.

3 For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring;

4 And they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water courses.

5 One shall say, I am the Lord's; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel.

6 Thus saith the Lord the King of Israel, and his redeemer the Lord of hosts; I am the first, and I am the last; and beside me there is no God.

7 And who, as I, shall call, and shall declare it, and set it in order for me, since I appointed the ancient people? and the things that are coming, and shall come, let them shew unto them.

8 Fear ye not, neither be afraid: have not I of watering barren land (see xl. 9, xxvi. 25, xli. 18, and the notes upon these last two places).

Ver. 4.] They shall flourish as if they were planted in rich meadows, or by the banks of rivers (compare Ps. i. 3).

Ver. 5. One shall say, I am the Lord's;] This relates to the increase of the church by the accession of the gentiles (see ver. 3).

Another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord.] Some render it, "Another shall write upon his hand, I am the Lord's," as if the expression alluded to the custom of soldiers receiving a mark upon their hands, to signify to what commander they belonged. See Dr. Spencer, De Legib. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 14, sect. 1, where he observes that idolaters often had a mark or character of the god they worshipped, imprinted upon their hand or shoulder; in allusion to which custom, it is said of the worshippers of antichrist, that they "receive his mark in their hand" (Rev. xiii. 16, xiv. 9).

Ver. 7.] "God, who is the first and the last" (ver. 6), claims to himself the ordering and disposing of all the affairs of the world, from the time that he created man upon it; or from the time that he chose Abraham and his family to be his peculiar people; over whom he hath all along exercised a particular providence, and hath from time to time foreshown what should befall them, which accordingly hath come to pass. An instance of prescience which none of the idols are able to pretend to (compare xlii. 4, 22, xliii. 9, xlv. 21, xlviii. 3).

Ver. 8. Fear ye not.] Do not distrust my care and providence over you (see ver. 21).
told thee from that time, and have declared it? yea are even my witnesses. Is there a God beside me? yea, there is no God; I know not any.

9 ¶ They that make a graven image are all of them vanity; and their delectable things shall not profit; and they are their own witnesses; they see not, nor know; that they may be ashamed.

10 Who hath formed a god, or molten a graven image that is profitable for nothing!

11 Behold, all his fellows shall be ashamed: and the workmen, they are of men: let them all be gathered together, let them stand up, and let them come forward. Yea, let them bring their arguments, and let them stand forth.

12 The smith with the tongs both worketh in the coals, and fashioneth it with hammers. And worketh it with the strength of his arms: yea, he is hungry, and his strength faileth: he dranketh no water, and is faint.

13 The carpenter stretcheth out his rule; he marketh it out with a line; he fitteth it with planes, and he marketh it out with the compass, and maketh it after the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man: that it may remain in the house.

14 He heweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypress and the oak, which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest: he planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it.

15 Then shall it be for a man to burn: for he will take thereof, and warm himself; yea, he kindleth it, and baketh bread; yea, he maketh a god, and worshippeth it: he maketh it a graven image, and faileth down thereon.

16 He burneth part thereof in the fire; with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth rost, and eateth it; and shall set it for his god, and say, Thus will I worship him. Aha, I am warm; I have seen the fire!

17 And the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image: he falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it, and prayeth unto it, and sittest, Deliver me; for thou art my god.

18 They have not known, they are a foolish nation, there is none among them that knoweth the hand of the Lord, or the knowledge of the God of Israel.

19 And none considereth in his heart, neither other men, and that his god is not able to preserve his life: Some think the words express the eager zeal of the workman, who deems himself necessary refreshment, that he may finish the work he hath undertaken.

Ver. 13.] In this and the following verses, the prophet, with great smartness of argument, exposes the absurdity of image worship: for what an absurdity is it for a man to dress his meat and make his gods with his own hands; or to think, that a piece of timber hath any more divinity in it than it had before, because it is fashioned and carved into the figure of a man.

This way of arguing does not suppose that the heathens took their images for gods: for that is a contradiction in terms, and as absurd as to think that a man and his picture are the same things; but the design of the prophet's argument is, to show the absurdity of setting up images as the resemblances of God, and the representative objects of worship; or the supposing them to have some divine power lodged within them; inasmuch as they have no qualities that answer such a character, being ended neither with power, life, nor understanding; and are indeed nothing but what they appear to be, bare, senseless matter, wood, or stone. Besides that, nothing is a greater dishonor to God, than to suppose him like the image of a corruptible creature. For the same reason, the author of the book of Wisdom makes the worship of images more inexcusable than the worship of the heavenly bodies, or of the elements, those upon the account of their representation (Wisd. xiii. 2, 10).

Ver. 14. Which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest.] Which he had picked out as fit for his purpose, and nourished up till it came to its due growth.

Ver. 15. Yea, he maketh a god.] Of the remaining part (see ver. 17).

Ver. 16. With part thereof he eateth flesh!] He dresseth flesh, in order to eat it (ver. 10).

Ver. 18. For he hath shut their eyes.] The old translation expresseth the sense better, "their eyes are stopped:" for the verb transliterate is often taken in an impersonal sense (see xxii. 19). So Exod. vii. 13, we is there knowledge nor understanding to say, I have burned part of it in the fire; yea, also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof; I have roasted flesh, and eaten it: and shall I make the residue thereof an abomination! shall I fall down to the stock of a tree! 20 He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?

21 o Remember these, O Jacob and Israel; for thou art my servant: I have formed thee, thou art my servant: O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of me. 22 I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins: return unto me; for I have redeemed thee.

23 Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it: shout, ye lower parts of the earth:

“Is there knowledge nor understanding to say, I have burned part of it in the fire; yea, also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof; I have roasted flesh, and eaten it: and shall I make the residue thereof an abomination! shall I fall down to the stock of a tree! 20 He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand? 21 o Remember these, O Jacob and Israel; for thou art my servant: I have formed thee, thou art my servant: O Israel, thou shalt not be forgotten of me. 22 I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins: return unto me; for I have redeemed thee. 23 Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it: shout, ye lower parts of the earth: read, “He hardened Pharaoh’s heart;” it is explained in the next verse, by “Pharaoh’s heart was hardened.” Thus Isa. ix. 6, the Hebrew reads, “He shall call his name Wonderful,” &c., which our English translation rightly renders, “His name shall be called Wonderful,” &c. Again, Luke xii. 20, it is in the Greek, “They require thy soul of thee;” which our interpreters translate, “Thy soul shall be required of thee.”

Ver. 20. He feedeth on ashes.] As ashes have no nourishment, so his zeal and devotion shall not avail him.

A deceived heart hath turned him aside.] Vulgar errors and prejudice have perverted his understanding, that he cannot discern the most gross and palpable falsehood, nor free himself from the delusions of it. The old English translation does very well express the sense of this verse: “Thus doth he but lose his labour, and his heart, which is deceived, doth turn him aside,” &c.

Ver. 32. The protor-perfect tense may here stand for the future, as in many other places (see xlii. 11). God encourages them to trust in his mercy, by assuring them, that upon their repentance he will so fully forgive their sins, that no sign of his displeasure shall appear, and they shall never rise up in judgment against them any more, just as a cloud vanished when it is dispersed by the sun or the wind. The same metaphor is used by Demosthenes, in a sentence which Longinus does very much admire, τον ἔκθρησμον, cap. 34. γένεται ἐπὶ τὴν ἀπειθετὴν καὶ τὴν ἁμαρτησεν ἀπειθετὴν την ορθήν ὃ τοις ἁμαρτήσασθαι: “That vote made the danger which before hung over the city vanish like a cloud.” This general pronouncement of pardon, “is a preaching of the gospel beforehand,” as St. Paul speaks, and is designed, as many of the promises in the prophets are, to prepare men’s minds for the receiving it (see Acts xiii. 38, 39; xvi. 30, 31; Rom. vi. 47).

Ver. 33. An apostrophe to the whole creation, to join in praising God for his wonderful mercies; which shows that they are such as all the world are some way concerned in: and such are only the mercies of the gospel, for which the earth ought to rejoice, because the benefits of it are extended to all mankind, and the angels in heaven will sympathize with men break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein: for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified himself in Israel.

24 Thus saith the Lord, thy redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord that maketh all things: that stretcheth forth the heavens alone: that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself;

25 That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad: that turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish;

26 That confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers: that saith to Jerusalem. Thou shalt be inhabited; and to the cities of Judah, Ye shall be built, and I will raise up the decayed places thereof:

27 That saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers:

below, because their joy in the conversion and salvation of mankind, and in their being reunited to that blessed society of which Christ is the head, are mentioned here, who have the least share in this redemption. But I think St. Paul hath long ago answered this objection, when he tells us, that the “children of the promise are counted for the true seed of Israel” (Rom. ix. 25). We will allow Mr. White, that the redemption of the Jews from captivity may be primarily intended here as a type of a more general redemption to be accomplished by Christ; but to confine the words to the former sense, exclusive of the latter, is neither agreeable to the genuine import of the words, nor to the general sense of the Christian church.

Ver. 25. God taketh pleasure in confounding the wisdom of the wise men of the world, and baffling the fine schemes of human policy, especially those forbidden arts of divination, which the Chaldeans so much valued (see xlvii. 11, Jer. 1. 96).

Ver. 36. But as he discovers the folly and madness of such false prophets, so he punctually fulfills the promises of his own prophets. The title of God’s servant does eminently belong to the Messiah in this prophecy, who was “that prophet that should come into the world” (see note on xlii. 1); but is in a lower sense ascribed to other prophets, and may here he understood of Isaiah himself (compare xliii. 1, 10): and God’s messengers are as well those prophets that lived before Isaiah’s time, such as are Hosea, Joel, and Amos; as those who followed, such as Jeremy, Micah, Ezekiel, &c. who all foretold the restoration of the Jews.

Ver. 37. God opened a way for Cyrus to take Babylon, by suggesting to him a method for draining the river Euphrates, and making it passable for his army, (compare Jer. i. 28, 22. 80).

Ver. 28. I will make them an instrument in gathering my people together, and leading them home as a shepherd does his flock. Kings and princes are often styled shepherds in scripture (see Jer. vi. 3, xlii. 19, 1. 6; Zech. xi. 8, 10). So in Homer, Agamemnon is often called τύμπανα καλάς, “the sheep herd of the people.”

This is one of the most remarkable prophecies of CHAPTER XLV.

ARGUMENT.—The subject is much the same with that of the former chapter, concerning Cyrus's commission from God, and the successes he will bless him with: then follows an exhortation to the people, to wait God's time for their deliverance, which is not unmindful of them, and will magnify his own glory in their salvation. In the latter part of the chapter, the prophet seems to carry his views to another restoration of his people at the latter times, when they shall be converted to the Christian faith, and return from their several dispersions.

Ver. 1. Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus. God gives the title of anointed to Cyrus, the same which is usually given to David and other kings of the Jews, who were God's immediate deputies, to show that he was raised up to be an immediate instrument of Providence, in restoring the Jews' captivity. Many of the ancient fathers understand this verse of Christ; which opinion is partly occasioned by some of the copies of the Septuagint, which read Κορήδων for Κορής, which reading is followed by Barnabas in his epistle (ch. 4), as also by Tertullian, Cyril, and others. But that the deliverance here foretold was a figure of the redemption to be accomplished by Christ, plainly appears from several passages in this chapter, and particularly from ver. 8, 17, 20, &c. And as our learned Mr. Thorn- dike hath observed, Cyrus may as well be a figure of Christ as Nebuchadnezzar. Antiochus Epiphanes, the prince of Tyre, and other idolatrous and persecuting tyrants, are spoken of in the prophets, as types and forerunners of antichrist (see his book De Jure finiendi. Controvers. cap. 4. p. 58).

Whose right hand I have holden.] See xli. 10.

I will loose the lions of kings.] As girding, or "girding the loins," signifies enduing with strength (see ver. 9), so "loosing the lions" is taking away men's strength or courage, and leaving them no power to make resistance (see Dan. v. 6, and the notes upon Isa. v. 27).

To open before him the two leaved gates.] To give him admittance into cities and palaces (see the following verse mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me.

Ver. 2. I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight; I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron.

Ver. 3. And I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I, the Lord, which call thee by thy name, am the God of Israel.

Ver. 4. For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me.

Ver. 5. If I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God beside me: I girded thee, though thou hast not known me:

Ver. 6. That they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none beside me. I am the Lord, and there is none else.

Ver. 7. I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things.

Ver. 2. I will go before thee.] See the note on xl. 3.

Ver. 3. I will give thee the treasures of darkness.] Such as are laid up safe, and never see the light. Grotius hath observed out of Pliny, what immense riches Cyrus found in his conquests: the Babylonian empire being of ancient fame and greatness, and Asia that part of the world which was most remarkable, at that time, for its riches and luxury.

Ver. 4. I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me.] Beside the name of Cyrus, I have given thee the surname of my anointed, and my shepherd, and I have taken this particular notice of thee, not for thine own sake, who art a stranger to the true God, but for the sake of my people Israel, that thou mayest be their deliverer.

Ver. 5. I girded thee, though thou hast not known me.] It is I that endued thee with strength for war (see Ps. xviii. 30), though thou art ignorant of me. Cyrus was bred among idolaters, but afterwards was instructed by the Jews in the knowledge of the true God, as appears from Ezra i. 2.

Ver. 6.] My interposing so visibly in behalf of my own people, and returning their captivity by such unexpected means, will convince the heathen part of the world that I am the only true God (see Ps. cii. 15, 16).

Ver. 7. The latter part of the sentence explains the former: light being often put for happiness, and darkness for adversity. The sense is, that all the vicissitudes of good or ill success are to be ascribed to Providence: God sets up one kingdom, that of Cyrus, and pulls down another, the Babylonian monarchy.

I form the light, and I create darkness.] Dr. Prideaux hath given a clear account of this sentence:
CHAPTER XLV.

8 Drop down, ye heavens, from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness: let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together; I the Lord have created it. 9 Woe unto him that strives with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioned it, What makest thou? or thy work? He hath no hands! 10 Woe unto him that saith unto his father, What begettest thou? or to the woman, What hast thou brought forth?

II Thus saith the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, and his Maker, Ask me of things to come concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands command ye me. 12 I have made the earth, and created man upon it: I, even my hands, have stretched out the heavens, and all their host have I commanded. 13 I have raised him up in righteousness, and I will direct all his ways: he shall build my city, and he shall let go my captives, not for price nor reward, saith the Lord of hosts. 14 Thus saith the Lord, The labour of Ver. 12.] The words assure us, that God is able to make good whatever he promises (compare xiii. 5, xlv. 24). Ver. 13. I have raised him up in righteousness.] This is to be immediately understood of Cyrus, whom God raised up to be the instrument of executing the divine justice upon the Babylonians, and fulfilling God's mercy towards the Jews. In this particular he was a type of Christ, as hath been observed upon xlii. 2.

He shall build my city.] He shall give orders for the building it (Ezra i. 2). [Cyrus only gave order for the building of the temple (Ezra i. 2); but the consequence of that would be the rebuilding of the city, as being the metropolis of the kingdom, and the place to which the whole nation were to repair at their solemn feasts. Compare xlv. 28.]

He shall let go my captives, not for price nor reward.] Princes are commonly governed by politic considerations, and expect a reward for their labour (see Exek. xxxix. 18). There being nothing of that kind to move Cyrus to restore the Jewish captivity, that resolution could proceed only from a divine impulse. The words may likewise be fitly applied to the freedom of that redemption which Christ hath obtained for us (compare ii. 3).

Ver. 14. The labour of Egypt, &c.] This verse cannot be understood of Cyrus's conquests, as Grotius and some others do explain it; for the words the and thing so often repeated in this verse, are all of the feminine gender in the Hebrew, and consequently must be understood of Jerusalem, the city mentioned ver. 13. Therefore I conceive the place is principally meant of the flourishing state of the church (often described under the figure of a city) when the gentile world should come into it, bring in their riches to the adorning and support of it, and submit themselves to its government, as being the only seat and temple of truth (compare xviii. 7, xxiii. 18, xlix. 23, ix. 9, 10, 14, 16, Ps. lxviii. 30, 31).

The words may be supposed in some degree verified in Cyrus's devoting the tribute coming out of those rich provinces of Egypt, Ethiopia, and Soba, to the building and service of God's temple. Some of the succeeding Persian monarchs settled revenues upon the temple for the offering sacrifices for themselves and their families (see Ezra vi. 10) The same was done in aftertimes by Alexander the Great, and several of the Syrian and Egyptian kings (see 2 Macc. iii. 2, 3, v. 16), and some of the Roman emperors, as may be seen in Josephus, particularly lib. i. De Bell. Jud. cap. 17, and Philo's Legatio ad Calum.

Ethiopia probably means here Arabia, being joined to Soba (see the note on xxxii. 8).

Men of stature.] The Chaldean paraphrase explains it by "men of merchandise," such as deal in weights and measures; which sense agrees very well with the 19 I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth: I said not unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain: I the Lord speak righteousness, I declare things that are right.

20 ¶ Assemble yourselves and come; draw near together, ye that are escaped of the nations: they have no knowledge that set up the wood of their graven image, and pray unto a god that cannot save.

21 Tell ye, and bring them near; yea, let them take counsel together: who hath declared this from ancient time? who hath told it from that time? have not I the Lord? and there is no God else beside me; a just God and a Saviour; there is none beside me.

22 Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else.

23 I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not Hebrew, and better with the scope of the place than the common interpretation.

In chains they shall come over; they shall confess themselves to be conquered, and yield submission. The phrase alludes to the custom of carrying captives in triumph with chains about their necks: see Ps. cxlix. 8, which Psalm both Jews and Christians interpret of the days of the Maccabees.

Ver. 15.] This may be understood with respect to the unsearchableness of God's counsels, spoken of before, ver. 9, 10, in which sense our first translators at the Reformation understood it, and render the verse, "O how profound art thou, the God and Saviour of Israel!" Or else it may be spoken with regard to the times when God hid away his face, and seemed to neglect his people (compare lxi. 17, Ps. xlv. 24). Whereas he doth now openly show himself in their favour, to the shame and confusion of idolaters, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 16.] See the note on ver. 6. This and many other passages, where the prophet foretells the confusion and destruction of idolatry, have a plain aspect upon the overthrow of the heathen idolatry, upon the planting of the gospel in those parts. They relate to the times of the gospel (see the notes upon ver. 18, 23).

Ver. 15.] The words are commonly explained to this purpose, that if God did not create the world to lie empty and uninhabited, much less will he suffer the lot of his own inheritance, Judea, to lie desolate, but will certainly restore its captivity: the establishing a political government being sometimes expressed by creating (see the notes on li. 16); but I think this sense hardly comes up to the full import of the words. Mr. Mede, p. 578 of his Works, hath observed, that at the eleventh verse God condescends to declare to his servants the "things that are to come:" and St. Paul hath applied the twenty-third verse to the day of judgment (Rom. xiv. 11); so that, in that learned person's judgment, the scope of the place directed to exclaim li. of that "new heaven and new earth wherein dwells righteousness," which St. Peter tells us we are to expect at the end of the world, "according to God's promise" (2 Pet. iii. 13); which promise must relate to some of the prophecies of the Old Testament, which speak of that matter. This earth, the text saith, "God created not in vain:" that is, not to be "subject to vanity," as the present earth is (see Rom. viii. 20), but to be inhabited by the mystical Israel, whom shall be "saved with an everlasting salvation" (ver. 17). These are the same who are called the "escaped of the nations" (ver. 20), and those that are "saved out of all the ends of the earth" (ver. 22). What is said also in ver. 14 hath some relation to the latter times, as may be gathered by comparing it with some of the parallel texts referred to in the notes.

Ver. 19. I have not spoken in secret.] I have delivered my laws, and will plainly and perspicuously, not in dark and dubious terms, such as the heathen oracles were delivered in, which were spoken out of eaves and grottos.

I said not—Seek ye me in vain: The worship of idols is often condemned as vainly and lost labour (see the following verse, and ch. xliii. 20, Jer. x. 5).

I the Lord speak righteousness.] My laws are all of them holy, just, and good: whereas the most profound mysteries of their heathen gods consisted in impure and obscene rites.

Ver. 20. Draw near together, ye that are escaped of the nations:] Ye Jews, that are returned home from several parts of the world, whither ye have been dispersed, assemble yourselves together, and return solemn thanks to God for your deliverance (see the notes on xliii. 21), and consider what proofs he hath given of his power, in protecting his people, sufficient for ever to confound and silence the idols and their worshippers.

Mr. Mede, p. 915 of his Works, supposes those that are escaped of the nations here, to be the same with the nations of them that are saved, or escape, mentioned Rev. xxi. 24, and thinks this interpretation is confirmed by ver. 22 of this chapter: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth" (see likewise ver. 18).

Ver. 21. Tell ye, and bring them near:] A general challenge to the idols, to give such proofs of their divinity, by foretelling things to come (compare xil. 1, xii. 8, xiv. 7).

Who hath told it from that time?] Or rather, "from the beginning:" (see note on xiv. 8).

Ver. 22. This relates to the calling of the gentiles, and especially to the bringing in the fulness of the gentiles at the end of the world (see Rom. xi. 25, Matt. xxi. 14, and the following note).

Ver. 23. And shall not return, &c.] That is, it shall be fully accomplished (compare lv. 11). Here God confirms by an oath the truth of what was foretold, ver. 22. That the time should certainly come when CHAPTER XLVI.

1 Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth, their idols were upon the beasts, and upon the cattle; your carriages were heavy laden; they are a burden to the weary beast.

2 They stoop, they bow down together; they could not deliver the burden, but themselves are gone into captivity.

3 § Hearken unto me, O house of Jacob, and all the remnant of the house of Israel, which are borne by me from the belly, which are carried from the womb:

4 And even to your old age I am he; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you: I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry, and will deliver you.

CHAP. XLVI.

ARGUMENT.—The chapter begins with foretelling the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, who is particularly described, ver. 11. From thence the prophet takes occasion to insult over the Babylonish idols, who could neither preserve themselves nor their worshippers: and he exhorts the Jews still to trust in God, who had, from the beginning of their nation, nourished them with the tenderness of a parent; and who, by foretelling things at the greatest distance, gave an undeniable proof that all events were at his disposal.

Ver 1. Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth.] Two principal idols of the Babylonians: Bel is the same with Baal, as Selden conjectures (De Dios Syris, Syntagni. i. cap. 2). Nebo gave names to several of their kings, as Nabonassar, Nebuchadnezzar, &c. (see note on xxxix. 1). The image of these deities were carried in triumph by the Persians, as part of the spoils, as it was usual for conquerors to do, in token of a complete victory (see Grotius upon the place). Livy records it as an instance of the moderation of Publius Maximus, that when he retook Tarentum, he would not suffer the statues of their gods to be carried with the rest of the plunder, but said, "Re-

5 § To whom will ye liken me, and make me equal, and compare me, that we may be like?

6 They lavish gold out of the bag, and weigh silver in the balance, and hire a goldsmith; and he maketh it a god: they fall down, yea, they worship.

7 They bear him upon the shoulder, they carry him, and set him in his place, and he standeth; from his place shall he not remove: yea, one shall cry unto him, yet can he not answer, nor save him out of his trouble.

8 Remember this, and shew yourselves men: bring it again to mind, O ye transgressors.

9 Remember the former things of old: for I liningamus Tarentinis Deos iratos " (lib. xxvii. cap. 15).

Ver. 2.] The deities which were worshipped in the idols, could not deliver their own images, which became burdensome to those that carried them away, so that the gods themselves must own that they are conquered too. The expressions in this and the former verse allude to the custom of carrying idols in procession, which was a solemn piece of worship paid to them; whereas now they were carried about by their enemies, by way of contempt and derision.

Ver. 5. Hearken to me, O Jacob, and—Israel.] The same which are called Jacob and Israel, xliii. 1 (see the note there), and xlv. 1.

Which are carried from the womb.] The expressions allude to the carrying of idols, either in procession (ver. 7), or in triumph (ver. 1). Instead of being carried by his worshippers, as the helpless idols are, God carries and supports his people, as a father does his children in his arms (see Dent. i. 31).

Ver. 4. I am he;] Or, "I am the same God:" so the phrase is translated, Ps. cii. 27.

Ver. 6.] The same argument against idolatry, which was made use of xl. 19, xli. 6, xlv. 12. It was very proper to repeat this argument often, for the sake of those that were to live among the Babylonians.

11 Calling a ravenous bird from the east, the man that executeth my counsel from a far country, where authority and custom would powerfully recommend idolatry (compare Jer. x. 1, &c. Baruch vi).

Ver. 8. Show yourselves men.] By making use of your reason, whereas the idolators are made useless as the images which they worship (see Ps. cxv. 8).

Ver. 9.] Remember what I have formerly done for you, both in Egypt, and after your settlement in Canaan.

Ver. 10.] The same argument of God’s power and providence, which is insisted on xlv. 7, xlv. 21.

My counsel shall stand.] God’s foretelling the most distant and casual events, is a sensible proof of his overruling providence.

Ver. 11. Calling a ravenous bird from the east.] A description of Cyrus, whom God is said to have “raised up from the east” (xlii. 2, 25). Conquerors that overrun and ravage whole countries, are elsewhere compared to birds of prey (see Ezek. xvii. 3, 4, Exod. xii. 11).

The man that executeth my counsel] See xlv. 25, xlv. 18.

CHAPTER XLVII.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet had intimated the destruction of the Babylonish monarchy in a few words, at the beginning of the last chapter; and here he foretells it more plainly, and denounces it as a just judgment upon that government for its cruelty and pride: the unexpectedness of such a calamity adding great weight to it, being such a surprising turn of affairs, as none of the Chaldean arts of divination could foresee, or be able to prevent.

Ver. 1. Come down, and sit in the dust. O virgin daughter of Babylon, sit on the ground: there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans: for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate.

2 Take the millstones, and grind meal: uncover thy locks, make bare the leg, uncover the thigh, pass over the rivers.

3 Thy nakedness shall be uncovered, yea, thy shame shall be seen: I will take vengeance, and I will not meet thee as a man.

4 As for our redeemer, the Lord of hosts is his name, the Holy One of Israel.

5 Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans: for thou shalt no more be called, The lady of kingdoms.

6 ¶ I was wroth with my people, I have polishing in which thou didst pride thyself, as marks of thy state; and the persons of the greatest quality shall be despoiled of their dignity, and carried captives in a mean and ragged condition.

Uncover the thigh, pass over the rivers.] Those who are bred in the nicest degree of tenderness shall be stripped naked, and forced to go barefoot over rivers, when they are led captives by the Persians.

Ver. 3. Thy nakedness] See note on iii. 17.

I will not meet thee as a man.] Thou shalt feel the most dreadful effects of my anger, and I will show no humanity or pity towards thee. The latter part of the sentence sounds literally thus, “I will not meet a man,” which seems to be a hypallage, or an inverted sentence, for “a man shall not meet me;” i. e. no man shall put a stop to my fury, by endeavouring to succour thee: nor shall any intercession for thee prevail with me (see Jer. vii. 16, xv. 1, Ezek. xiv. 14). The verb pessar is sometimes used for making intercession (see Lii. 12).

Ver. 4. As for our redeemer,] See Jer. l. 34.

Ver. 5.] Silence and darkness are opposed to that noise and gaiety which are seen in rich and populous cities, which being destroyed are reduced to a melancholy silence and solitude. The same thing is expressed in Jeremy, by “taking away the voice of mirth, and the light of the candle” (Jer. xxxv. 10).

Babylon hath been for many ages a heap of ruins; for try; yea, I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it.

12 ¶ Hearken unto me, ye stouthearted, that are far from righteousness:

13 I bring near my righteousness; it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry: and I will place salvation in Zion for Israel my glory.

From a far country:] Cyrus’ army was made up of confederates of very distant nations (see Jer. 1. 11).

Ver. 12. Ye stouthearted.] Or, “ye stubborn-hearted” as it is better translated in the Bishop’s Bible, published under queen Elizabeth; such as do not think it reasonable to acquiesce in my promises, which whoever believeth, it “shall be counted to him for righteousness” (Gen. xv. 6).

Ver. 13. I bring near my righteousness:] I will give visible instances of my mercy and fidelity, and place them before the eyes of those that are most insensible of them; and the salvation of my people shall not be delayed beyond the prefixed time appointed for the accomplishment of it (compare Hab. ii. 3, and see the note upon xiii. 22).

I will place salvation in Zion, for Israel my glory.] Or, “I will give salvation [in or to] Zion, and my glory to Israel;” as the translation just now mentioned renders the words.

luted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercy; upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke.

7 ¶ And thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever: so that thou didst not lay these things to thy heart, neither didst remember the latter end of it.

8 Therefore hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children:

9 But these two things shall come to thee in a moment in one day, the loss of children, and widowhood: they shall come upon thee in their perfection for the multitude of thy sorceries, and for the great abundance of thine enchantments.

10 ¶ For thou hast trusted in thy wickedness: the city Bagdad, commonly taken for the same place, is situate three days' journey from it (see the note upon xiii. 19).

Ver. 6. I have polluted mine inheritance.] Whereas I formerly appropriated Judea to myself, and distinguished it from all other countries by peculiar marks of my favour and protection, now I laid it open to the insults of idolaters, and suffer them to profane the city and sanctuary which was called by my name.

Thou didst shew them no mercy. 1] God often punishes the persons, whom he makes instruments of his vengeance upon others, for those very things which they did by his appointment, because they exceeded their commission, and were more intent upon satisfying their own ambition and cruelty, than executing his commands [so Isa. x. 7, the prophet speaking of the Assyrian, whom he calls "the rod of God's anger," adds "howbeit he meaneth not so," his intent is not to execute God's will, "but it is in his heart to destroy and cut off nations;" he intends only to satisfy his revenge and ambition.] See Zech. i. 15, where God saith of the Babylonians, "I was but a little displeased [with my people] and they helped forward their affliction." For the same reason God saith, Hos. i. 4, that "he will avenge the blood of his saints of his land," andbronze was expressly commanded to smite the house of Ahab (2 Kings ix. 7). But he exceeded his commission, when he slew all Ahab's great men, or officers of state; and when he had destroyed the family of Ahab (2 Kings x. 11, 14).

Upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke.] Thou hast showed no pity upon old folks, whose age commands respect, and whose feebleness deserves compassion [compare Deut. xxviii. 50].

Ver. 7. ¶ I shall always be the chief city and mistress of the world (see ver. 5), and shall never know any change of fortune: whereas the consideration of the instability of all worldly greatness, should have induced thee to use thy success with moderation.

Ver. 8. I am, and none else beside me.] Words full of insolence and blasphemy, whereby she arrogated that self-sufficiency to herself, which belongs to none but God [see xlv. 5].

I shall not sit as a widow.] Cities are commonly described as the mothers of their inhabitants, and their kings and princes as their husbands. And when they are bereaved of these, they are said to be widows and childless [see iii. 35, xlix. 21]. As Babylon, in the pride of her heart, thought herself exempt from the calamities of fortune; so mystical Babylon is described as guilty of the same pride and carnal security thou hast said, None seeth me. Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee; and thou hast said in thine heart, I am, and none else beside me.

11 ¶ Therefore shall evil come upon thee: thou shalt not know from whence it riseth: and mischief shall fall upon thee: thou shalt not be able to put it off: and desolation shall come upon thee suddenly, which thou shalt not know.

12 Stand now with thine enchantments, and with the multitude of thy sorceries, wherein thou hast laboured from thy youth; if so be thou shalt be able to profit, if so be thou mayest prevail.

13 Thou art weary in the multitude of thy counsels. Let now the astrologers, the stargazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up, and save thee from these things that shall come upon thee.

14 Behold, they shall be as stubble; the fire

For the multitude of thy sorceries.] By sorceries may either be meant those forbidden arts of divination, mentioned more particularly ver. 13, or else the wicked schemes of worldly policy, whereby great and potent kingdoms oppress and undermine lesser states and principalities [compare Nah. iii. 4].

Ver. 10. Thou hast trusted in thy wickedness: thou hast said, None seeth me.] Thou hast thought that thy cunning and policy would still support thee, and that God did not regard thee, and would never call thee to an account for all thy envious devices.

Thy wisdom and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee.] The words may mean, either thy skill in the arts of human policy; or else thy pretended fore-knowledge of future events by the positions of the heavens; the Chaldeans being famous all the world over for their skill in astrology.

Ver. 11.] With all thy skill in fortune-telling, thou shalt not be able to foresee the evil that is coming upon thee, or to prevent it.

Ver. 13. Thou art weary in the multitude of thy counsels.] The several projects thou hast tried to divert thy calamities, are all lost labour [compare lvii. 10].

Ver. 14. They shall be as stubble.] They shall have no more power to withstand the calamities coming upon them, than stubble hath to resist the violence of the fire [see xl. 24, xli. 2].

There shall not be a coal to warm at.] They shall be utterly consumed, so as to be reduced to ashes, and not so much as a coal left that may give warmth or afford comfort [compare xxx. 14].

Ver. 15.] The words may more plainly be rendered thus: "Thus shall thy merchants deal with thee, with whom thou hast laboured, even from thy youth." By merchants are meant either the dealers in the deceitful wares of divination and astrology [compare ver. 12]; or, in general, any of those cunning factors (so shall burn them: they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame: there shall not be a coal to warm at, nor fire to sit before it.

The word is used (Hos. xii.), who have contributed by their counsels or their traffic, to maintain the grandeur of the Babylonish empire (compare Rev. xvi. 11, 12, 15, 28).

CHAPTER XLVIII.

1 Hear ye this. O house of Jacob, which are called by the name of Israel, and are come forth out of the waters of Judah, which swear by the name of the Lord, and make mention of the God of Israel, but not in truth, nor in righteousness.

2 For they call themselves of the holy city, and stay themselves upon the God of Israel; The Lord of hosts is his name.

3 I have declared the former things from the beginning; and they went forth out of my mouth, and I showed them; I did them suddenly, and they came to pass.

Ver. 1. Which are called by the name of Israel.] Who value yourselves for being descended from Jacob, and called after his name, but do not show yourselves to be true Israelites by your deeds.

And are come forth out of the waters of Judah.] The derivation of posterity from the head of a family is often compared to the streams that issue forth from a spring or fountain (see Num. xxiv. 7, Ps. lxviii. 26, Prov. v. 16, 18).

Which swear by the name of the Lord.] To swear by the name of God is a solemn part of divine worship, and an appealing to him as the true God, and sovereign judge of the world (see xix. 18, xlv. 23, Deut. vi. 13, Ps. lixiii. 11). In like manner, the swears or oaths by which certain names are substituted for true gods (see Zech. i. 5), for which reason the Jews were forbidden to make mention of the names of the heathen gods (Exod. xxxii. 13).

Ver. 2.] This vain confidence of the Jews, and relying upon their external privileges, is elsewhere reproved (see Jer. vii. 4, Mic. iii. 11, Rom. ii. 17). Jerusalem had the title of holy city given to it, as being the place of God’s residence, where he had placed his name (see ii. 1, Ps. lxviii. lxxxvii. 3, 2 Kings xxvi. 7).

Ver. 3. I have declared the former things from the beginning:] See the note on xlv. 7. The "former things" are opposed to new things, ver. 6 (compare xiii. 9), and so they may point at the former prophecies relating to the two confederate kings (ch. viii.), and to Sennacherib (ch. x.), as the new things—and things to come, as they are called xlii. 23, relate to the Babylonian captivity, and their return from thence, as they were figures of the gospel-times.

I did them suddenly, and they came to pass.] They punctually came to pass at the time foretold, even when there was no likelihood of such an effect being produced. So we read (Mal. iii. 1), "The Lord shall suddenly come to his temple" i.e. precisely at the time appointed by God (see the note on xlviii. 13).

Ver. 4.] The Jews are elsewhere reproved as a "stiff-necked people" (see Exod. xxxii. 9, Acts vii. 51). The metaphor is taken from oxen that draw back, and refuse to put their necks under the yoke (compare Neh. ix. 29, Zech. vii. 11).

Ver. 5.] God ordained a succession of prophets to foretell the most remarkable events that should happen to the Jews, on purpose to prevent their ascribing them to idols: a suggestion which their infidelity and obstinacy might prompt them to allege (see Eph. vi. 19).

Ver. 6. Thou hast heard, see all this; and will not ye declare it?] The old translation, published under king Henry VIII. has given the sense of the words very perspicuously thus, "Thou heardest it [before], and, behold, it is come to pass: and shall not ye yourselves confess the same?" Some render the words thus: "If thou hast heard, foretell all this: would you not have declared it?" I. e. would not your idols have given out prophecies concerning these things, if they had foreknown them?

I have showed thee these new things from this time.] I have lately discovered to thee some new works of providence, such as thou never wast before acquainted with, relating to thy deliverance out of captivity by Cyrus (compare xil. 9, xxvii. 10).

Ver. 7. They are created now.] They are called new things in opposition to God’s wonders of old time (see the texts last cited).

Even before the day when thou heardest them not;] The words may be better rendered thus, in conjunction with the former sentence: "They are created now, and not from the beginning, nor before the day (the same with from the beginning; see xii. 10), nor hast thou heard them," till I revealed them. Or thus, "nor before this day hast thou heard them;" making the copulative in the Hebrew word to be redundant.

Ver. 8. From that time that thine ear was not opened:] The latter part of the sentence should be thus translated, "Nor was thine ear opened of old, or from the beginning," as the particle were is translated twice in this very chapter, ver. 3, 5 (see note on xlv. 8). The prophet persists in repeating what he had said in the foregoing verses, that it was God alone that could make known these events so long beforehand, and that he did it because he knew their prominence to idolatry, and therefore would take away any pretence that could be made of ascribing this foreknowledge unto idols. To open the ear is a Hebrew phrase, signifying to make known (see 1. 5), the same thing is otherwise expressed by "revealing the ear;" see xxii. 14. 1 Sam. ix. 15. Job xxxvi. 10, where that phrase is translated by "opening the ear." For I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously.] The sense seems imperfect before these words, which may thus be supplied: "I did foretell these things, because I knew thou wouldst deal treacherously." The verb bagad does properly signify a wife being unfaithful to her husband (see Jer. xii. 20); and from thence it is applied to the sin of idolatry, which is often styled "spiritual whoredom," as being a breach of that covenant which the Jews made with God as their king and husband (see liv. 5, Jer. iii. 14, and Bishop Patrick's Preface to his Comment on the Canticles).

And was called a transgressor from the womb.] Thou wast addicted to idolatry from thy very infancy; from the very time thou livest in Egypt (see Ezek. xx. 3, xxiii. 3, 19, 27).

Ver. 9.] See the note on ver. 11.

Ver. 10. I have reigned thee, but not with silver:] Not with a furious heat, as is requisite to melt down silver, for then thou wouldst have been utterly consumed (see Jer. xxx. 11, Ezek. xxii. 20). I have chosen thee in the firmness of affliction: I have taken this method to purge thee from thy dross, and render thee a chosen people to myself. The words may be rendered, "I have tried, or proved thee in the flame of affliction." For the verb ba- hay is sometimes equivalent to bakan (see Prov. viii. 10, x. 20).

Ver. 11. For mine own sake,—will I do it:] God puts the people in mind, that the mercies he vouchsafes to them in restoring their captivity, are not due to their merits, but are wholly to be ascribed to his own goodness, and the regard he hath to his honour, which would suffer in the opinion of the heathen, if those that valued themselves for being his peculiar people should be utterly forsaken by him (compare li. 5, Ps. lxxxix. 10, Ezek. xx. 9, xxxvi. 20—22.

I will not give my glory unto another.] I will not give occasion to the heathen to think that their gods are too powerful for me, which would more and more confirm them in their idolatry, and sacrilegious robbing me of mine honour (see note on xlv. 8).

Ver. 12.] An exhortation to the Jews to hearken to the voice of that God who had called them from the rest of the world, and chosen them to be his peculiar people, and who alone is the maker and sovereign Lord of all things. The word called, alludes to the name and God can have no other name, nor can any other name be called, than the name of nations and kindred, to be his servant (Gen. xii. 1).

Ver. 13. They stand up together.] As servants ready to execute my commands (see xl. 20).

Ver. 14. Which among them hath declared these things?] A general challenge to the idols and their worshippers, to bring proof that ever such a remarkable turn of providence, as that of the Jews' restoration, was foretold by any of the heathen oracles (compare xlii. 22, xliii. 9, xliv. 7, xlv. 21).

The Lord hath loved him:] The prophet speaks of Cyrus, whom God made the peculiar object of his favour, and the conqueror of the Chaldeans and deliverer of his people; wherein he was a type of the Messiah (see the note on xlv. 1).

Ver. 15.] Compare xlv. 1, 2, 8c.

Ver. 16. I have not spoken in secret:] See xliv. 10. From the time that it was, there am I:] The first two words in the Hebrew, mene*hejathak, may be translated, "before the time that this was" [declared or foretold]. So the same particle in ajenom signifies, xliii. 13, where our translators rightly render it, "before the day was;" so xviii. 2, min ha signifies afore-time: or at the time that it happened, then I [foretold], or then I [had a being], as the same words shaw ani may very fitly be rendered, Prov. viii. 27, for the scope of that place is to show the eternity of the divine wisdom. And misham signifies 'from that time,' Is. lxv. 20. This interpretation will make the sense run clearer to this purpose: I have not delivered my predictions in ambiguous terms, because I am from all eternity, and being present to all the successions of time, can clearly foresee those distant events which my providence produces.

And now the Lord God, and his Spirit, hath sent me.] The foregoing part of the verse shows that the 17 Thus saith the Lord, thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel; I am the Lord thy God which teacheth thee to profit, leading thee by the way that thou shouldst go.
18 O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments! then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea:
19 Thy seed also had been as the sand, and the offspring of thy bowels like the gravel thereof; his name should not have been cut off nor destroyed from before me.

words are spoken by God; and since it is here affirmed that the "Lord God hath sent him," we can understand the words of none other but the second person of the blessed trinity, who was sent into the world by his Father, and was anointed to his prophetic office by the Holy Spirit (see xi. 2, xlii. 1, lxi. 1; compare Zech. ii. 10, 11). Here, indeed, only the divine nature of the Son of God is directly spoken of; but it is usual, in Scripture, to apply that to one part of his nature which properly belongs to the other, because of the "communication of properties," as the schoolmen term it. Thus St. Paul saith, that the "Jews tempted Christ in the wilderness" (1 Cor. x. 9); meaning the Logos, who afterward assumed human nature, and was called the Christ. It need not seem strange that Christ is introduced speaking these words; for we find many other texts which are spoken of God in the Old Testament, applied to Christ in the New; to show us that almost all the prophecies of the Old Testament relate to the times of the gospel, and to receive their utmost completion then (see the note on vili. 14, xlv. 23). And this will still appear more probable, if we consider that several passages in this chapter, as well as the general strain of these prophecies concerning the restoration of Israel, have a plain aspect upon some farther restoration of the church in the latter times, and its deliverance from that mystical Babylon described in the Revelation (see xlv. 20, 22, 23, and the notes upon ver. 20 and 22 of this chapter).

Ver. 17. Who teacheth thee to profit?] Who giveth thee laws for thy good, to direct thee in the right way.

Ver. 18.] Thou hast then been so remarkable for virtue and holiness as for peace and prosperity: or righteousness may be taken as equivalent to happiness (see note on lii. 1).

CHAPTER XLIX.

1 Listen, O isles, unto me; and hearken, ye people, from far; The Lord hath called me from the womb; from the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name.

when the condition of the nation was at best nothing near so flourishing as it had been in the days of David and Solomon.

Ver. 1.] Listen, O isles, unto me.] See xli. 1. The Lord hath called me from the womb.] Some persons have been designed by God for certain offices from their very birth, as Jeremiah was (see Jer. 1. 5), and St. Paul (Gal. 1. 15), and John Baptist (Luke 1. 15), and Isaiah, if we understand these words as any way true of Christ, whom God hath in a peculiar manner sanctified, or set apart for his offices of king, priest, and prophet, and sent him into the world to execute the same (see Luke 1. 35; John x. 36).

From the bowels of my mother] See the note on xliii. 1.

Ver. 3. He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword;
And he hath made my mouth like a sharp sword; in the shadow of his hand hath he hid me, and made me a polished shaft; in his quiver hath he hid me.

3 And said unto me, Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified.

4 Then I said, I have laboured in vain, I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain; yet surely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work with my God.

5 ¶ And now, saith the Lord that formed me from the womb to be his servant, to bring Jacob again to him, Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall he be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God shall be my strength.

6 And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth.

7Thus saith the Lord, the Redeemer of Israel, and his Holy One, to whom man despiseth, to him whom the nation abhorreth, to a servant of rulers, Kings shall see and arise, princes also shall worship, because of the Lord that is faithful, and the Holy One of Israel, and he shall choose thee.

8 Thus saith the Lord, In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in a day of salvation have I helped thee: and I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, to establish the earth, to cause to inherit the desolate heritages.

9 That thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, Shew yourselves. They shall feed in the ways, and their pastures shall be in all high places.

10 They shall not hunger nor thirst; neither bility be understood of Isaiah, whatever Grotius or others pretend.

Ver. 7. The words describe the wonderful progress of the gospel, from small beginnings; that the author of it, from being the contempt of all the great men of the world, should come to be the object of their admiration (see ver 21). This verse may have a double sense be understood of that regard which Cyrus and other succeeding monarchs had for the Jewish nation and temple (see the note on xlv. 14), whereas during the captivity they had been the scorn of all their neighbours (see Ps. lxix. 4. Lam. ii. 15, Dan. ix. 16).

Ver. 8. The first publishing of the gospel is that time which primero time upon which a sense of many (see 2 Cor. vi. 2), according to the decree which he had concert ed with his Son from all eternity. Accordingly, when that fulness of time was come, God sent him into the world to be the Mediator of that new covenant, which he would make both with the Jew and gentile (see xliii. 6). If we suppose this verse to have any relation to the Jews' return from captivity, the sense will be, that the expiration of the seventy years was the time of grace, in which God determined to hear and answer the prayers of his devout servants (see Ps. civ. 17), and restore them to their native country, to repeople the land which lay desolate.

To establish the earth. To order and settle it by good laws and government (compare Ps. xxi. 10).

To cause to inherit the desolate heritages. If we expound the words in a spiritual sense, they imply the repairing what is decayed by ignorance and corruption, and making that fruitful which lay barren before. The gentiles are metaphorically described by the wilderness and ground that lies barren and uncultivated (compare xliii. 19, 20, xlv. 3, li. 5).

Ver. 9. Go forth. See note on xlii. 7. Their priests are not in all high places. They shall not want any accommodation in their return home: they shall be as well provided for as a flock of sheep that want neither pasture nor water, though they should feed on the top of barren mountains (see the following verse, and the notes on xxx. 23, xli. 18).

Ver. 10. The spiritual sense of this and the foregoing verse, imports a plentiful enjoyment of God's ordinances (compare Amos viii. 11), together with freedom from persecution (see the notes on iv. 6, xxxv. 4). The words are applied by St. John to the heavenly state of the New Jerusalem (Rev. vii. 16, 17), it being usual with the prophets to describe the flourishing times of the church militant, by such expresshall the heat nor sun smite them: for he that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall he guide them. 11 And I will make all my mountains a way, and my highways shall be exalted. 12 Behold, these shall come from far: and, lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim. 13 ¶ Sing, O heavens: and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains: for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will have mercy upon his afflicted. 14 But Zion said, The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me. 15 Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yes, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee. 16 Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands; thy walls are continually before me. 17 Thy children shall make haste; thy destroyers and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee. 18 ¶ Lift up thine eyes round about, and behold: all these gather themselves together, and sions as properly belong to the church triumphant, because every advancement of God's kingdom in this world is a prelude, or earnest, of the kingdom of heaven.

Ver. 11. [My highways shall be exalted.] Or rather, "My causeways shall be exalted," the Hebrew word mesilath signifies such ways as are raised with stone in low and marshy ground. So the sense is exactly parallel with that of xl. 4, "Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain shall be brought low" (see the note there).

Ver. 12. These shall come from far.] See the note on xiii. 5, 6.

Ver. 13. [These from the land of Sinim.] "From the south country," the Vulgar Latin renders it, to answer to the north and west mentioned before: it may either mean Pelusium in Egypt, called Sisim, Ezek. xxx. 15, or the wilderness of Sinai, mentioned Exod. xvi. 1, both which lay southward of Judea.

Ver. 13.] See the note on xviii. 23.

Ver. 14.] The words of the Jews desiring under their captivity (compare Lam. v. 20, 22).

Ver. 15.] God is often described as bearing a fatherly affection towards his people (see Ps. ciii. 13, Mal. iii. 17). But here the comparison is raised higher, and he speaks of himself as having the same tenderness for them as a mother towards the fruit of her womb (compare Jer. xxxi. 20, Hos. xi. 8). God still retains that kindness for the posterity of Abraham, that he will never cast them off utterly (see Rom. xi. 28, 29).

Ver. 16.] Thou art as dear to me, and as deeply imprinted in my memory, as if thy picture were drawn upon my hand, or engraved in a seal, and worn upon my arm, so as to be always in my sight (compare Exod. xiii. 9, Cant. viii. 6). Some explain the phrase, as if it were a metaphor taken from an architect, who draws the model of a new building, so as to have it always lie before him: in like manner should the platform of their city be always before God's eyes, in order to the re-edifying of it.

Ver. 17. Thy children shall make haste:] To return homeward. Some render it, "Thy builders come to thee." As I live, saith the Lord, thou shalt surely clothe thee with them all, as with an ornament, and bind them on thee, as a bride doth.

19 For thy waste and thy desolate places, and the land of thy destruction, shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants, and they that swallowed thee up shall be far away.

20 The children which thou shalt have, after thou hast lost the other, shall say again in thine ears, The place is too strait for me: give place to me that I may dwell.

21 Then shalt thou say in thine heart, Who hath begotten me these, seeing I have lost my children, and am desolate, a captive, and removing to and fro? and who hath brought up these? Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?

22 Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up mine hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people: and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders. 23 And kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers: they shall bow down to thee with their face toward the shall make haste," in opposition to the destroyers mentioned in the following sentence. But the following verse favors the first interpretation.

Thy destroyers.—shall go forth of thee.] See the same sense a little varied in the expression, ver. 19.

Ver. 15.] The words allude to the affection that mothers have for their children, who pride themselves in them as their greatest ornament.

Ver. 10.] This must be understood either of the accession of the gentiles into the church (see ver. 22, 23), typified by Judea, repeopled after it had lain desolate (see the note on ver. 8); or else we may suppose the words point at some future restoration of the Jewish nation; for we do not find the catalogues of those who returned, recorded in Ezra and Nehemiah, to answer this prophecy: nor did the Jews repossess the whole extent of Palestine after the captivity, or make that figure in the world which they had done in former times, and especially before the separation of the ten tribes.

Ver. 20. The children which thou shalt have.] Those which thou shalt have after thou hast been for some time in a desolate condition (see liv. 1).

Shall say again in thy ears.] Or rather, "Shall yet say in thine ears," i. e. the time is yet to come when they shall say thus.

Ver. 21, 22.] In the former verse, Jerusalem is represented as in a surprise to find herself on a sudden replenished with inhabitants after an utter desolation; and in the latter, an account is given of this miraculously change, viz. that God would put it in the hearts of the gentiles, whither the Jews were led captives, to send them home again, with all necessary provisions for their journey (see Ezra i. 4). This may yet receive a farther accomplishment (compare xi. 12, ix. 4).

Ver. 23. Kings shall be thy nursing fathers:] Cyrus, Artaxerxes, and other Persian monarchs, showed signal favour to the Jews; and Esther, Darius' queen, one of their own countrywomen, saved the nation from utter destruction. But this prophecy was more remarkably fulfilled in the favours which Constantine and his mother Helen, and other Christian princes CHAPTER L.

I dry up the sea, I make the rivers a wilderness: their fishes stinketh, because there is no water, and dieth for thirst.

CHAPTER L.

ARGUMENT.—God encourages his people still to depend upon him, by assuring them, that he hath not forsaken them, but his sins have constrained him to deal severely with them. And the prophet shows both his divine commission to publish to them the glad tidings of redemption, and his readiness to discharge that office, whatever discouragements or ill treatment he might meet with upon that account, wherein he was an exact type or figure of Christ.

Ver. 1. Where is the bill of your mother’s divorcement? The covenant which God made with his people is commonly represented under the notion of a marriage contract (see notes on xxxviii. 5). In allusion to this notion, God demands of the captives, who despaired of his mercy (see xliv. 14), to produce the bill of divorce which he had given to their mother; whereas, on the contrary, he was ready to receive her, whenever she would return from her idolatries and other iniquities (see Jer. iii. 1).

Or which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you? Those that were poor used to sell their children and sometimes themselves, to their creditors, for the discharge of their debts (see Exod. xxi. 7, Neh. v. 5, Lev. xxv. 39). The same power mastered with him that contended with thee, and I will save thy children.

And I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh: and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine: and all flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redemner, the mighty One of Jacob.

Ver. 24.] An objection urging the seeming impossibility of rescuing the Jews from such a powerful enemy as the Babylonish empire, who had made an entire conquest over them.

Ver. 25.] God answers this difficulty, by telling them that he will take this matter into his own hands, and plead their cause with their enemies.

Ver. 26.] Those that are allied to us by country or kindred, or any other relation, are called our own flesh (see Judg. ix. 2, 2 Sam. v. 1, Neh. v. 5). So the phrase here imports, that God will act these enormities of his people one against the other, and make them kill and destroy each other (see note on ix. 20).

Accordingly, Cyrus first conquered a great many of the allies of the Babylonians, and made them serviceable in reducing the capital city of that empire.

1 Thus saith the Lord, Where is the bill of your mother’s divorcement, whom I have put away? or which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you? Behold, for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves, and for your transgressions your mother put away.

2 Wherefore, when I came, was there no man? when I called, was there none to answer? Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem? or have I no power to deliver? behold, at my rebuke their blessing (see Valesius’s notes upon Theodoret, lib. iv. cap. vi).

Ver. 24.] An objection urging the seeming impossibility of rescuing the Jews from such a powerful enemy as the Babylonish empire, who had made an entire conquest over them.

Ver. 25.] God answers this difficulty, by telling them that he will take this matter into his own hands, and plead their cause with their enemies.

Ver. 26.] Those that are allied to us by country or kindred, or any other relation, are called our own flesh (see Judg. ix. 2, 2 Sam. v. 1, Neh. v. 5). So the phrase here imports, that God will act these enormities of his people one against the other, and make them kill and destroy each other (see note on ix. 20).

Accordingly, Cyrus first conquered a great many of the allies of the Babylonians, and made them serviceable in reducing the capital city of that empire.

Accordingly, Cyrus first conquered a great many of the allies of the Babylonians, and made them serviceable in reducing the capital city of that empire.
The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back.

6 I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from shame and spitting.

7 For the Lord God will help me; therefore shall I not be confounded: therefore have I set my face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed.

8 He is near that justifieth me: who will contend with me? let us stand together: who is mine adversary? let him come near to me.

9 Behold, the Lord God will help me; who was weary under the burden of their sins (Matt. xi. 28).

We wakeneth morning by morning: he wakeneth mine ear to hear the learned. Every morning he putteth me in mind of the discharge of my office, as masters cause up their scholars betimes to learn their lesson. The words may be rendered, He wakeneth mine ear to hear, as scholars (are awakened); for the Hebrew limmadim signifies both teachers and discipies: and it is taken in the latter sense by our translators. viii. 16. If we take the word in this sense, the phrase which is translated the tongue of the learned, in the foregoing sentence, will signify a docile or teachable tongue, which obeys the dictates of its instructor (see the following verse).

Ver. 5.] He hath given me instructions for the discharge of mine office, and I immediately complied with his commands, and set about the execution of it. The phrase of opening the ears is explained in the notes upon xviii. 5. Herein too Isaiah was a type of Christ (compare Ps. xli. 6, 8).

Ver. 6. I gave my back to the smiters. The prophets generally met with very ill treatment from the men of their own times (see Acts vii. 52). And though we have no particular account of Isaiah's sufferings, yet it appears from this verse, that his lot was no better than that of his brethren; and the Jews have a tradition, that he was at last slain under the command of king Manasseh. The expressions of this verse were literally fulfilled in Christ (see Matt. xxvi. 67, xxvii. 26).

My cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: by way of contempt and reproach (see Lam. iii. 30). The Septuagint render the words, εἰς τοὺς μέλεις μακρισμένους, I gave my cheeks to blows: which was literally fulfilled in our Saviour, Mark xiv. 65, John xviii. 22, where the evangelists used the word μάλα, as if they alluded to this prophecy.

Ver. 7. Therefore have I set my face as a flint; So as not to be bow-beaten, or put out of countenance, by my adversaries (compare Ezek. iii. 8, 9). It requires an extraordinary degree of courage to reprove popular vices, when their abettors are numerous and powerful.

CHAPTER LI.

1 Hearken to me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord: look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged.

CHAP. LI.

Argument.—The chapter begins with an exhortation to the pious persons of the captivity, still to rely upon the promises of God, which shall be eminently fulfilled in Christ (ver. 4, 5). The prophet puts them in mind, that God had given is he that shall condemn me? lo, they all shall wax old as an garment; the moth shall eat them up.

10 Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light? let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God.

11 Behold, all ye that kindle a fire, that compass yourselves about with sparks: walk in the light of your fire, and in the sparks that ye have kindled. This shall ye have of mine hand; ye shall lie down in sorrow.

Ibid. and ver. 8. He is near that justifieth me, &c.] God will stand by me and pronounce me innocent, and then I need not fear or be dismayed at the worst accusations the malice of mine enemies can suggest against me. Here is a solemn process or trial supposed, such as our Saviour underwent, whom God would in a signal manner justify, or acquit from that unrighteous sentence which men had pronounced against him (see the note on xlv. 35).

Ver. 9.] Compare li. 8, Job. xii. 27. They shall quickly die, and all their wicked designs shall perish with them (compare lii. 12). Thus Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the chief priests, are long since perished, but Christ lives and abides for ever.

Ver. 10.] Let those who fear God, and reverently obey all the indications of his will made known to them by his prophets, though their present circumstances look never so dismal, and they have no glimmering of hope or comfort; yet let them continue to rely upon God, who in due time will visit them with light and salvation. The meaning of God's servant hath been already explained upon xlv. 26.

Ver. 11. That compass yourselves about with sparks.] Or, "that increase the flame," as the Septuagint render the latter part of the sentence: for the Hebrew verb azar, whose original sense is to bind, signifies likewise to increase or strengthen, as Abram à Schultens hath shown in his Observat. Arab. in Genesis, cap. 2. The expression denotes those that seek for worldly comforts, and neglect those consolations which come from God: the prophet purports the same metaphor which he had used in the foregoing verse.

Walk in the light of your fire.] Make your best of these your comforts, but I will forewarn you that you shall find yourselves sadly disappointed; you shall sink under your calamities, as a beast that faints under his burden, without any hopes of recovery out of them (compare liii. 17). "Walk in the light of your fire," is an ironical expression, like that of Christ, "sleep on now, and take your rest" (Matt. xxvi. 45); and that of Amos, "come to Bethel, and transegest" (Amos iv. 4).
CHAPTER LI.

2 Look unto Abraham your father, and unto Sarah that bare you: for I called him alone, and blessed him, and increased him.

3 For the Lord shall comfort Zion: he will comfort all her waste places; and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody.

4 ¶ Hearken unto me, my people; and give ear unto me, O my nation: for a law shall proceed from me, and I will make my judgment to rest for a light of the people.

5 My righteousness is near; my salvation is gone forth, and mine arms shall judge the people; the isles shall wait upon me, and on mine arm shall they trust.

6 Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner: but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished.

7 ¶ Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is my law; fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings.

8 For the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool; but my righteousness shall be for ever, and my salvation from generation to generation.

9 ¶ Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord: awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Art thou not it which hath cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon?

10 Art thou not that which hath dried the sea, the waters of the great deep: that hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?

11 Therefore the redeemed of the Lord shall return, and come with singing unto Zion; and everlasting joy shall be upon their head: they shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away.

12 I, even I, am he that comforteth you: who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man which shall be made as grass;

13 And forgettest the Lord thy maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth; and hast feared continually every day because of the fury of the oppressor, as if he were ready to destroy? and where is the fury of the oppressor?

14 The captive exile hasteth that he may be loosed, and that he should not die in the pit, nor that his bread should fail.

These metaphorical expressions are explained in the following verse. The expressions may allude to the springs which issue forth from between the rocks (compare xlviii. 1). Ver. 2. Look unto Abraham your father, and unto Sarah] As God gave an original to your nation, from Abraham and Sarah, two persons past age for having children; so he could multiply their posterity, though they should be reduced to a small number. For I called him alone.] The Hebrew word is eehad one, i.e. when he was but one single person, without child or family. Abraham is elsewhere styled one, as being singled out from the rest of his kindred to be the father of a people (compare Gen. xlii). Ver. 3. A proverbial expression (see Joel ii. 3). This promise primarily relates to the people of Judæa after it had lain waste during the captivity; but mystically implies the restoring truth and righteousness, when ignorance and corruption had overspread the face of the world (see the note on xliv. 5). This latter sense the following words plainly point at.

Ver. 4.] The latter part of the sentence may more properly be rendered, “I will cause my judgment to break forth for a light to the people;” for the verb ragang, as many other Hebrew words, has two contrary significations (see the note on xxii. 18), and signifies both to rest and to break forth. To this sense it may most conveniently be expounded, Jer. xxix. 19, where our translation reads, quite contrary to the design of the place, “I will make him suddenly run away from her;” whereas the scope of the text requires the words to be thus rendered: “I will stir him up, and make him run (or seize) upon her.” But to return to the text before us; the prophet speaks of such a law as should break forth and enlighten the most distant people, expressed by the isles in the next verse, which can be no other than the gospel, as will plainly appear by comparing this text with xlii. 4, 6, where it is said that Christ is ordained “to be a light to the gentiles, to set judgment in the earth,” and that “the isles should wait for his law.”

Ver. 5. Mine arm shall judge the people.] That power of God which shall accompany the preaching of the gospel (compare ver. 9, Ps. lixvi. 4, xxviii. 9, I Cor. i. 24). The isles shall wait upon me.] See the notes upon xi. 11, ix. 9. Ver. 6.] When heaven and earth shall be dissolved, then is the time for fulfilling that righteousness and salvation, which I promise to my servants (see 2 Pet. iii. 18, compare Matt. xxiv. 53).

Ver. 7.] They that have the law of God deeply imprinted in their minds, with the obligations lying upon them to obey it, and the advantages they will receive by the practice of it, will never be moved or drawn aside from their duty by the flouts or reproaches of the ungodly (see Ps. cxix. 51, 52).

Ver. 8.] See the note on l. 9.

Ver. 9. Awake, awake, put on strength.] The prophet, by an elegant figure, addresses himself to God, to stir up his strength, and exert it in behalf of his oppressed people, as he did in former times, when he delivered them out of the Egyptian bondage. Art thou not it that hast cut Rahab,] Egypt is sometimes called by the name of Rahab (see Ps. lxxxvii. 4. lxviii. 10): the word signifies strong or proud (see the note on xxx. 7).

Wounded the dragon?] See the note on xxvii. 1.

Ver. 11.] See the notes on xxxv. 10.

Ver. 12.] See the note on l. 9.

Ver. 13. Where is the fury of the oppressor?] It shall so suddenly vanish, that if you look after it there shall no footsteps of it remain (compare Job xx. 7). Ver. 14.] The Hebrew runs plainly thus: “the captive exile shall be quickly delivered, he shall not die in the pit (or prison), neither shall his bread fail.”

Die in the pit.] The pit is that part of the prison 15 But I am the Lord thy God, that divided the sea, whose waves roared: The Lord of hosts is his name.
16 And I have put my words in thy mouth, and I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand, that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, Thou art my people.
17 ¶ Awake, awake, stand up, O Jerusalem, which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury; thou hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling, and wrung them out.
18 There is none to guide her among all the sons whom she hath brought forth; neither is there any that taketh her by the hand of all the sons that she hath brought up.

called the dungeon (see Jer. xxxvi. 16, xxxviii. 6, Lam. iii., Zech. ix. 11).

Ver. 15.] The connexion of this verse with what goes before will better appear, if we render it, "For I am the Lord thy God," &c. God's dividing the Red Sea is here alluded to: compare Ps. lxxiv. 13, Job xxvi. 12, which place may not improbably be expounded with relation to the same miracle; for the whole verse runs thus, "He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through the proud," where the Hebrew word rendered proud is Rahan, the name of Egypt, as hath been observed upon ver. 10 of this chapter.

Ver. 16. I have put my words in thy mouth.] I have made thee my oracle, I have entrusted thee with the office of declaring my gracious promises to the godly, and my threatenings to the wicked. This may be understood in a lower sense of Isaiah, but is chiefly meant of Christ (compare xlix. 2, 1, 5, 6, lxii. 21).

That I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth.] A political government in the prophetic idiom is often expressed by the several parts of the creation: according to which analogy, rulers and magistrates are denoted by the heavenly bodies, and inferior people by the earth (see the note on xiii. 10) if we take the words here in this metaphorical sense, the passage shows that God publishes these gracious promises by the ministry of Isaiah, in order to the restoring of the Jewish nation, and settling them in a political government again, subsisting by themselves and governed by their own laws. But the words do further imply a promise of that new state of things, called afterward a new heaven, and a new earth (lxxv. 17, lxvi. 22), wherein Christ will reward his saints and eminent servants, and where he himself will immediately preside over them (Rev. xx. 4; see the note on xlv. 18).

Ver. 17.] The prophet speaks of Jerusalem, as one lying astonished under the stroke of God's judgments, which are commonly represented under the notion of a cup of intoxicating liquors, because they amaze men, and bereave them of their judgment and discretion. Drinking the dregs of this cup is the same with taking it off to the bottom, where the strongest and most nauseous part of the portion was settled; and implies that God did not in the least spare her, but poured out the full measure of his wrath upon her (compare Ps. lxix. 8, Jer. xxv. 15, 16, Ezek. xxiii. 32—34, Rev. xiv. 10). Some suppose the metaphor to be taken from that intoxicating liquor which was wont to be given to condemned persons, to stupify them before their execution, such as was offered to Christ (Matt. xxvii. 34).

19 These two things are come unto thee; who shall be sorry for thee? destruction, and famine, and the sword; by whom shall I comfort thee?
20 Thy sons have fainted, they lie at the head of all the streets, as a wild bull in a net: they are full of the fury of the Lord, the rebuke of thy God.
21 ¶ Therefore hear now this, thou afflicted, and drinketh, but not with wine:
22 Thus saith thy Lord the Lord, and thy God that pleaseth the cause of his people, Behold I have taken out of thine hand the cup of trembling, even the dregs of the cup of my fury; thou shalt no more drink it again:
23 But I will put it into the hand of them

Ver. 18.] Although she is in this helpless distracted condition, and hath most need of support and comfort, yet there are none of her own children that are able to give it her (compare ver. 20): and therefore it is from God alone that she must expect relief (ver. 22).

Ver. 19.] Desolation and destruction, and the famine, and the sword.] Abraham a Schultens, in his observations upon Job, remarks, that the Hebrew word shod, desolation, is properly used of famine (see Job v. 22). So that "desolation and famine, destruction and the sword," are equivalent terms, and are the two evils here mentioned. To make the sense plain or, he thus translates the words, "these two things are come upon thee—desolation end destruction, even the famine and the sword;" the copulative particle being sometimes used by way of explanation: so 1 Sam. xxviii. 3, "They buried him in Ramah, even in his own city:" where it is in the Hebrew, "and in his own city" (see likewise 1 Sam. xvii. 10).

Who shall be sorry for thee?] Who is there left to take pity on thee, since thy children are all in as miserable a condition as thyself (see the eighteenth and the following verse).

By whom shall I comfort thee?] What human means of comfort is there left for thee (compare Amos vii. 2).

Ver. 20.] A description of the miserable condition of the city when it was just taken by the enemy, and the choicest men for youth and courage lay sacrificing in their own blood in every street, struggling for life like a wild bull taken in a toil, and sinking under the weight of God's wrath. When God delivered up Zedekiah into the hands of his enemies he is said to have spread his net upon him (Ezek. xii. 13, xvii. 20).

Ver. 22. Thou shalt no more drink it again.] Some render the words, "thou shalt no longer drink there of" (compare Ezek. xxxix. 28). If we follow the common translation, and understand this of Jerusalem, it must mean that such a judgment should not come upon it again in several ages; a long continuance being often styled for ever, in the Hebrew. But by comparing this verse with ver. 16, and with iv. 9, we may conclude, that this prophecy hath a farther prospect upon a new state or restoration of the Jews, which is still to be expected (see likewise xxxvi. 8, 9, lii. 1, lx. 15, liii. 8).

[Thou shalt no more drink it again:] The words should rather be translated, "thou shalt no longer drink thereof." So the particle mod modestly signifies, Ezek. xii. 28, Hos. i. 6; see Noldius, p. 662.]
CHAPTER LII.

1 Awake, awake; put on thy strength, O Zion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city: for henceforth shall there no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the uncircumcised.

2 Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem: loose thyself from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion.

3 For thus saith the Lord, Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money.

4 For thus saith the Lord God, My people went down aforetime into Egypt to sojourn there; and the Assyrian oppressed them without cause.

and therefore, to make the sale and the redemption correspondent to each other, you shall be rescued out of this oppression gratis, which I will do by Cyrus (see xlv. 10). The words, in the mystical sense, may fitly be applied to the miserable captivity to which sinners enslave themselves, and the freedom of that redemption which Christ hath wrought for them (compare I Pet. i. 18, Rom. iii. 24).

Ver. 3. [What have I here?] Or, "what have I to do here?" (see note on xxix. 10) that is, what have I to do with the Babylonians? when I gave my people into their hands, as the instruments of my vengeance (see Jer. xxvii. 5, 6), I never made over to them the right that I have in my people.

That my people is taken away for nought? my name continually every day is blasphemed. They have no valuable consideration given them for their liberty (ver. 3), nor did they injure the Babylonians first, that they should require them in this manner, ver. 4, (to this sense the word hizman is often rendered without cause: see Ps. xxxv. 7, 19, lxiv. 4, cxx. 3, cxix. 161, Lam. iv. 52), they met with ill usage, and I got no honour by it. On the contrary, "my name is continually blasphemed:" that is, the infidels take occasion from my delivering up my people into their hands, to reproach me as if I were either forgetful of them, or unable to help them (see the note on xlviii. 11).

Ver. 6.] They shall know my power, that it is I have made this promise of restoring them, who am always ready at hand to make good what I say: so render the latter part of the verse, "That I am he that doth speak, and I am ready at hand" [to perform it].

Ver. 7.] A poetical description of the messenger who first brought the good news of Cyrus's decree for the people's return home; whom the watchmen, publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!
ISAIAH.

8 Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice; with the voice together shall they sing: for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion.

9 Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem.

10 The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.

11 Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence, touch no unclean thing; go ye out from the mentioned ver. 8, are supposed to decriy afar off from the tops of the mountains, making all possible haste to publish this happy news; a signal instance of God's overruling providence, and of the peculiar care he hath for his church. This text is very fully applied by St. Paul to the first preachers of the gospel, Rom. x. 15, the very word importing good tidings of peace and salvation, whereby the kingdom of God was erected among men. Accordingly we may observe, that those Psalms wherein we find that expression, 'The Lord reigneth,' are by the generality of interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, expounded of the times of the Messiah (see Ps. xxxvii. xxvii. xxviii.).

Ver. 8. Thy watchmen shall lift up the voice: by watchmen are meant preachers or prophets (see iv. 10, Ezek. xxxiii. 7). The words may be understood particularly of Haggai and Zechariah, with respect to the return from the captivity; and may be applied to the first preachers of the gospel in aftertimes. They shall see eye to eye: That is, clearly and evidently; the phrase means the same as face to face.

Ver. 9. Sing together: See xlix. 8. li. 3.

Ver. 10. The Lord hath made bare his holy arm: He hath given evident tokens of his power and holiness. All the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God: The plain import of the words, and the parallel text, Ps. xviii. 3, show, that this must be understood of the revelation of the gospel.

Ver. 11. Depart ye, See the note on xlviii. 20.

Touch no unclean thing: The expression is taken from the legal pollutions contracted by touching any thing unclean, as a whale (see Lev. xxi. 4-9); and is a command to God's people, and the priests especially, to cleanse themselves from all those detriments they may have contracted by living among the wicked.

Be ye clean, ye that bear the vessels of the Lord. The priests under the law had the charge of the holy vessels, and all the furniture of the temple, committed to them (see Num. iii. 8): and they were particularly enjoined to keep themselves free from all manner of pollutions (see Lev. xvi. xxii.). The mystical sense of which command extends to all Christians (see 2 Cor. vi. 17), who are called a holy priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 5.

Ver. 12. Your fathers were thrust out of Egypt by the Lord (Exod. i. 39), but ye shall have sufficient notice of your departure out of Babylon, that ye may purify and prepare yourselves for it: and God himself shall be both in the head and rear of you, and, like the pillar of cloud in the wilderness, shall be both your guide and defence (see Exod. xiv. 19, 20).

Ver. 13. Your servant shall deal prudently: Or, 'shall prosper,' as the margin reads, more agreeably to what follows. Here begins a new section [the Chaldee paraphrase understands the person spoken of here, and to the end of the following chapter, to be midst of her; be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord. 12 For ye shall not go out with haste, nor go by flight: for the Lord will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your reward. 13 Behold, my servant shall deal prudently, ye shall be exalted and exalted, and be very high. 14 As many were astonished at thee; his visage was so marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men: 15 So shall he sprinkle many nations: the kings shall shut their mouths at him: for that which had not been told them shall they see; and that which they had not heard shall they consider. (the Messias), which contains so clear a prophecy of the 'sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow,' that all Christian interpreters farseake Grotius here, even those that so servitely copy after him in other places, and think that this prophecy can be applied to none but Christ, who is here called God's servant in an eminent sense (see the note on xlii. 1). He shall be exalted and exalted, and be very high: He shall be exalted to the head of a numerous offspring, to 'justify many, and to divide the spoil with the strong' (xlii. 10–12). The glories of the Messias are elsewhere in the prophets set forth in the most magnificent terms. And the Jews have a remarkable saying recorded in some of their oldest writers, 'That the Messias should be exalted above Abraham, be exalted above Moses, and be higher than the angels;' a sentence that seems to have been derived to them from a more ancient tradition; for we find St. Paul in the Epistle to the Hebrews, proves the supereminent dignity of Christ, by the same topics, by showing him to be greater than Abraham (Heb. vii. 6, 7): worthy of more honour than Moses (iii. 5, 6), and higher than the angels (1. 4, &c).

Ver. 14. As many were astonished at thee: The prophet speaks of that surprise and astonishment men were seized with, by the unexpected change they observed in Christ's outward appearance, at the time of his sufferings, and the strange alteration between him that was so lately followed by multitudes, with acclamations and hosannahs, and revered as 'the great prophet that should come into the world,' and now suffering on the cross, and treated as 'the scorn of men, and the outcast of the people' (see Matt. xxvii. 39, 42).

His visage was so marred: See lii. 2.

Ver. 15. So shall he sprinkle many nations: His sufferings, however they may render him despicable for the present, yet shall bring great benefit to others, and in the end redound to his own glory: he shall purify whole nations by his blood, and present them holy to God. The expression alludes to the legal aspersions, by which the people were sanctified (compare Ezek. xxxvi. 25, Heb. ix. 13, 14, 1 Pet. i. 2).

The kings shall shut their mouths at him: The greatest kings and princes shall submit themselves to him, laying their hands upon their mouths, and forbearing to his instructions with the profoundest reverence; and the same power exerting on the cross (compare Job xxix. 9, 10, 11, 14, and see above, xliii. 13).

For that which had not been told them shall they see: Those nations and their kings shall be instructed in such heavenly truths, as human reason could never be able to discover. The gospel is called a 'mystery kept secret from ages and generations,' the knowledge of which could not be attained but by divine revelation (see Rom. xvi. 25, Eph. iii. 5, 9).
CHAPTER LII.

1 Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? 2 For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. 3 He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not.

CHAP. LIII.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter describes the circumstances of our Saviour’s sufferings so exactly, that it seems rather a history of his passion, than a prophecy: and it is so undeniable a proof of the truth of Christianity, that the bare reading it, and comparing it with the gospel-history, hath converted some infidels.

Ver. 1. Who hath believed our report? This is spoken in the person of Christ and his apostles: Who, say they, among our own countrymen, hath believed our preaching or doctrine? So the word shemauh signifies, xxviii. 9. And although God hath showed such visible tokens of his power (compare iii. 10), in those miracles by which he hath given testimony to our mission, yet how few of our own nation are convinced by them (compare John xii. 37, 38. Rom. x. 16).

Ver. 2. He shall grow up before him as a tender plant.] The prophet assigns the cause of the Jews rejecting Christ, viz. the meanness of his outward appearance. The Messias is elsewhere described under the resemblance of a branch or scion growing out of the stem or stock of David (see xi. 1. Jer. xxxii. 5). But here he is resembled to a little sucker, the literal interpretation of the word Ijonelc, and to a branch growing out of a dry ground, which looks withered, and does not promise either life or fruit.

The word shores, root, should rather be translated branch, or shoot (see the note on xi. 10).

He shall grow up before him.] That is, before the Lord mentioned ver. 1. under his immediate care and inspection; so the expression of “dwelling before God,” signifies abiding under his protection, Ps. lix. 7. Or before him may signify here, according to God’s determinate counsel and purpose, as the phrase denotes, Rom. iv. 17.

He hath no form nor comeliness;] The meanness of his outward circumstances, especially when he came to be condemned as a malefactor, made his person appear despicable (compare li. 14). From this text Justin Martyr, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, and others of the ancient fathers, concluded our Saviour’s person to have been deformed: an opinion in my judgment not at all probable. In the fourth and following centuries, a quite contrary notion was advanced by St. Jerome, and others, viz. that Christ was a person of extraordinary comeliness, which they grounded chiefly upon that place of the forty-fifth Psalm (ver. 3), “Thou art fairer than the children of men,” &c. From these two contrary opinions we may conclude, that the making or setting up the image or the picture of Christ, was no part of religious worship in the early ages of Christianity, or else there would have remained some more certain tradition concerning his outward shape and person.

That we should desire him.] He that is described as the “desire of all nations,” Hag. ii. 6 (where the word is the same as in the Hebrew here), did not appear at all desireable to those of his own nation.

Ver. 3. Acquainted with grief.] “Enduring the continual contradiction of sinners,” and all the ill treatment that the malice of men or devils could suggest (see Luke xxii. 53).

We hid as it were our faces from him.] Out of aversion or contempt (compare i. 15. liv. 5, lxx. 2). So to “turn away our face from the needy” (Eccles. iv. 5), is to disregard him, and take no pity on his sufferings.

Ver. 4. He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows.] He hath borne the evils and punishments which were due to our sins. The two Hebrew verbs, nasa and sabal, properly signify to bear the punishment due to sin. The former is taken so in that noted expression, when any person is said to “bear his iniquity;” i.e. the punishment of his iniquity: the latter signifies properly to have iniquity laid upon one as a burden, which is the same with undergoing the punishment due to it. So this word is used, Lam. v. 7, “Our fathers have sinned, and are not; and we have borne their iniquities;” that is, we have been punished in their stead. It is used again in the same sense, at ver. 11 of this chapter.

Yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.] His enemies looked upon him as forsaken of God, and derided him for his vain boasts that God was his Father (see Matt. xxvii. 43).

Ver. 5. He suffered those chastishments or punishments by which our peace with God was wrought, and satisfaction was made to the divine justice (see Rom. v. 1, Eph. ii. 14).

Ver. 6. All we like sheep have gone astray;] A proverbial expression (see Ps. cxix. 170. Zech. x. 2. Matt. xviii. 11, 12. Luke xv. 4).

The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.] The letter of the Hebrew runs thus: “The Lord hath made the iniquities of us all to meet on him,” or “to fall upon him,” as the verb pagaung signifies, Judg. viii. 21, xv. 12. Amos v. 19.

Ver. 7. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted;] The words may better be rendered, It was exacted of him, and he answered the demand: that is, he gave that satisfaction which God’s justice demanded for our sins.

Yet he opened not his mouth:] All the hard usage he met with did not prevail with him to utter an intemperate expression, or to make any return to the ill language which was given him (see 1 Pet. ii. 22, 23).

Nay, he even abstained from making his just he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth.

8 He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was he stricken.

9 And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death; because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth.

defence, any farther than it was necessary for him to plead his innocence (see Matt. xxvi. 68, xxvii. 12).

He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, Meyrick submitting to the violence of his persecutors, and not offering to make the least resistance (see Matt. xxvi. 52, 53). "To go as an ox, or lamb, to the slaughter," is another proverbial expression, which we meet with in Prov. vii. 22, Jer. xi. 19, but of a different signification, denoting a voluntary submission to death, without insensibility to danger; to which sense it is explained by Jeremiah himself, in that place, "I knew not," said he, "that they had devised devices against me." And therefore this text is very importantly alleged by Grotius here, to justify his applying this part of the prophecy to Jeremiah's case.

Ver. 8. He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation? We do not read that imprisonment was any part of Christ's sufferings: so I think the marginal reading is to be preferred, "He was taken away by distress and judgment," or it may be rendered, "He was carried away to execution (so the participle of lukak is used, Prov. xxiv. 11) by tyrannical oppression, and a sentence of condemnation." The word notzer, which our translation renders prison, is rendered oppression, Ps. vii. 39.

Who shall declare his generation? Who can declare the wickedness of the men of that age or generation, who cut off this innocent person in so unjust a manner! The Hebrew word dor, often signifies the men of such an age or place (see Gen. vii. I, Deut. xxiii. 5, 20, Ps. lxxviii. 5). In the same sense is qe6l frequently used in the New Testament, particularly Matt. xvi. 45, xxiii. 30. Some commentators understand this text of Christ's eternal generation, but then I conceive the word in the Hebrew should have been toledoth.

Ver. 9.] Some render the words thus, "His grave was appointed with the wicked (being crucified with malefactors), but he was with the rich in his death," being buried in the monument of Joseph of Arimathaea; or, "his sepulchre was with the rich:" so Schleider renders the word bemothau, as if it were derived from bamah. Others to this purpose, "God did not respect him, even to the grave, and to destroy it, or to the bands of the wicked and powerful." The word rich is sometimes taken, in an ill sense, for a tyrant or oppressor (see Job xxiii. 19, compared with ver. 13); and so they understand it here, and translate the latter part of the verse thus, "Not for any violence that he had done, or that any deceit was found in his mouth." The very same Hebrew particles, nat lo in the Hebrew, are used here, as in those particles in that sense, we may very well join this sentence to the following verse, thus, "although he had done no wickedness, neither was any deceit in his mouth, yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him.

Ver. 10. When thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed. Our Saviour's words, John xii. 21, are a commentary upon this place, where, speaking of the benefits that would follow from his death, he saith, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit."

[He shall see his seed.] This may be properly understood of our Lord's disciples, called Christians, after his name. Nothing is more usual than to call teachers by the name of fathers (see 2 Kings ii. 12, xiii. 14), and them that follow his instructions by the name of pupils. In this sense we read of the "children of Abraham," the "children of God," and the "children of wisdom." The Chaldee, LXX, and Vulgar Latin, join the following words to this sentence, "He shall see a seed which shall prolong their days;" i.e. the church, which shall continue unto the end of the world.

He shall prolong his days;] "Being raised up from the dead, he shall die no more" (Rom. vi. 9).

The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand.] The redemption and salvation of mankind is often called God's good pleasure, as being both highly acceptable to him, and likewise proceeding purely from his good pleasure and free grace (see Eph. i. 5, 9, 2 Thess. i. 11, John vi. 38).

Ver. 11. He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied.] He shall rejoice to find that his death and sufferings have not been in vain, but the means of saving so many: to this sense some understand that text of St. Paul, where he saith, that Christ, "for the joy which was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame," (Heb. xii. 2.)

By his knowledge.] By such a knowledge of Christ as produceth faith and obedience (see John xviii. 3, Phil. iii. 8, 9, 2 Pet. i. 3).

Shall my righteous servant? St. John alludes to this place, when he calleth our Saviour, Jesus Christ the righteous, 1 John ii. 1 (concerning the title of servant, see the note on xlii. 1).

Justify many.] The writers of the New Testament allude to this text, when they say, that "Christ gave his life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx. 28); "his blood was shed for many" (Matt. xxvi. 28); "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many" (Heb. ix. 28); and "by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous" (Rom. v. 19), where the a telykha, "the many," are equivalent to "all men," as appears by the foregoing verse.

Ver. 12. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great.] The words may be rendered more exactly to the Hebrew, thus, "I will bestow many upon him;" or, "I will give him his share or possession in many:" to this sense the Septuagint render it, exo6pi6x7ai atopon ta telykha, "I will portion out to him a share in the many:" and the same sense of Ps. ii. 8, "I will give him the heathen for his inheritance," &c. Any gift is expressed in the Hebrew by a share or lot in a division: the phrase alludes to the division of the land of Canaan among the twelve tribes by lot (see Ps. xvi. 5, 6).

He shall divide the spoil with the strong.] The expression alludes to the custom of conquerors to divide the spoils of their victory with their officers and so-CHAPTER LIV.

1 Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing, and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child; for more are the children of the desolate than the children of the married woman.

2 Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations; spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes;

3 For thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left: and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited.

Ver. 1. Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear: Or, thou that was barren: children, a great while. The prophet had described Jerusalem, during the captivity, as a desolate woman, forsaken of her husband, and bereaved of her children (lxix. 21; compare lxxii. 4): here he bids her rejoice and comfort herself after her affliction, because her children should be much more numerous than they were in her most flourishing condition. This cannot be literally true of the Jewish nation, who never made such a figure after the captivity as they did in the days of David and Solomon; and consequently can be only imperfectly understood of Jerusalem, as she was a type of the Christian church, according to St. Paul's exposition of that text, Gal. iv. 27. Exalting the words to this sense, they import, that the church, after her spousal, Jesus Christ, was taken from her by death, and she left in a disconsolate, forlorn condition, and her children orphans (see John xiv. 15), despising and comfortless (Luke xxiv. 21), from such mean and contemptible beginnings, should spread herself over the world, and will still receive a farther enlargement when the fulness of the Jews and gentiles is come in.

For more are the children of the desolate than the children of the married wife: She that was desolate without inhabitant, shall have more children than ever she had formerly whilst she was married; i.e. while God owned his covenant relation to her, and the land, of which she was metropolis, was full of people (see ver. 5, and lxxii. 4).

and on the left: and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and make the desolate cities to be inhabited.

4 Fear not; for thou shalt not be ashamed: neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame: for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more.

5 For thy Maker is thine husband: the Lord of hosts is his name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel, is thy Saviour.

Ver. 2. The prophet describes the city of Jerusalem, the figure of the Christian church (God's tabernacle, Rev. xxi. 3), under the metaphor of a tent, or tabernacle, the most ancient way of dwelling; and bids her enlarge her borders in proportion to the increase of her inhabitants (compare xlix. 19, 20, xxxiii. 20).

Ver. 3. Thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left: Thy people shall become so numerous, that thou shalt be forced to seek out new habitations for them.

Ver. 4. Thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles: This may he understood, in a low sense, of the Jews enlarging their borders, by the conquests of Judas Maccabeus, over their neighbouring countries (see 1 Macc. v.), and their inhabiting those cities in Juden which had been left desolate, it may be, ever since the captivity of the ten tribes; but the words do plainly imply the enlargement of the church, by admitting the gentiles within her territories, and that the minds of rude and barbarous nations should be cultivated with the knowledge of the true God (see the note on xlix. 8).

Ver. 5. The favour and affection God will show towards thee now, will make thee forget all thy former discouragements and afflictions, both those thou sufferest in Egypt, and afterward in the times of the judges, and those which thou enduredst in the time of thy captivity, when God rejected thee, and left thee in a state of desolation (see ver. 6, 1. 1). This verse, and ver. 6, may have a particular regard to God's calling of the Jews, and restoring them to favour, after they had been rejected a great while (see the note upon ver. 13, and compare Is. 15, lx. 7, lxii. 4).

Ver. 5. For thy Maker is thine husband: Though God had cast thee as for a while (ver. 4), yet he still owns the relation of a husband towards thee, and will show true marks of his conjugal affection to thee (see the note on lxviii. 8).

The God of the whole earth shall he be called. And now the time is coming when he will not be called the God of the Jews only, but also of the gen-ly One of Israel; The God of the whole earth shall he be called.
6 For the Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy God. 7 For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee. 8 In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer.
9 For this is as the waters of Noah unto me: for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee.

tiles, whom he shall admit into the same covenant relation to himself, with the Jews (compare Zech. xiv. 9, Rom. iii. 29).
Ver. 6.] God is now reconciled to thee again, after having cast thee off; and left thee in a desolate and mournful condition (see ver. 1, 4). He will now cherish thee, as if he were newly married to thee (see xix. 4). "A wife of youth" signifies a wife that a man was married to in his youth, who was his first love, and therefore not easily to be parted with (see Prov. v. 18, Mal. ii. 14).
Ver. 7. For a small moment have I forsaken thee.] God's anger towards his servants is short, when compared with that everlasting kindness he will show towards them (see Ps. xxx. 5). The same rule holds true of the church in general, whose "light afflictions are but for a moment" (in comparison of that eternal glory he hath promised them: an earnest of which will be that millennium of rest, which is to usher in the heavenly state, and seems to be described in the following part of the chapter.
But with great mercies will I gather thee. This was to be understood, either of the gathering together of the Jews from their several dispensations (compare xi. 12, xiv. 1-6), or of the uniting the Jews and gentiles in one body, under Christ their head, which will be the effect or consequent of the former (see lvi. 8, lx. 4, lvii. 18, Gen. xlix. 10, Eph. i. 10); or, lastly, it may be expounded of the gathering together of the saints at the last day, when there shall be an entire separation made between them and the wicked (see Matt. xiii. 41, 49, xxv. 31, xlvii. 1, Thees. iv. 17, 2Thees. ii. 1). This place may most probably be understood in the first sense.
Ver. 9.] God's irrevocable promise is elsewhere called his oath, though the formality of swearing was not used (see Ps. lxxxix. 3, cv, 11, cxxxi. 11). This solemn promise which God here makes, must relate to such a time when God will not afflict his people any more: and as it would not have been true if it were applied to the Jews returning from Babylon, for their whole nation and government was afterward utterly ruined by the Romans; so neither can it be made good so long as the present state of the world continues.
Mr. White lath, with great sagacity, discovered the fulfilling of this prophecy, in the present dispersion of the Jews over the world; which most other writers speak of as a remarkable judgment of God upon that nation; that they should never incorporate with any other community, but continue as a separate people from the rest of the world, living everywhere, like strangers, only upon sufferance: and this sort of exile is threatened, as a punishment to be inflicted upon them for their heinous sins, by Moses, Deut. xxviii. 64-66, and by Hosea, iii. 4.
Ver. 10. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee.
11 ¶ O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires.
12 And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carnelians, and all thy borders of pleasant stones.
13 And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord; and great shall be the peace of thy children.
14 In righteousness shall thou be established:
thou shalt be far from oppression; for thou shalt not fear: and from terror; for it shall not come near thee.

15 Behold, they shall surely gather together, not by me: whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall for thy sake.

16 Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the coals in the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and I have created the waster to destroy.

17 ¶ No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord.

whosoever comes against thee, instead of continuing thy enemy, will become thy convert, as St. Paul was at the beginning of Christianity.

Ver. 17. Every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. God will protect and maintain thy innocence against all the malicious suggestions of thine enemies, either men or devils (compare I. 8, 9, Rev. xii. 10).

[Their righteousness is of me.] I will acquit them, and pronounce them innocent or justified; this shall be the portion and privilege of my faithful servants (see xlv. 24, 25). Or righteousness may be equivalent to salvation (see lix. 1, 2).

CHAPTER LV.

1 Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.

2 Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not? hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness.

CHAP. LV.

Argument.—The prophet publishes the free offers of grace by the gospel, and exhorts men not to reject them, but to turn to God by a sincere repentance, who will graciously pardon and accept them.

Ver. 1. Come ye to the waters.] The divine grace is often represented under the emblem of springs and streams of water (see the notes upon xxx. 25, xlv. 3). In like manner divine knowledge, the food and support of the soul, is expressed by the metaphors of meat and drink, which sustain the body (see John vi. 27, and so to the end of the chapter). Under this metaphor the prophet here exhorts men to make use of those means of instruction which the gospel so freely offers. Christ himself expounds the words to this sense, John vii. 37.

Come ye, buy, and eat.] Buying sometimes signifies in general gaining or procuring anything. In this sense Solomon uses the word, when he bids us "buy the truth and sell it not;" i. e. spare no pains to learn it (Prov. xxiv. 23, see likewise Rev. i. 18). It is added, "without money and without price," to show that divine knowledge is of far greater value than to be purchased with money, being the gift of God, and not to be obtained but by earnest prayer and sincere endeavours (compare Eccles. ii. 25, 26).

Ver. 2.] All the pretences to religious knowledge, but such as proceed from God himself, are vain and useless; they can neither instruct men in the truth, nor lead them to happiness.

In fatness.] By fatness is meant all sorts of delicious food (see xxi. 6); and the expression here denotes the true knowledge of God and of happiness, as was observed upon the first verse (compare likewise the following verse).

Ver. 3. I will make an everlasting covenant with you.] The gospel is often called an "everlasting covenant" (see lix. 8, Jer. xxxii. 40, 1, 5) in opposition to the law, which was designed but for a time, and was to give way to a better. And by the terms of this covenant, God will fulfil those promises which he made to David, of establishing his throne for ever (see 2 Sam. vii. 16, Ps. lxxxix. 28): which will not be fully verified, but in the Messias, of whose "kingdom there shall be no end" (see Acts xiii. 34).

Ver. 4. I have given him for a witness to the people.] David is in the prophets often put for Christ, in whom all the promises made to David are to be fulfilled (see Jer. xxx. 9, Ezek. xxxiv. 23, Hos. iii. 5). And as all the prophets are God's witnesses (see the note on xlix. 10), so that title does in an eminent manner belong to the Messias, who was the "great prophet that should come into the world," accordingly he is styled "the faithful witness" (Rev. i. 5), and "for this cause came he into the world, that he should bear witness to the truth," as he speaks himself (John xviii. 37).

A leader and commander to the people.] The word 2 G run unto thee because of the Lord thy God, and for the Holy One of Israel; for he hath glorified thee.

6 ¶ Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near:

7 Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.

8 ¶ For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.

10 For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater:

11 So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing wherein I sent it.

12 For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands.

13 Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.

nagid, which is translated leader, signifies likewise a prince, or ruler; and so it is translated, Dan. ix. 26, where the same title is given to the Messias.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not.] Christ is elsewhere styled the "light of the gentiles" (see xiii. 6, xlix. 6). He hath glorified thee.] See the note on lii. 13.

Ver. 6.] A general exhortation to men, to make use of the means and opportunities of grace which the gospel offers. To the same purpose are those exhortations we read in the New Testament, "not to receive the grace of God in vain" (2 Cor. vi. 2), and to "hearken to God's voice while it is called to-day" (Heb. iii. 13). Which places intimate, that men may outlive their day of grace, and either themselves be "hardened through the deceitfulness of sin;" or else God may "remove their candlestick," and take away those means of instruction from them, which they made no better use of (see Matt. xxv. 46).

Ver. 7.] A general promulgation of pardon, such as properly belongs to the gospel-state (compare Matt. xi. 25, Luke xxiv. 47, Acts xii. 38, 39).

Ver. 8, 9.] My purposes in revealing the gospel carry in them such marks of goodness and condescension in forgiving sins (see ver. 7), and of truth and faithfulness in fulfilling my promises (see ver. 10, 11), that they as far exceed the measures of human proceedings, as heaven is high above the earth.

Ver. 10, 11.] You find by experience that the rain and snow fulfil my pleasure, and answer the ends for which I send them down upon the earth: and you may be assured that my word and promises shall be much more effectual, and fulfil all my gracious purposes and designs, of bringing men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.

Ver. 12. Ye shall go out with joy.] This may be particularly meant of the Jews' return from captivity, as the second verse in the next chapter is to be applied to them: but then we are to consider their call out of Babylon to be an emblem of a greater deliverance; when God will call men by the gospel "out of darkness into his marvellous light," upon which account the Christians are called a "chosen generation," and "a peculiar people," whom God hath separated to himself from the rest of the world (see 1 Pet. ii. 9, Gal. i. 5). Compare the phrase goeth out, with xiii. 7, xlix. 9. The words may be understood of the final restoration of the Jews, which shall be accompanied with bringing in the fulness of the gentiles (compare xxxv. 10).

The mountains and the hills] See note on xiii. 10.

Ver. 13. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree.] Spiritual blessings are often represented under the emblems of fruitfulness and plenty (compare xxxv. 2). So here we may take the words as importing that virtue and holiness shall spring up instead of vice and wickedness; good men being elsewhere compared to fruitful trees (see Ps. i. 3, Luke vi. 44, 45): as the wicked are resembled to briers and thorns (see the note on ix. 15). Or else the words may import a renovation of the world, and restoring it to a paradisal state, as some understand the promise of a "new heaven and new earth," mentioned lxv. 17.

It shall be unto the Lord for a name.] It shall turn to God's praise, and be an everlasting monument or memorial of his goodness. Thus the expression, "for a name," is used Jer. xiii. 11, where, "for a name, for a praise, and for a glory," are used as equivalent terms. So Ezek. xxiii. 10, where our translation reads, "she became famous among women," it is in the original, "she became a name among women."

CHAPTER LVI.

1 Thus saith the Lord, Keep ye judgment, and do justice: for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed.

2 Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold on it; that keepeth the sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil.

3 ¶ Neither let the son of the stranger, that is a stranger in the land, nor the son of a foreigner, that is a sojourner, multiply among you; for they be not of you; neither shall they inherit the land.

4 Ye shall remember that ye were a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the Lord your God brought you out thence: therefore I command you to do this thing.

5 Yet the children of Israel did none of this, but were rebellious against the commandment of the Lord their God, and went and served Baal and Ashtaroth, and served the idols of Syria, and of the Philistines, and of the Asheriim.

6 Therefore the anger of the Lord was kindled against his people, and he abhorred his inheritance.

7 And he delivered them into the hand of the Chaldeans, which made them to serve their gods in the land of Babylon; so were the children of Israel polluted by their idols.

8 Therefore their children have suffered the penalty, and their sons and their daughters also: for they have polluted my Sabbaths, and have regarded not my judgments, neither kept my statutes, neither observed any one of my commandments: but did after the regard of their own hearts.

9 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will give them into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of the wicked, and they shall be a prey to them.

10 And I will make you a stone for they heart, and they shall stumble at you, and thou shalt be broken; and I will lay your scoles among the sinners, and I will cause that the congregation of the earth shall fall upon you, even all that are round about you, in the whole earth.

11 But it shall come to pass, in the last days, that I will pour out the spirit of mine own upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your old men shall dream dreams, and your little ones shall see visions.

12 And also I will lay my hand upon all the nations, that they may serve my people for a servant, and they themselves for a possession.

13 And they shall not oppress any more a poor people, neither shall the spoiler spoil them any more, because I will have mercy upon them, and they shall walk after my judgments, and be judicious in my statutes; they shall not turn unto the iniquity of their fathers, nor remembering the rebelliousness of their ancestors: they shall sit every man under his vine and fig tree, and there shall be no one to make them afraid.

14 For I will comfort them, and increase them, and I will set up my tabernacle among them, and be their God, and they shall be my people.

15 And they shall dwindle no more; neither shall they be distressed any more, nor be ashamed, when they sit upon the mountains, and feed in the vineyards, when they sit among the lilies, and have their food, and their meat fill them, and they make it drunk for themselves, all of them, for that I am married unto them, saith the Lord.

16 For, as the new wine is more pleasant than the old wine, so is the knowledge of my children better than the knowledge of their fathers.

17 For the former knowledge was as the morning, and as the dew that goeth away early morning: but the knowledge of my children shall be as the morning, and as the rain, and as the latter rain upon the earth.
CHAPTER LVI.

hath joined himself to the Lord, speak, saying,
The Lord hath utterly separated me from his people: neither let the eunuch say, Behold, I am a dry tree.

For thus saith the Lord unto the eunuchs that keep my sabbaths, and choose the things that please me, and take hold of my covenant;

Even unto them will I give in mine house and within my walls a place and a name better than of sons and of daughters: and I will give them an everlasting name, that shall not be cut off.

Also the sons of the stranger, that join themselves to the Lord, to serve him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be his servants, every one that keepeth the sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant;

Even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer: their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar; for mine house shall be called an house of prayer for all people.

Yet will I gather others to him, beside those that are gathered unto him.

All ye beasts of the field, come to devour, yea, all ye beasts in the forest.

His watchmen are blind: they are all igno-Taketh hold of my covenant:) The sabbath was ordained as a sign or token of God's covenant with his people (see the note upon ver. 2). So that keeping the sabbath was one sort of initiation into that covenant.

Ver. 7. Even them will I bring to my holy mountain, &c.] This may be understood of those gentle worshippers, who paid their devotions in the " court of the gentiles," a place within the precincts of the temple, set apart for that purpose. Many of these came from distant countries to Jerusalem, at the solemn festivals (see John xii. 20, Acts viii. 27). But we are likewise to understand the words, of the gentiles coming into the Christian church, and joining in the worship of it.

Their burnt offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted] We may understand the words partly of those sacrifices which the gentle converts did offer under the second temple: but the calling of the temple the " house of prayer," doth make it probable that the sacrifices here mentioned are chiefly to be understood of those " spiritual sacrifices " of prayer and thanksgiving, which are proper to the Christian worship (see Heb. xiii. 15, 1 Pet. ii. 5). What Calvin saith upon the place, Loquitor prophetæ figuris, quae suæ conventiæ sæcti, " The prophet uses such expressions," with relation to the gospel-times, " as are taken from the usages of his own time," is a good rule for explaining the idioms of the prophetic writings, where the state of the Christian church is often described by representations taken from the Jewish temple and government (see the notes on xix. 10, lxvi. 23).

For all people.] It was designed for other nations, as well as the Jews, to say their prayers in, at its first dedication by Solomon (see i Kings viii. 41, 42). Although the number of proselytes was not considerable till the times of the second temple.

Ver. 8.] The gathering the dispersed Jews into one body and people again, is but an earnest of what I will do, when " at the fulness of time I shall gather together in one all things by Christ," Eph. i. 10 (see the note on liv. 7).

Ver. 9.] A new chapter should have been begun here; for this is a new prophecy, setting forth, in the remainder of this and the following chapter, the sins and ceremonies which ushered in and ended in the captivity: when, first, Pharaoh-nechah made the land tributary (2 Kings xxiii. 33); then bands of the Chaldeans, Syrians, Ammonites, and Moabites, invaded it (Isid. xxiv. 2); and at last Nebuchadnezzar completed its destruction (compare the expressions here with Jer. xii. 9, Hab. ii. 17).

Ver. 10.] The cause of these miseries is imputed here to the ignorance and carelessness of their governors, both in church and state (see the following runt, they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark; sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber.

11 Yeas. they are greedy dogs which can never have enough, and they are shepherds that cannot understand; they all look to their verse), whom the prophet compares to dumb dogs, that give no warning of approaching thieves, or enemies, but give themselves up to sleep and idleness.

Ver. 11. They are greedy dogs] Or, impudent, so the word vrz elsewhere signifies [see Prov. vii. 13, xxii. 29]. In like manner Homer describes impudence, by αἰτήτων ἵππων ἵππων, "having the eyes or look of a dog."

Shepherd] The word shepherd signifies civil govers, as well as ecclesiastical guides [see xlv.

out the tongue? are ye not children of transgression, a seed of falsehood,

5 Enambling yourselves with idols under every green tree, slaying the children in the valleys under the cliffs of the rocks?

ed a meat offering. Should I receive comfort in these?

with which they honoured the memory of their pious princes.

Each one walking in his uprightness:] Or, "that hath walked in his uprightness."

Ver. 3.] The prophet summons those that practise the sorceries and idolatries of the heathen to come and hear their doom: these he calls the "sons of the sorcerers," and the "seed of the adulterer;" as our Saviour calls the wicked Jews, "an adulterers generation" (Matt. xvi. 4). Adultery being taken in a spiritual sense for departing from God, and breaking that faith and allegiance which is due to him, and especially for renouncing him, and worshipping idols [see the note on xviii. 8]. Men are called in scripture the children of those whose practices they imitate [see John viii. 39, 41, 44].

Ver. 4.] Gestures of scorn and contempt, by which this idolatrous crew declared their hatred and despite to God's true servants.

Ver. 5. Enambling yourselves with idols] Idolatry being spiritual adultery, is sometimes compared to the rage of lust [see Ezek. xvi. xxiii.]. It is true, too, that those shady graves dedicated to idol-worship, were a shelter for all manner of impurities [see Hos. iv. 13, 14].

Slaying the children in the valleys under the cliffs of the rocks?] Offering them in sacrifice unto Moloch: a sin severely prohibited [Lev. xx. 2, &c.], and yet much practised in the times of the idolatrous kings of Judah [see 2 Chron. xxviii. 3, 2 Kings xxiii. 34, 2 Kings xxvi. 3]. And the "valley of Hin-norn" was chiefly noted for this inhuman practice [see Jer. vii. 31].

Ver. 6. Among the smooth stones of the stream [or, of the valley] is thy portion, &c.] The words may be understood of the altars built there, or of stone pillars, erected for idolatrous worship, which they used to anoint with oil, or pour out their offerings upon them, such as the text here mentions: from whence came.

CHAPTER LVII.

CHAPTER LVII.

ARGUMENT.—The same subject is continued which was begun in the last chapter; and in this the prophet reproves the idolatries which were so publicly practised in the latter times of the kings of Judah, and which provoked God to deliver up his people captives to the Babylonians, from whence nevertheless he promises to deliver them, at the latter end of the chapter.

Ver. 1. The righteous perisheth.] This may be understood either of Hezekiah or of Josiah: Hezekiah had a promise made him that peace should continue during his days (xxxix. 8). Josiah had likewise a promise of dying in peace, and not seeing the evil which God would bring upon Jerusalem (2 Kings xxii. 20).

No man layeth it to heart:] No man reflects with himself how sore a judgment it is to have good men, and especially pious princes, taken away in bad times, who might either by their prayers avert impending judgments, or, by their prudence and vigilance, apply proper remedies to the public calamities.

Merciful men are taken away.] The Hebrew word ἀσάφ signifies to be gathered, and is used of men's being laid in the sepulchres of their ancestors: which is elsewhere expressed, by being "gathered unto their people." So Josiah is said to be "gathered to his grave" (2 Kings xxii. 20). In other places the word is joined with being buried (see Jer. viii. 2, xxv. 33). So we read, Job xxvii. 18, "The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered;" where the word were better translated buried.

Ver. 2. They shall rest in their beds.] As death is compared to sleep, so the grave is resembled to lying down in a bed (see xiv. 13). Particularly we read, 2 Chron. xvi. 14, of the "bed of spices" in which king Asa was laid: and if we understand the text before us, of the death of some of their good kings, the phrase may allude to the costly funerals own way, every one for his gain, from his quarter.

12 Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant.

28, Jer. xxv. 34, xlix. 19, Zech. xi. 3, 5, 8, &c.

Every one for his gain, from his quarter.] That is, every one from his quarter minds only his own advantage; they are all alike, from one end to the other; so the word μικτακέβ signifies from every quarter, Gen. xix. 4.

Ver. 12. To-morrow shall be as this day.] This ey said to deride the threatenings of destruction which the prophets denounced against them.

7 Upon a lofty and high mountain hast thou set thy bed; even thence wintest thou up to offer sacrifice.

8 Behind the doors also and the posts hast thou set up thy remembrance; for thou hast discovered thyself to another than me, and art gone up; thou hast enlarged thy bed, and made thee a covenant with them; thou lovest their bed where thou sawest it.

9 And thou wintest to the king with ointment, and didst increase thy perfumes, and didst send thy messengers far off, and didst debate thyself even unto hell.

10 Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way; yet saist thou not, There is no hope; thou hast found the life of thine hand; therefore thou wast not grieved.

11 And of whom hast thou been afraid or feared, that thou hast lied, and hast not remembered me, nor laid it to thy heart? have not I held my peace even of old, and thou fearest me not?

12 I will declare thy righteousness, and thy works; for they shall not profit thee.

13 ¶ When thou criest, let thy companies deliver thee; but the wind shall carry them all away; vanity shall take them; but lie that putteth they counted the king of Assyria, at other times the king of Egypt, as he best served their interest.

And didst debate thyself even unto hell.] Thou didst start the favour of these foreign princes by thy ambassadors, in the most abject and submissive terms.

Ver. 10. Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way.] Thou hast tried all ways to save thyself from the evils that threaten thee; thou hast sought the friendship of foreign princes, and of their gods (see 2 Chron. xxviii. 21, 23.) And though thou hast found thyself disappointed in all these projects; yet until thou hast ceased receiving benefit from their friendship and alliance.

Thou hast found the life of thine hand, &c. This, hast made a shift by these methods to support thyself for the present, therefore thou dost not feel any remorse for thy evil practices.

Ver. 11. Of whom hast thou been afraid or feared, that thou hast lied.] The fear of God's displeasure ought, in all reason, to outweigh all other fears and apprehensions (see II. 12, 13), and deter thee from breaking that faith and covenant whereby thou art engaged to him (see ver. 3, 8). Departing from God is called, in other places, "dealing treacherously with him" (Jer. iii. 20, v. 11).

Have not I held my peace even of old, and thou fearest me not?] "The Bishops' Bible, published under queen Elizabeth, translates the place thus; "it is not because I held my peace, and that of a long time, therefore thou fearest me not." Simons takes encouragement to continue in sin, from God's patience and long-suffering (see Ps. 1. 21, Eccles. viii. 11).

Ver. 12.] I will show thee thy deserts, and give thee a view of thy deeds, which then will appear quite another sort, than what thy own self-conceit makes thee believe them to be; and see whether thou canst ground any hope or comfort in them.

Ver. 13. Let thy companies deliver thee.] Let thy allies or associates help thee, whose assistance thou hast taken such pains to procure (see ver. 9). But they will not be able to deliver themselves (compare Jer. xxii. 22).

But he that putteth his trust in me shall possess the land.] Those that still depend upon me, and make use of none of these indirect means to preserve themselves, shall return from captivity, and enjoy their native country, the premiums of attending upon my service, either by themselves, or in their posterity. The prophets, after they have denounced God's threatenings against the Jews, do usually conclude with promises of receiving them again into favour upon their amendment: to show that that nation have still a title to the promises made by God unto their fathers, whenever they will render themselves worthy to receive them (see Rom. xi. 29).

Ver. 14. And shall say, &c. Or, "it shall be said," or "orders shall be given:" for the verb active is here used impersonally, as is frequent in other places.
teth his trust in me shall possess the land, and shall inherit my holy mountain;

14 And shall say, Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way, take up the stumbling block out of the way of my people.

15 For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones.

16 For I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made.

(see the note on xli. 18). The words imply that God will take care of facilitating the return of the faithful out of captivity, and will remove all impediments that may hinder their passage home, just as if harbingers were to go before them, and plane the roads for them (see xl. 3, xliii. 10).

Ver. 15. Though my throne be in heaven, yet I do not disdain to converse with the lowly and meek, and such as humble themselves under my hand, whom I will relieve, and comfort in their afflictions (compare lxvi. 2, John xiv. 23).

Ver. 16. God hath compassion upon the work of his hands, and does not deal with men according to the rigour of justice, else they would quickly be brought to nothing (see Ps. lxxviii. 39, ci. 13, 14, Jer. x. 24).

* Ver. 17. For the iniquity of his covetousness] See xvi. 11, lix. 4, &c.

I hid me, and was soreth.] God's withdrawing his mercy or protection, is expressed by hiding his face (see viii. 17, Deut. xxxii. 20, Job xiii. 21, Lam. iii. 44).

Ver. 18. I have seen his ways, and will heal him:] I have seen a reformation of his manners, and will remove my heavy judgments (compare lviii. 8, lix. 20, Jer. xxxii. 19, 20).

CHAPTER LVIII.

1 Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and shew my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins.

2 Yet they seek me daily, and delight to know my ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: they ask of me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching to God.

3 ¶ Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not? Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge? Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure, and exact all your labours.

4 Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness: ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high.

5 Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day

Ver. 2. Yet they seek me daily.] To seek God is the same as to draw nigh unto him in his ordinances, such as are prayer, repentance, reading or hearing his word, or any other religious exercise, which may inflame us of his will, and procure us his favour.

Ver. 3. Wherefore have we afflicted our soul.] By fasting and humiliation: a phrase used particularly of the great day of expiation (Lev. xvi. 29, xxii. 27).

In the day of your fast you find pleasure, and exact all your labours. Or, as the words may more significantly be rendered, "you find wherewithal to please yourselves, and you are rigorous in grieving, or burdening others." You gratify your own passions, especially your covetousness, and you oppress the poor, and so are defective in the duties both of justice and charity, as it follows.
for a man to afflic his soul! is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?

6 Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?

7 Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him? and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?

8 Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily: and thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward.

9 Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer: thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am. If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity;

10 And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfie the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon day:

11 And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not.

12 And thy light shall be as of the Lord shall build the old waste places: thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called. The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in.

13 If thou turn away thy foot from the sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, and call the sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour him, not do-changed into a happy and glorious one (compare ix. i. 2, Job xi. 17, and here, ver. 10).

Thine health shall spring forth speedily: As calamities are often expressed by wounds or sickness (see i. 7, Jer. xxv. 19), so the restoring any person or nation to their former prosperity, is expressed by healing them (see xix. 22, lxi. 19, etc. ix. 22).

The glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward:

God's favour protecting thine innocence, shall both guide and defend thee (see the note on li. 12).

Ver. 9. If thou take away— the yoke. See ver. 6.

The putting forth of the finger. The expression probably alludes to some gesture they used in their conversation, whether of mocking or threatening others: or it may signify any the least attempt towards the invading the right of others (compare lx. 3, see Ps. xxvii. 5). "To put forth the hand unto iniquity," is to offer at something which is not consistent with righteousness or justice.

Speaking vanity. Vanity here means falsch hood and deceit, which is too often used in men's dealings with each other; so the word is taken, lix. 4, where it is used for transgression; and therefore it inequitably.

Ver. 10. If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry. If thou extend thy compassions to him that is in need. A charitable temper is commonly expressed by a large soul, as a niggardly person is called a narrow-souled man, whose thoughts and affections are confined wholly to himself and his own concerns.

Ver. 11. Drought is put for any sort of want, because dry ground is barren, and destitute of all conveniences for the support of life. And therefore God's grace and blessing is often represented by the metaphor of watering dry ground with streams and rivers, as it follows here, "thou shalt be like a watered garden," &c. (compare xxx. 24, xxxvi. 6, xl. 18, xxiv. 5).

Make fat thy bones. The phrase denotes a good habit of body (compare Job xxxi. 24, Prov. iii. 8): the dry bones signify the state of death (Ezek. xxxvii. 4).

Ver. 12. They that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places. Shall rebuild those houses and cities which have of a long time laid ruinous (compare xli. 4, and see the note there), and have been razed from the very foundations (see Ps. cxxxvii. 7).

The restorer of paths to dwell in: When the cities which have lain desolate are re habitated, the roads that lead to them will be again frequented (compare Judg. v. 6, Ps. cvii. 7).

Ver. 13. If thou abstain from following thy own
ISAIAH.

I1 Then shall thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and to feed thou with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

CHAPTER LIX.

1 Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear:

2 But your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear:

3 For your hands are defiled with blood, and your fingers with iniquity; your lips have spoken lies, your tongue hath muttered perverseness:

4 None calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth; they trust in vanity, and speak lies; they conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity:

5 They hatch cockatrice's eggs, and weave the spider's web: he that eateth of their eggs dieth, and that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper:

6 Their webs shall not become garments, neither shall they cover themselves with their works:

CHAP. LIX.

ARGUMENT.—The Jews seem to call God's power into question, because he did not deliver them from their enemies, as he had formerly done. In answer to which cavil, the prophet tells them, it is not defect of power in God, but their own sins which hinder him from showing his former favours toward them. However, he promises that God will at length visit and redeem them, not out of any regard to their merits, but purely for the sake of his own honour, and to make good his former promises.

Ver. 1, 2.] The reason of the continuance of your calamities is not want, either of power in God to deliver you, or of goodness to hear your prayers: but your own iniquities make him a stranger to you, interrupt the correspondence that used to be between God and his people, and stop the course of his blessings.

Ver. 4. None calleth for justice, &c.] There is no consideration had for justice, either in the public judicatories, or in men's private dealings. The arguments taken from right and wrong have no place in resolutions.

They conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity.] They form mischievous designs in their minds, which they afterward put in execution (compare Job xv. 35. Ps. vii. 14).

Ver. 5.] The same sense couched in metaphorical of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of (see Ps. xxxiv. 8); not burdensome, as it was to those Jews whom the prophet Amos reproves (viii. 5).

I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth.] I will exalt thee above thy neighbouring nations, and give thee possession of their mountains, whither they use to betake themselves, as to an impregnable fortress (compare Deut. xxxii. 13, xxxiii. 29. Ezek. xxxvi. 2).

And feed thee with the heritage of Jacob] Thou shalt enjoy the land I gave to him, and all these blessings which I promised to him and his posterity.

terms; their villainous contrivances being compared first to a cockatrice's eggs, which are rank poison in themselves, and when they are hatched produce a venomous serpent: and then to a spider's web, both for the artificial fineness of them, and because they are as so many nets to entrap others.

Ver. 6.] Though their contrivances are finely wrought, yet they are too thin and weak to be of any real advantage (see Job viii. 14): and their works can neither cover nor defend the actors.

Ver. 8. They have made them crooked paths.] They have turned aside out of the way of God's commandments, which are a plain and straight way (compare Ps. cxxx. 5. Prov. li. 15, iv. 27).

Ver. 9. Therefore is judgment far from us.] Because we have no regard for justice nor honesty, God will not plead our cause against our oppressors.

We wait for light, but behold obscurity.] We still hope for better times, but are under a cloud, in a dismal condition. Compare lviii. 8, where happiness is expressed by the "breaking forth of light."

Ver. 10. We grope for the wall like the blind.] We are surrounded with darkness, and have no glimmering of light or comfort; so that we know not which way to turn away ourselves (compare Deut. xviii. 29).

We are in desolate places as dead men.] We are banished from the world, as the dead that have no longer any portion in it: the same sense is thus expressed, Ps. xliv. 19, "Thou hast smitten us into the place of dragons" (or serpents, that frequent sol-
CHAPTER LIX.

11 We roar all like bears, and mourn sore like doves: we look for judgment, but there is none; for salvation, but it is far off from us.

12 For our transgressions are multiplied before thee, and our sins testify against us: for our transgressions are with us: and as for our iniquities, we know them;

13 In transgressing and lying against the Lord, and departing away from our God, speaking oppression and revolting, conceiving and uttering from the heart words of falsehood.

14 And judgment is turned away backward, and justice standeth afar off: for truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter.

15 Yea, truth faileth; and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey: and the Lord saw it, and it displeased him that there was no judgment.

16 ¶ And he said that there was no man, and wondered that there was no intercessor: therefore his arm brought salvation unto him; and his righteousness, it sustained him.

17 For he put on righteousness as a breast-plate, and an helmet of salvation upon his head; and he put on the garments of vengeance for clothing, and was clad with zeal as a cloak.

18 According to their deeds, accordingly he will repay: furnish to his adversaries recompence to his enemies; to the islands he will repay recompence.

19 So shall they fear the name of the Lord from the west, and his glory from the rising of the sun. When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him.

20 ¶ And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord.

21 As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord; My spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever.

the place of other accoutrements which belong to a soldier.

Ver. 18. To the islands he will pay recompence.] He will severely punish the foreign nations which have been the oppressors of God's people (see ver. 10, 11), and make them feel the same miseries they have inflicted upon others (see the note upon xxi. 2). The Jews call all countries islands which they go to by sea (see note on xi. 11).

Ver. 19. From the west, and—frorn the rising of the sun.] God's thus appearing in behalf of his people, shall make his name and power known far and near.

When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard.] When nothing seems able to withstand the enemy, but he carries all before him, as the flood overtakes a country, then God himself will give him a remarkable check, and visibly interpose in behalf of his oppressed people (compare xxxi. 9).

Ver. 20. The Redeemer shall come to Zion.] This and the following verse are expounded by St. Paul of that general restoration of the Jewish nation, which he assures us shall come to pass in the latter times (see Rom. xi. 26, 27, compare Obad. ver. 17, 21). And the words of the foregoing verse, which speak of God's name being feared from one end of the world to the other, do plainly look that way, as also the following chapter.

Unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob.] God's promises are only made to the penitent (compare lvii. 15, 12, lviii. 8, and see the notes upon xxviii. 12, with liv. 19).

Ver. 21.] This must be understood of Christ, the great prophet and oracle of the church, who came from heaven to declare unto us the whole counsel of God, and whom we are to hear and obey in all things (compare II. 16, Ix. 1). The words contain a promise to the church, his spiritual children (compare viii. 19), of being "guided by God's Spirit into all truth," and that this Spirit shall "continue with them for ever," Which promise shall receive its utmost completion, when God's "people shall be all righteous, and shall be taught of him" (see liv. 13, lx. 21).
CHAPTER LX.

ARGUMENT.—We may suppose the ground-work of the prophecies, contained in this and the two following chapters, to be the Jews' restoration from captivity; but any discerning reader may easily be satisfied, that the prophet takes occasion from thence to describe the glories of Christ's kingdom, which began upon the first publication of the gospel, but will not be completed till the fulness of the Jews and gentiles are come into the church; which is the general subject of the prophecies which follow to the end of the book. The reasons Mr. White hath advanced against this interpretation, shall be considered under each verse of this chapter, from whence he takes them.

Ver. 1. It is a usual metaphor to describe happiness by light, and affliction by darkness. So here Jerusalem is bid to arise from the ground or the dust where her afflictions had laid her low, and like the morining star, or sun, to give light to all about her, and communicate to others part of that honour and lustre she which hath received from God, the true sun of righteousness (compare Mal. iv. 2).

Ver. 2, 3. When ignorance, like a thick darkness, spreads over the world, then shall the light of God's truth, like the "day-spring from on high," diffuse itself over the earth, and excite the gentiles to seek instruction from the church as from an oracle (compare ii. 3).

Ver. 3. And kings to the brightness of thy rising.] The graces and glories of the church shall attract the eyes of kings, and make them willing to become her proselytes (compare xlix. 23).

Ver. 4. The prophet describes the fulness of the church by the gentiles coming into it, and bringing the dispersed remainder of the Jews along with them (see the note on xi. 12), whom they are said to take the same care of in their journey as a nurse does of a sucking child. For to that sense, I think, the last words of the verse should be rendered "And thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side" (compare xlix. 22. Deut. i. 31).

Ver. 5. Then thou shalt see, and flow together.] Thy joy shall break out upon thee like an overflowing river; and the sudden transports of it shall produce an astonishment like that which arose from the impressions of fear: for which reason the effects of one passion are ascribed to the other: the prophet Jeremiah useth the same metaphor (xxxii. 9).

"They shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and all the prosperity that I procure unto it." The same figure occurs in Lucretius, lib. ii. init. ——"Ita me quadam divina voluptas infict, atque horor." ——

Because the fulness of the Gentiles shall be converted unto thee.] A multitude of people is compared to many waters, xvii. 12, Rev. xvii. 15. Or the words may be understood of the multitude of those that came from the sea, as if the sea had transported all its passengers hither (see ver. 9). Others explain it of the riches which are brought by sea, and dedicated to God's service (see ver. 6), in which sense the word honon is used, Eccles. v. 10, and so the Septuagint here understand it. The following words explain this of the fulness of the gentiles coming into the church.

The forces of the gentiles] Others render it, "The riches of the gentiles" (see ver. 6, 16, and lx. 6).

Ver. 6. The multitude of camels shall cover thee, the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah.] The Aramaeans and great stocks of camels, and such like beasts of burden (see Judg. vi. 5, vii. 12), Ephah was a son of Midian (see Gen. xxv. 4), from whom part of that country had its name.

They shall bring gold and incense.] The conversion of heathen nations is elsewhere expressed by their bringing offerings to God, and dedicating part of their wealth to his service (see xviii. 7, xxi. 18). This may be farther verified in that glorious state of the church described Rev. xxi. 24, 26.

Ver. 7. All the flocks of Kedar—the rams of Nebaioth] Kedar and Nebaioth were two sons of Ishmael, who settled themselves in Arabia (see Gen. xxv. 13). Their substance did chiefly consist in their cattle, with which they travelled from one place to another, according as they could find pasture (see Judg. vi. 5, and the note upon xxi. 18).

They shall come up with acceptance on mine altar.] This may in some measure be understood of the offerings brought out of the neighbouring countries to the second temple (see the note on xlv. 14). But the whole scope of the chapter plainly regards the coming of the gentiles into the church, and dedicating part of their substance to the service of God: nor is this expression a demonstration to the contrary, as Mr. White too confidently pronounces, insomuch as nothing is more usual than for the prophets to describe the state of the Christian church, by representations taken from the Jewish temple ships of Tarshish first, to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, and to the Holy One of Israel, because he hath glorified thee.

10 And the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee; for in my wrath I smote thee, but in my favour have I had mercy on thee.

11 Therefore thy gates shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night; that men may bring unto thee the forces of the Gentiles, and that their kings may be brought.

12 For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted.

13 The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box tree, to beautify the place of my sanctuary; and I will make the place of my feet glorious.

14 The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee; and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet; and they shall call thee, The city of the Lord, The Zion of the Holy One of Israel.

15 Whereas thou hast been forsaken and even of the highest rank and dignity, that the gates must continually stand open to give them admittance.

Ver. 12. This must relate to the latter days, as the scripture calls them, when the church shall become a great mountain, and break in pieces all the kingdoms of the earth, according to Daniel's prophecy (Dan. ii. 35, 44), and then the faithful shall have power over the nations, and rule the refractory with a rod of iron, as it is foretold Rev. xi. 26, 37.

Ver. 13. Lebanon was reckoned one of the pleasantest parts of Judea (see xxxiii. 9, xxxvi. 2); and was particularly beautiful for its tall cedars (see xxxvii. 24). So the expression denotes, that the cedars, and whatever other trees grow in Lebanon, shall contribute to the re-ediifying and beautifying God's temple, which is called here the place of God's feet, as the ark is elsewhere called his foot-stool, because the divine Shechinah, or glory, sat between the two cherubims, which were placed over the ark (see Ps. xxxiii. 7). This implies, in the spiritual sense, everything that tends to the adorning and perfecting the church, which is called the house and building of God (see I Tim. iii. 15, I Cor. iii. 9, Eph. ii. 20, and compare Zech. vi. 12, 13).

Ver. 14. The sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee; they shall acknowledge the errors of their fathers, and instead of being persecutors, shall become proselytes.

They that despised thee, &c.] See the note on xlix. 23, and compare Rev. iii. 9.

The city of the Lord, The Zion of the Holy One of Israel.] Mr. White is pleased to say, in his argument upon this chapter, that the church cannot be compared with any part of the earth called the city of the Lord, or the Zion of the Holy One of Israel. This must seem a strange assertion to any one that hath read the New Testament, where the church, as consisting of all its members, both militant and triumphant, and united together under God and Christ, is expressly called mount Zion, the city of the living God, and the heavenly Jerusalem; of which the city which stood on earth called by that name was a figure, Heb. xii. 22, The Lamb, i. e. Christ, is said to stand upon mount Zion, Rev. xiv. 1. Christ is called the corner-stone placed in Zion, whereon the church is built and supported, 1 Pet. ii. 6, and he is called the Deliverer, or Redeemer, that shall come out of Zion, Rom. xi. 36.

Ver. 15.] This may in the first sense apply to Jerusalem, which, during the captivity, lay desolate, and was the subject of scorn and reproach to all her neighbours (see Lam. ii. 15): but afterward recovered some degree of her ancient glory. And may be applied to the church and nation of the Jews, whenever God shall please to restore them, after their having been so long rejected by him (compare lx. 4, 7). But some of the expressions
ISAIAH.

19 The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory.

20 Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself: for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended.

21 Thy people also shall be all righteous: they shall inherit the land for ever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified.

22 A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the Lord will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER LXI.

1 The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach... of our Saviour, supplied this external unction (see Acts x. 28), and qualified him for the office of a prophet beyond all others that were before him, because he had the Spirit given to him "without measure" (John iii. 34), and in this respect was "anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows" (see the note upon xi. 2).

We have Christ's own authority for applying this text to himself (Luke iv. 18).

To preach good tidings unto the meek; Or, "To preach the gospel to the poor," as the words are rendered by the Septuagint, whom the evangelists follow (Luke vii. 22). The humble and poor in spirit have a peculiar title to the privileges of the gospel (see the notes on xi. 4, xxvi. 6). And persons of a mean condition, such whose affections were not too much set upon the graces of the world, were those who most readily embraced it, when it was first preached (see 1 Cor. i. 26, 27, Jan. ii. 3).

"He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted;" To give ease to those that are grieved and wearied with the burden of their sins: a metaphor taken from surgeons binding up wounds (see i. 6).

The opening of the prison to them that are bound. See the notes upon xii. 7. The Septuagint render the latter part of the sentence, "recovering of sight to the blind," and so St. Luke reads; which interpretation several learned men have shown to be very agreeable to the original.

Ver. 2. To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord.

In allusion to the proclaiming the year of jubilee, which was done by sound of trumpet (Lev. xxv. 9), when there was a general release of all manner of servitude, debts, and obligations (Jer. xxxvii. 5): a type of that freedom which Christ hath purchased for us.

The day of vengeance of our God. Mr. White chooses to translate this passage in his recital of this prophecy (Luke iv. 18), from whence he concludes, that he is no way concerned in it: it was not, indeed, the business of Christ's first coming; to take vengeance of his enemies, and for that reason he might not mention it at his first entrance into his office; though we find, in several of his discourses, he threatened the Jews with destruction for their rejecting him (see Matt. xxii. 43, 44, xxii. 7, xxiii. 28); and he calls the destruction of Jerusalem "the days of vengeance" (Luke xxi. 23), the very expression of the text; which does properly most to his second coming, when he will not only reward his servants, but justify their innocence, by the terrible judgments he will inflict upon his enemies, from his throne (compare xxiv. 8, xlvii. 4, lxvi. 14, Deut. xxxii. 36, 43, Jer. li. 9, 10, Mal. iv. 3, Luke xix. 27, 2 Thess. i. 6, 7).

To comfort all that mourn. That mourning for their own iniquities, and for the public sins and calamities (see the notes on lvii. 18). In like manner, our Saviour's sermon upon the mount begins with promising comfort to those that mourn (Matt. v. 4).

Ver. 3. To appoint [comfort] unto them that mourn.

in Zion.] A description of the change that should be in their outward habit and appearance, in proportion to the change of their circumstances. Whereas, whilst they were mourners, they used to put ashes on their heads (see 2 Sam. xiii. 10, Lam. ii. 10); now they should wear a crown or diadem (for the word pear signifies an ornament proper for the head, Ezek. xxiv. 17) in token of their joy (see the note on xxxv. 10). They should likewise anoint themselves, which they abstained from in times of mourning (see Dan. x. 3, Matt. vi. 17); and change their mourning garments for festal ones (see Zech. iii. 5—8, Luke xxii. 29).

Trees of righteousness.] The righteous are elsewhere resembled to fruitful and flourishing trees (see Ps. i. 3, xxii. 12).

The planting of the Lord. See ix. 21.

Ver. 4. We may interpret this to a spiritual sense, of repairing what is decayed by ignorance and corruption (see the notes upon xix. 5): but if we suppose the Jews, after their conversion, to return into their own land, an opinion countenanced by several prophecies of the Old Testament (see the notes upon xi. 11), we may fitly explain this text of their re-establishing their ancient habitations (compare Ezek. xxxvi. 33—36). And this interpretation agrees very well with the following words, "the desolations of many generations."

Ver. 5. By strangers and aliens may be meant those gentiles who are "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise," as St. Paul calls them, Eph. ii. 12 (compare lxii. 8). And the promise of "having power over the nations," is not only made to Christ, but likewise to his faithful servants (see Rev. vii. 20, 27, and the notes upon xiv. 3).

Ver. 6. Ye shall be named the priests of the Lord, &c. If we suppose these words contain a peculiar promise to the Jews, after their conversion, they import, that God will restore to them that honourable title of being a kingdom of priests, formerly given to them (Exod. xix. 6), and admit them to a near attendance upon himself: accordingly some learned men suppose the Jewish church received from the Revelation, by the "four-and-twenty elders (alluding to the four-and-twenty courses of the priests), clothed in white raiment (as priests), and having on their heads crowns of gold," as advanced to a regal dignity (Rev. iv. 8): but this privilege of "being priests to God," does in some degree belong to all Christians (see 1 Pet. ii. 5); especially when they shall come to suppose the Jewish bondage of sin, and the whole burden of it, is laid upon them; and continually employed in God's service (see Rev. v. 10, xx. 6).

In their glory shall ye boast yourselves.] All that cost and riches, which the gentile converts shall dedicate to the service of God, shall redound to your honour and the glory of that religion which you teach and profess (compare ix. 5, 6, 10, lxvi. 12, Rev. xxii. 24).

But I must not conceal an ingenious exposition of these two verses, communicated to me by a learned 7 For your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 Pity ye the love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt-offering: and I will direct their work in truth, and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LorD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so shall the Lord God cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations.
CHAPTER LXXII.

1 For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate: but thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah, and thy land Beulah: for the Lord delighteth in thee, and thy hand shall be married.

CHAP. LXII.

ARGUMENT.—The same subject is still continued, and the former promises of restoring the Jewish church and nation are again confirmed by a solemn oath of God's (ver. 5), which to me is an evident proof, that this prophecy relates to a scene of affairs that is still future.

Ver. 1.] The prophet speaks here in the person of the Messiah, as he did at the beginning of the last chapter, and saith that he will never cease interceding with God, till the redemption of Israel be brought to pass (compare ver. 6, 7, of this chapter).

Ibid. and ver. 2. Until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, &c. Till the glory and salvation, with which God will honour it, be illustrious in the eyes of all the world (compare lx. 1—3).

Righteousness is elsewhere joined with salvation, as equivalent to it (see xlvii. xliii. 10); as it is joined with glory, in the following verse, to the same sense (see likewise xlviii. 18, liv. 17).

Thou shalt be called by a new name.] That of Hephzi-bah, mentioned ver. 4 (compare likewise lv. 15). Giving new names to persons denotes the altering their state and condition (see Gen. xxxii. 29, Hos. 1, 6, 9, 11).

Ver. 3.] A crown of glory in the hand of the Lord.] Or rather, by the hand (or power) of the Lord. A crown being the most glorious part of royal attire, whatever is most precious, honourable, or ornamental, is signified by that name (see Job xxxi. 36, Zech. ix. 16, 1 Thess. ii. 19). Or the phrase may mean, that God will make Jerusalem his bride (see the following verse, and lx. 10). For it was the custom to put a crown upon the head of the bride and bridegroom at the time of their marriage (see Cant. iii. 11, Ezek. xvi. 8, 12).

Ver. 4.] The covenant relation between God and his people, is represented by his being their husband (see liv. 3, Jer. xii. 15). This title includes both love and protection: but when God forsaketh them, and delivered them up for a prey to their enemies; this was a sort of divorcing himself from them, which is implied in the word asubab, forsaken (see xlix. 14, liv. 6). And when the land lay desolate, it was in a state of widowhood (see liv. 1). But now God saith, he will renew his former love towards them, and "take delight in them, as a bridegroom doth in his bride" (ver. 5). "Their hand shall be

5 5 For as a young man married a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence.

7 And give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.

8 The Lord hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, Surely I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for which the thou hast laboured:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, married to him again, and no longer in a state of widowhood and desolation, but inhabited and replenished with people; for so the Septuagint translate the word ἑνίκησα (see the following verse).

Ver. 5.] The word marry is not to be taken strictly, for it would be improper to say that children married their mother; but as it implies living with their mother, now she is owned by her husband: her former desolations implying both loss of children and widowhood (see xlvii. 9, xlix. 21).

Ver. 6.] The word shomerim doth properly signify those priests and Levites who kept watch day and night about the temple; and some of them at certain hours sung psalms of prayer and praise (see I Chron. xxvii. 33, xxviii. 12, 2 Chron. viii. 14, xiii. 11, Ps. xxxiv. 2). This their office or charge is called mishmeroth in the Hebrew, a word derived from the same root with shomerim. To these the prophet compares those pious persons, who will in all ages be importunate with God for completing this blessing.

Ibid. and ver. 7. Ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence, &c.] The marginal reading is better, "Ye that are the Lord's remembrancers, keep not silence." The expression alludes to the same office of the priests and Levites, who by their daily prayers and intercessions put God in mind of the state of the church, and continually importuned him for the welfare thereof. The scripture elsewhere speaks of God after the manner of men, as one that might be overcome by importunity (see Luke xi. 8, 9, xvii. 5—7).

Ver. 8.] Lifting up the hand was a ceremony used in swearing (see Deut. xxxii. 40, Ezek. xx. 5, 15). And here God swears by that very hand which uses to be held up at the taking of an oath, i.e. by his power and might, as it follows, that the enemies of his people should never interrupt that peace and plenty which he gives them, but they should quietly enjoy his blessings with hearts full of thankfulness for them. This must relate to some happier condition than the Jews enjoyed after their return from captivity, when their enemies frequently invaded them, and at last the Romans destroyed both their temple and nation. And the oath which useth in this promise, proves that it will be exactly and punctually performed.

Ver. 9.] The expressions allude to the ordinances of the law, which required the people to spend their first-fruits, and other hallowed things, at the temple, in a thankful acknowledgment to God for his blessings (see Deut. xiii. 11, 12, xiv. 29, 30).
and praise the Lord; and they that have brought it together shall drink it in the courts of my holiness.

10 § Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people.

Ver. 10. Prepare you the way of the people, &c.] The prophet, relying upon God's oath (ver. 5), speaks of the general restoration of the Jews, as if it were actually a doing; and exHORTS those nations, through whose territories they were to pass in their return homeward, to go out of their cities and repair the roads, raising causeways in the lower grounds, and levelling the rough and stony places (compare xi. 3, lvii. 14). By this figure the prophet signifies a removal of all obstacles which might hinder their return.

Lift up a standard for the people.] To gather the dispersed (see xi. 12).

CHAPTER LXIII.

1 Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength! I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save.

CHAP. LXIII.

ARGUMENT.—The last three chapters contained a description of the glorious state of the church in the latter days, when it should be enlarged by the conversion of the Jews, and the fulness of the gentiles. Now the prophet comes to describe the "day of vengeance," mentioned lxi. 2. The beginning of the chapter is by way of dialogue between the prophet, or the church, and Christ, where the latter is described as returning in triumph from the slaughter of his enemies; which seems to be much the same scene as was represented ch. xxxiv. (see likewise Joel iii. 12-14). Then follow, from the seventh verse of this chapter to the end of the sixty-fourth, devout meditations upon God's former mercies to his people, mixed with his promises for their future, and his forsaking them, and casting them off, and humble acknowledgments of their sins, which deserved such treatment.

Ver. 1. Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?] The Idumæans joined with the enemies of the Jews, in bringing on the destruction of Jerusalem at the time of the captivity; for which they are severely reproved by the prophets, and threatened with utter extermination (see Ps. cxxxvii. 7, Obad. ver. 10, &c. Ezek. xxv. 13); which accordingly came to pass (see Mal. i. 3). But I have already observed, in the note upon xi. 14, that it is usual for the prophet to denote the enemies of the church in general, by the name of some country, which was remarkable for its hatred towards the Jewish nation, as the Idumæans were.

And the prophet seems to take a hint from some remarkable calamity that befell the Edomites, to describe some more general judgment that should be inflicted upon the enemies of God's church and truth. Compare ch. xxxiv. where I observed upon the fifth and sixth verses, that the words Edom and Bozrah

11 Behold, the Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy salvation cometh; behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him.

12 And they shall call them, The holy people, The redeemed of the Lord: and thou shalt be called, Sought out, A city not forsaken.

Ver. 11. The Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world.] He hath caused the great trumpet to sound, as a signal, to gather the dispersed Jews together (see the notes upon xxvii. 13); or he hath sent preachers of the gospel to all parts of the world, in order to the conversion of the Jews.

Thy salvation cometh.] Thy Saviour cometh (compare xl. 9, 10, Zech. ix. 9, Rev. xxii. 12).

Ver. 12. The holy people.] As being taken into covenant again (see the note upon ver. 4).

Sought out, A city not forsaken.] Or rather, Sought to, a city had in great request (compare ver. 4, and Jer. xxx. 17).

2 Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the winefat?

3 I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me: for I will may be taken in an appellative sense, so as to denote in general, a field of blood, or place of slaughter. The word Edom signifies originally red as blood, and Bozrah denotes a vintage, which, in the prophetic idiom, imports God's vengeance upon the wicked (see Lam. i. 13, Joel iii. 13, Rev. xiv. 19, xix. 15). The prophets often apply the names of places to the subject-matter they are treating of: so, Joel iii. 15, the nations are summoned to the "valley of Jehoshaphat," because the word Jehoshaphat signifies God's judgment. Again, Hos. i. 5, 11, "the valley of Jehoshaphat," and "the day of Jehoshafat," are an allusion to the etymology of the word Jehoséfut, which signifies the arm of God, or the seed of God (see likewise Mic. i. 10, 14, and lv. 11, 12, of this prophecy).

Travelling in the greatness of his strength?] Like a general marching in triumph at the head of his army, and carrying tokens of victory upon his raiment. Some explain the word tsókh in an active sense, as implying the driving his enemies before him, and bearing down all opposition.

I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save.] Christ's answer to the foregoing question: I am come now to fulfill all my promises, and deliver you from your enemies. Several parts of the prophetic books are written in the form of a dramatic poem, where several persons are introduced, speaking by turns, and answering one another: so, for example, ch. lxi. Christ is introduced at the beginning of the chapter, making gracious promises to the church, to which the church answers with suitable returns of joy and thankfulness (ver. 10). So the Song of Solomon is a divine dialogue between the bride and groom, and in the Revelation, Christ is often introduced as speaking in that sacred drama. This observation will sometimes account for the altering of the prophet's style from the first to the second or third person.

Ver. 2. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel.] The dialogue is still continued, and this question is tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment.

4 For the day of vengeance is mine in heart, and the year of my redeemed is come.

5 And I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me; and my fury, it upheld me.

6 And I will tread down the people in mine anger, and make them drunk in my fury, and I will bring down their strength to the earth.

7 If I will mention the lovingkindnesses of the proposed by the church, or the prophet in her name. Christ, in like manner, is described as "clothed in a garment dipped in blood" (Rev. xiii. 13).

Ver. 3. I have trodden the winepress alone.] This answer of Christ exactly agrees with what is said of him in the same chapter of the Revelation, ver. 15, that "he treads the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God" (see the note upon ver. 1).

[Of the people.] See the note upon ver. 5.

Ver. 4.] See the notes upon xxxiv. 8, lxi. 2.

Ver. 5. I looked, and there was none to help.] Things were come to that extremity, that there was no appearance of succour by any human means.

Those who, by their office and character, ought to have stood up in defence of oppressed truth and innocence, even they, contrary to what might have been justly expected, betrayed so good a cause, or had not the courage to defend it. So that it was time for God to interpose, and to appear in defence of his own honour and people (compare lx. 16).

My fury, it upheld me.] I was resolved to vindicate my own honour, and my zeal and concern for my people made me go through with the undertaking, in spite of all opposition. Compare Zech. vii. 2, where God saith, "I was jealous for Zion with great fury."

Ver. 6. I will tread down the people in mine anger.] Both the Septuagint and vulgar Latin translate this, and the following sentences of this verse, in the pro-ter perfect tense, "I have trodden down," &c. which agrees better with the context, where Christ is described as having his garments already stained with blood.

Make them drunk in my fury.] God's judgments are often represented by a cup of intoxicating liquor, because they astonish men, and bereave them of their usual discretion (see note on li. 17).

Ver. 7.] Here the prophet, or the church, speaks, and breaks out into a gratefull acknowledgment of God's former mercies to his people, which are so many earnest of his goodness for the time to come.

Ver. 8. Surely they are my people.] They are the people with whose ancestors I made an everlasting covenant, and they have a title to my favour, as well as their forefathers (see Rom. xi. 28, 29). And now their afflictions have so far corrected them, that they will not prevaricate or apostatize any more. So he became their Saviour, as he had been in former times.

[Children that will not live.] God is introduced as speaking after the manner of men, and expecting what effect his gracious dealings might in all reason have produced. Compare Zeph. iii. 7, and see the note there.

Ver. 9. In all their affliction he was afflicted.] When there was a necessity of punishing them in order to the public glory, he was not exempt from the passionate sense of the evils which they suffered (see Deut. xxxii. 36, Judg. x. 16, Ps. cvi. 41, 45). The Hebrew copies have a different reading here; the text reads lo, with an alaph, which signifies not, and the margin reads lo, with a nun, which signifies him: our translation follows the marginal reading, the Septuagint that of the text; and joining the latter part of the eighth verse with the ninth, they translate the whole period very agreeably to the present Hebrew text, thus, "He was their Saviour out of all their trouble; it was not a messenger, nor an angel, but himself delivered them:" which translation agrees very well with the sense of the original, as will appear by the following note.

The angel of his presence saved them.] The angel, who conducted them by the pillar of cloud and of fire, was no other than the Logos, or second person of the blessed Trinity, according to the sense of the ancient Jews, as Dr. Allis hath proved at large, in his Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians, ch. 12—15. This divine person is sometimes indeed called an angel, as Exod. xiv. 19; but, at other times, the uncommunicable name of Jehovah is given to him. So Exod. xiii. 21, it is said expressly, that the "Lord went before the people in a pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night" (compare Exod. xiv. 21). In the same book God saith of him, that "his name is in him," i.e. his godhead (xxiii. 21).

Again, he is called God's presence, Exod. xxxiii. 14, an expression parallel to that of the text. So Deut. iv. 37, we read, "God chose their seed after them, and brought them out by his presence;" for so the Hebrew hepanan plainly signifies: but our translators have made no sense at all of the place, by rendering it, "and took them out in his sight." God, to show his anger for the sin of the golden calf, threatens the people, that he would not lead them himself, but only send his angel with them (Exod. xxxiii. 2, 3). At this the people were much disheartened (ver. 4); and Moses earnestly intercedes with God, that the divine presence might still accompany them (ver. 15); so that God would continue to go before them in the pillar of cloud and of fire. According to this interpretation, St. Paul saith, that the "Jews tempted Christ in the wilderness" (1 Cor. x. 9), meaning the Logos, who, after his assuming human nature, was Christ. When the tabernacle was set up, this Shechinah, or token of God's presence, took up his residence over the ark (Numb. vii. 89), and the cloud covered the top of the tabernacle (Exod. xl. 34, 35). And then the Lord is said "to come down in the pillar of cloud" (Numb. xii. 5), and solemn adoration is paid to him, when this symbol of the divine presence appeared (Exod. xxxiii. 10, Numb. xvi. 19, 22). All these circumstances laid together, prove that the person who led the people through the wilderness could be no created being, though he is sometimes called an angel, because he was their guide, and the office and ministry of angels, as he afterward took upon him the "form of a servant." But in the text he is styled, in
ISAIAH.

"10 ¶ But they rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit: therefore he was turned to be their enemy, and he fought against them. 11 Then he remembered the days of old, Moses, and his people, saying, Where is he that brought them up out of the sea with the shepherd of his flock? where is he that put his holy Spirit within him? 12 That led them by the right hand of Moses with his glorious arm, dividing the water before them, to make himself an everlasting name? 13 That led them through the deep, as an horse in the wilderness, that they should not stumble. 14 As a beast goeth down into the valley, the Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest: so didst a distinguished manner, the "Angel of God's presence," and in Malachi, the "angel of the covenant" (Mal. iii. 1); for the words should be translated. He bare them.] See the note on xvi. 3.  Ver. 10.] God's Spirit strove with the men that lived before the flood (Gen. vi. 3, 1 Pet. iii. 19); the same good Spirit directed Moses and the elders that had the government of the Jews in the wilderness (see the following verse, Numb. xi. 17, and Neh. ix. 20). Therefore, the people's frequent murmuring and rebellions were not so much against them, "as against the Lord," as Moses truly upbraids them, Exod. xvi. 8.  Ver. 11. Then he remembered the days of old.] God is represented by an elegant figure, as recollecting with himself what he had done for his people, and using that as a motive why he should still own and defend them. The same argument is urged by Moses, Exod. xxxii. 11, 12, Numb. xiv. 13, 14, &c. or the word he may be understood of Israel, as remembering God's peculiar providence to their fathers, and then expostulating with him under their long captivity, in the following words (ver. 15, &c.).

With the shepherd of his flock?] Or, "With the shepherds of his flock," as the margin reads, i. e. Moses and Aaron (see Ps. lxxvi. 5, 20). Where is he that put his holy Spirit within him?] That gave his spirit to Moses and the seventy elders, to direct them in the government of his people (see Numb. xi. 17, Neh. ix. 20); and afterward sent them prophets to lead and instruct them (compare Hag. ii. 5).  Ver. 13.] As a horse goes or carries a man upon plain ground without tripping. The wilderness sometimetimes signifies the plain, or champaign country, and is opposed to the mountains (see Jer. ix. 10, Lam. v. 10, Joel i. 10.  Ver. 14.] As a beast goes down to his pasture; or as a camel or such-like beast of burden travels through a champaign country; so the Spirit of the Lord conducted the people of Israel in the promised land of rest and security (see Deut. xii. 9). The verb jirad signifies simply to go, or go forward, as well as to go down (see Gen. xlix. 5, 1 Sam. xxix. 4, xxx. 15, 16, 2 Kings ii. 2).  Ver. 15.] Where is thy love and thy concern for thy people (see ver. 5), and the power thou usedst to exert for their deliverance? Where is the yearning of thy bowels, i. e. thy tender compassions and mercies which thou formerly showedst towards me, and which the holy writers compare to the affection a mother bears to her children (see xlix. 15, Jer. xxxi. 20, Hos. xi. 8).  Ver. 16. Doubtless thou art our father.] Our only thou lead thy people, to make thyself a glorious name. 15 ¶ Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory: where is thy zeal and thy strength, the sounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies toward me? are they true? 16 Doubtless thou art our father, though Abra- um is ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not: thou, O Lord, art our father, our redeemer; thy name is from everlasting. 17 ¶ O Lord, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways, and hardened our hearts from thy fear? Return for thy servants' sake, the tribes of thine inheritance. 18 The people of thy holiness have possessed hope is in the relation we have to thee, that thou hast vouchsafed to call thyself our father (see Deut. xxxii. 6, 1 Chron. xxix. 10, Mal. i. 6, ii. 10, John viii. 39, 41). For it is in vain to boast ourselves that we are children of Abraham or Jacob; they neither know our condition, nor, if they did, can they afford us any relief. Thy name is from everlasting.] See the note upon ver. 15.

CHAPTER XLIV.

19 We are thine: thou never barest rule over them; they were not called by thy name.

CHAPTER LIXIV.

1 On that thou wouldst rend the heavens, that thou wouldst come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence,

2 As when the melting fire burneth, the fire causeth the waters to boil, to make thy name known to thine adversaries, that the nations may tremble at thy presence!

3 When thou didst terrible things which we looked not for, thou camest down, the mountains flowed down at thy presence.

4 For since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him.

5 Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness, those that remember thee in thy ways; behold, thou art wroth; for we have sinned: in those is continuance, and we shall be saved.

6 But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; and we all do fade like a leaf; and our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away.

7 And there is none that calleth upon thy better with what follows, "When thou shalt do terrible and unexpected things; when thou shalt come down (and visibly interpose for the deliverance of thy people), the mountains shall melt at thy presence." And then follows very appositely in the next verse.

Ver. 4.] The methods of thy dispensations, whereby thou wilt fulfill thy promises made to thy people, are beyond any thing we can think or conceive.

Ver. 5. Thou meetest him that rejoiceth] Thou preventest with the blessings of thy goodness, those that take pleasure in the ways of thy commandments, and live under a continual sense of thy providence. Behold, thou art wroth; for we have sinned, &c.

We have been guilty of great offences, whereby we have provoked thee to anger, but thy mercies endure for ever, and thy gracious promises are still the same; and this encourages us still to trust in thy goodness (compare Mal. iii. 6). The pronoun [those] refers to God's ways, by which we may understand, not only his laws, but likewise the dispensations of his providence (compare iv. 9, Exod. xxxiii. 13, Ps. ciii. 7). But the latter part of the verse may thus be translated, "Behold, thou art wroth; because we have sinned continually against those (ways), and shall we be saved?"

Ver. 6. All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags.] The best actions of the best men have a great alloy of imperfection. When the Hebrew language would express the most excellent in its kind, it makes use of the plural number: thus wisdom signifies the most excellent, or divine wisdom, Prov. i. 20, ix. 1. So here righteousnesses is the most perfect righteousness men can attain to.

Our iniquities, like the wind, have taken us away. Like a wind that blasts and withers both leaves and fruit (compare Jer. iv. 11, Hos. xiii. 15).

Ver. 7. There is none that calleth upon thy name.] There is nobody layeth our calamities to heart so name, that stirreth up himself to take hold of thee: for thou hast hid thy face from us, and hast consumed us, because of our iniquities.

8 But now, O Lord, thou art our father; we are the clay, and thou our potter; and we all are the work of thy hand.

9 ¶ Be not wroth very sore, O Lord, neither remember iniquity for ever: behold, see, we be-seech thee, we are all thy people.

as to raise his mind into a devout posture, and to make God his refuge in his adversity (compare xxvii. 5). Or, there is none that try to avert God’s judgments by their intercessions, which is compared here to the laying hold of a man’s hand when he is just going to strike.

For thou hast hid thy face from us.] The particle ki should be translated "therefore," as it is in Ps. cxvi. 10, where the English translation rightly renders the sense, "I believed, and therefore have I spoken." And thus the Greek particle εύθυς may most fitly be translated. Luke vii. 57, "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; therefore she loved much:" which sense agrees best with the design of the foregoing parable.

Ver. 10. Thy holy cities are a wilderness.] By "holy cities," in the plural number, may be meant Zion (which was properly called the "city of David," see 2 Sam. v. 9), and Jerusalem, as they are sometimes divided into the upper and lower city.

And grammarians observe, that the word Jerusalem is in the dual number in the Hebrew, because it was divided into the upper and lower city.

Ver. 11. Our holy and our beautiful house,—is burnt.] This relates to the burning of the temple by the Romans, who made an entire destruction of it according to our Saviour’s prediction (Matt. xxiv. 2).

All our pleasant things are laid waste," Judea is called the "pleasant land," Dan. vii. 9, and the "glory of all the lands," Ezek. xx. 6, but the Romans utterly laid it waste, partly in Vespasian’s time, and partly in Adrian’s; but the words chiefly relate to the temple, whose glory and beauty was laid waste, and which the Jews valued themselves upon above all things (see Ezek. xxiv. 21, 25).

Ver. 12.] Wilt thou neither show thy compassion towards thy servants, nor thy resevntiments to thine enemies (compare xiii. 14, lv. 6)

CHAPTER LV.

I AM sought of them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not: I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that was not called by my name.

2 I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people, which walk in a way that was not good, after their own thoughts:

and 3 A people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face; that sacrificeth in gardens, and burneth incense upon altars of brick;

those that were not in covenant with me, i. e. to the gentiles (see lxiii. 19).

Ver. 2. I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people.] But I did not make myself known to the gentiles till you Jews had rejected me, after I had used all the arts of persuasion and entreaty to you, in order to your conversion. "To spread out the hand," is a gesture of begging or importunity (see i. 15, Jer. iv. 11, Lam. i. 17). St. Paul expounds these two verses of the calling of the gentiles after that the Jews had rejected the gracious counsel of God against themselves (Rom. x. 20, 21).

Ver. 3. A people that provoketh me to anger continually to my face.] The reigning sins of the Jews are set out at large in this and the two following verses: and those are of two sorts, 1. Their ancient idolatry, the "iniquities of their fathers" (ver. 7), which the prophet describes as it was practised in his days. 2. Their spiritual pride and hypocrisy (ver. 5), which exactly answers the temper of the Jewish nation in the time of our Saviour.

That sacrificeth in gardens.] In groves and shady places (see the note on i. 29). Dr. Spencer understands the words of those sacrifices which were offered in gardens and orchards, in order to procure plenty of fruit (see the notes upon the last sentence of the following verse).

Burneth incense upon altars of brick.] God commanded that his altar should be built of whole stones, neither hewn, nor polished (Exod. xx. 25, Deut. xxvii.)
4 Which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments, which eat swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels;

5 Which say, Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier than thou. These are a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day.

6 Behold, it is written before me: I will not keep silence, but will recompence, even recompense unto their bosom,

7 Your iniquities, and the iniquities of your fathers together, saith the Lord, which have burned incense upon the mountains, and blas-

5); in opposition, as it is probable, to the heathen altars, which were more artificially contrived.

Ver. 4. Which remain among [the graves, and lodge in the monuments,] As those did who practised necromancy, and consulted with infernal spirits (see Deut. xvii. 11). It was a common custom too among the heathens, for persons to lodge all night in the temples of their idols, particularly in that of Aesculapius, which were no better than monuments of the dead, in order to obtain such dreams as might be beneficial to them. [See the answer to Fontanelle's Hist. of Oracles, p. 140.] By the word metzarah, our translation renders "monuments."

Dr. Spencer ([lib. ii. De Legib. Hebr. dissert. viii. cap. 9]) understands solitary places, in which sense some take the word, xlix. 6. Such places being haunted by evil spirits, according to the opinion of the vulgar (see the note on xiii. 21).

Which eat swine's flesh.] This was expressly forbidden in the law (Lev. xi. 7), and the eating of it was a sort of religious ceremony, whereby apostates made a solemn renunciation of the Jewish religion (see 2 Macc. vi. 18, vii. 1). One reason why the religious Jews so much abhorred the eating of swine's flesh probably was, because the eating of it was a solemn rite of lustration among the Egyptian priests, who, at the full moon, offered part of it in sacrifice, and eat part of it themselves, though at other times they abhorred to touch it (see Herodot. lib. ii. cap. 47). Plato likewise acquaints us, that the sacrificers here had a usual rite of initiation at the heathen mysteries (De. Repub. lib. ii). This passage is quoted by Euseb. Prep. Evang. lib. xiii. Where Vigerius in his notes shows that the sacrificing swine's flesh was used in the mysteries of Bacchus and Ceres: and Varro (lib. ii. De Re Rust.), derives it from Sion, because it was one of the principal of the heathen sacrifices.

And brood of abominable things is in their vessels?] This denotes the superstitious practice of "seething a kid in its mother's milk," with which they sprinkled the trees in their fields and gardens (see ver. 3), to make them more fruitful; upon which account it is more than once forbidden in the law (see Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26, Deut. xiv. 21). The Romans learned this superstition from the Egyptians probably, and worshiped Pales, or Ceres, with milk. See Ovid Pastor, lib. iv.

"Sylvicolam tepido lacte precare Pales."

Mr. White makes an objection against applying these passages to the modern Jews, because since Christ's time they have not been guilty of any of these kinds of idolatry, and consequently these sins cannot be assigned as a cause of their rejection. To which it may be answered, 1. That the prophet here objects to them the sins of their forefathers as well as their own; see ver. 7, and Deut. xxxii. 21, where their rejection phomed me upon the hills: therefore will I measure their former work into their bosom.

8 ¶ Thus saith the Lord, As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it: so will I do for my servants' sakes, that I may not destroy them all.

9 And I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob, and out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains: and mine elect shall inherit it, and my servants shall dwell there.

10 And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, and the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in, for my people that have sought me.

is ascribed to their idolatries; according to the tenor of God's covenant, whereby he hath threatened to "visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children."

2. The prophet indeed, mentions only such idolatries as were practised in and about his own time; but yet may comprehend under those heads all other kinds of idolatry: just as the idolatries practised by some Christians, are called the doctrines of Balaam and Jezebel, Rev. ii. 14, 20, and the church where they were practised, is described by the name of Sodom and Egypt, xi. 8. And the Jews at this day acknowledge the compliances of several of their nation with the idolatries practised in those popish countries, where the inquisition is set up as one of their national sins (see Lombard's A Mala Colvis, cum Judaeis).

Ver. 5. Stand by thyself.] Or, "I esteem thee as unclean:" so some render the verb kedoshitha; which hath two contrary significations, both to make holy, and to pollute, a thing usual in that language (see the note upon xxii. 17, 18). This description of a proud hypocrite, exactly agrees with the temper of the scribes and pharisees in Christ's time (see Matt. ix. 11, Mark vii. 4, John xviii. 28).

These are a smoke in my nose.] These are as offensive to me as smoke is to the nose, they are a perpetual provocation to me, and kindle my anger continually against them.

Ver. 6. It is written before me.] God's irrevocable purposes are often expressed as so many decrees entered into a register (see the note upon xxxiv. 19). I will not restrain my anger any longer (see xliii. 14), but recompense their sins double upon them (see Jer. xvi. 18, and the notes upon xl. 2).

Ver. 7.] See vii. 7, Ezek. xviii. 6, xx. 27, 28. Will I measure their former work into their bosom.] The iniquities of their forefathers, aggravated by the addition of their own (compare Matt. xxiii. 32, 35, 36, and see the note upon ver. 4).

Ver. 8.] As a few good grapes are found among a cluster of bad ones, and one speaks to another that would pluck it from the tree to spare it, because some of the grapes may come to good: so I will not destroy the whole nation, for the sake of the few good persons which spring out from among the rest. These are called the remnant by St. Paul, Rom. ix. 27, xi. 5, &c. where he includes to i. 9, vi. 18, vii. 9, 3, x. 21, of this prophecy.

Ver. 9. I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob.] Out of this stock shall arise a better generation, who shall repose the inheritances of their ancestors. Judea being a hilly country, is elsewhere expressed by the mountains of Israel (see xiv. 25, Ezek. xxxvi. 1). Nine elect shall inherit it.] These are called the election by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 7.

Ver. 10.] The blessings of the gospel are sometimes represented under the emblems of temporal happiness (see the note upon iv. 2). But if we take the words in their literal sense, they denote the great plenty and security these elect shall enjoy (compare xxx. 29). Sharon was one of the richest parts of Judea (see xxxiii. 9, xxx. 2); and so was the valley of Achor, which was remarkable for being the first tract of ground the Israelites took possession of, after their entrance into the promised land: and therefore is called a "door of hope" by Hosea (ii. 15), because it gave them first footing in that country, and encouraged them to hope that they should become masters of the whole.

That prepare a table for that troop.] It was customary both among the Jews and gentiles, after some part of the sacrifice had been offered upon the altar, to make a feast of the remainder (see lvii. 7, Ezek. xxiii. 41). This is called the "table of devils," to the gentiles sacrificed, I Cor. x. 21. It is a great dispute among the critics what idol God was, which several interpreters here translate troop, as if it were some heavenly constellation. But the word likewise signifies fortune, or good luck, and so it is translated by the Septuagint, Gen. xxx. 11, and in this place as appears from St. Jerome's commentary upon this verse, that the Greek copies in his times read "ευευγενεῖς το θύρᾳ πραίτας και επανευγενεῖς," τῷ δειμωνίῳ κλήτων. That furnish a drink offering to that number.] Or to Meni, which is the word in the Hebrew: by which some understand the sun (see Huetius in Comment. on Origen, p. 109, 110, and Menagius upon Laertius, lib. viii. n. 54). Bocchart, and Dr. Spencer (De Legis. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 2), take it to signify a hero, worshipped by the Egyptians: Dr. Pocock (Not. ad Specim. Histor. Arab. p. 92), understands it by an idol of the Arabsians, and others an idol of the Armenians: Minni being a province in Armenia (see Jer. ii. 27).

This) But ye are they that forget my holy mountains.] The prophet now directs his discourse to the sinners and idolaters, whom he had reproved and threatened, ver. 2, 3, &c. By "my holy mountain" is meant God's temple and worship, a figure of the Christian church (see the note on li. 2).

CHAPTER LXV.

For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind.

18 But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy.

19 And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying.

20 There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old: but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed.

21 And they shall build houses, and inhabit place (compare 2 Cor. i. 20): and the words import, that all spiritual blessings shall be derived from him.] Because the former troubles are forgotten.] Or, "When the former troubles," &c. The "new heavens," and "new earth," mentioned in the following verse, are not subject to any of those errors and miseries, to which the present state of the world is obnoxious (see ver. 19, and Rev. xxi. 3, 4, &c.)

Ver. 17. I create new heavens and a new earth.] The conversion of the Jews will be in the last times of this world (see Hos. iii. 5): and then will follow the "new heavens and earth," which are to commence after the dissolution of this world (see 2 Pet. iii. 13, Rev. xxi. 1). Such a new state of things, St. Peter tells us, we are to expect "according to God's promise," which must relate to some prophecies of the Old Testament, and particularly to this and the following chapter, both the apostles using the very same expressions which are found here.

The former shall not be remembered.] The glory of the "new heavens and earth," shall so far surpass the happiest days that ever were seen in former times, that they shall not deserve to be mentioned, there being no comparison between them (compare Jer. iii. 16).

Ver. 18. I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy.] This may be best expounded of the New Jerusalem, which shall "come down from God," when the new heavens and new earth are created; see Rev. xxi. 1, 2. In all the Vulgate versions, they shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor pain," (ibid. ver. 4, and the following verse also.) Though some learned men suppose, that, upon the restoration of the Jews there may be some particular privileges belonging to the earthly Jerusalem, as the metropolis of that nation (see the note upon lxvi. 20), but we must not be too positive as to any particular description of these distant events.

Rejoice for ever in that which I create.] The learned bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, in his Defense of Christianity, chap. ii. sec. 2, translates the words, "Rejoice for the age to come, which I create." The age to come was a known expression among the Jews for the times of the Messias. See the note upon ix. 6, in which the same learned man makes use of the phrase Ab ed, to the same sense, translated in our English, everlasting Father.

Ver. 20. There shall be no more thence an infant of days.] "From thence," or "from that time" (see note on xviii. 16), there shall be no untimely deaths, either of infants who are abortive, or never grow up to man's estate; or of old men who do not live out the full term of life. For the child shall die an hundred years old; but the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed.

The sense would be plainer, if the words were translated thus: "For he that dies a hundred years old, shall die a child." And the "sinner that dies a hundred years old, shall be accursed." The prophet describes this renovation of the world as a paradisal state, and such as the patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, when men commonly lived near a thousand years. So he that died at a hundred years of age would have been looked upon as dying in the age of childhood, and be judged to have been cut off in the beginning of his years, as a punishment for some great sins he had committed. Hesiod describes what he calls the siluer age of the world, in much the same expressions, Ec, xxi. 44, lib. i. ver. 129.

"A boy of a hundred years old played about with his mother, an overgrown child." The words of the text seem to imply, that the millennial state shall not be free from all manner of sin, though there shall be no place there for idolatry and apostasy. Accordingly some learned men suppose, that the lukewarm Laodicean state of the church, which is described, and reproved, Rev. iii. 14, &c. is to be contemporary with some part of the millennium.

Ver. 21.] A blessing promised to the Jews upon their conversion, in contradiction to that curse which Moses denounced against them for their disobedience (Deut. xxviii. 39); and it implies both security from the invasion of enemies, and from untimely death (compare lxvi. 5).

Ver. 22. As the days of a tree are the days of my people.] Not like the fading of a leaf, to which our present mortal state is often compared. The Septuagint translate it, "As the days of the tree of life, shall be the days of my people," expressing the sense and import of the words.

Ver. 23. Nor bringing forth for trouble.] As those do who enjoy not the fruits of their labour (see ver. 21, 22).

Ver. 24.] God will prevent them with his blessings, and gratify their desires before they ask: a sure token of his favour and love towards them, as his rejecting men, and casting them off, is expressed by his "hiding away his face from them," and refusing to hear their prayers (see Prov. i. 28, Isai. i. 15, Jer. xiv. 12, Lam. iii. 8, 41).

Ver. 25. The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, &c.] Concerning the metaphorical sense of these expressions, see the notes upon xl. 6, xxxv. 9. But since the renovation here spoken of extends to the whole creation (see Rom. viii. 21), they may imply the correcting thenoxious qualities of fierce or venomous creatures.
and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock; and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not [Dust shall be the serpent's meat.] The curse pronounced upon the serpent, Gen. iii. 14, shall then be fully accomplished: Christ having put all ene-

CHAPTER LXVI.

ARGUMENT.—In the beginning of the chapter God answers the complaints of the Jews concerning the destruction of the temple, which they so passionately bewail, lxiii. 18, lxiv. 11, and instructs them in the evangelical way of worshipping God in spirit and in truth, and not by sacrifices, or incense, and causes of his rejecting the Jews, and calling the gentiles, but promises in due time to unite them into one glorious and flourishing church.

Ver. 1.] A temple in the Jewish notion was God's place of residence, or his habitation, where he resided as a king in a palace; accordingly the cherubim were his throne, the ark was his footstool, the priests were his immediate attendants, and the shew-bread and sacrifices were the provision for his table. Such a notion of a temple was common both to Jews and gentiles, [only with this difference, that the gentiles thought the setting up an image a necessary part of the dedication of a temple, to secure, as they imagined, the presence of the deity to whom it was dedicated. Temples nulla ratio, quod non coronat simulacrum, saith Isidore.] Such a notion seems to confine God's presence to a certain place, and therefore was not so suitable to the greatness of the divine majesty. It is under this acceptance of the word, that God reproves the Jews for laying such stress upon their temple worship, and commands them under the loss of it, which they speak of with so much concern, lxiv. 11. And it is under the same notion that the Christian apologists join temples with images, and profess that their religion allows of neither.

Ver. 2. All those things hath my hand made, and all those things have been.] I fill heaven and earth, which are the works of my hands, and are still sustained and supported by me. "All those things are mine," so the Septuagint translate the latter part of the sentence. But to this man will I look, &c.] Such a one is a living temple of God (see xxvi. 15).

Ver. 3. He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man;] Without this devout temper of mind, killing an ox for a burnt-offering is no more acceptable to God, than if a man offered his son in sacrifice to Moloch, ways, and their soul delighteth in their abominations.

CHAPTER LXVI.

1 Thus saith the Lord, The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool: where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest?

2 For all these things hath mine hand made, and all these things have been, saith the Lord; but to this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word.

3 He that killeth an ox is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol. Yea, they have chosen their own

Ver. 4. I also will choose their delusions, and will bring their fears upon them; because when I called, none did answer; when I spake, they did not hear: but they did evil before mine eyes, and chose that in which I delighted not.

5 Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at his word; Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my name's sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified: but he shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed.

6 A voice of noise from the city, a voice from He that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck;] The price of a dog was forbid to be brought into the house of the Lord, by way of vow, or free-will offering (see Deut. xxiii. 18).

He that offereth an oblation, as he that offereth swine's blood.] Which being one of the principal sacrifices among the gentiles, was in a particular manner abominable to God (see the notes upon lxv. 4).

He that burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol.] Or, "maketh a memorial with incense," as the margin reads. The verb zachar, to commemorate, signifies any act of divine worship (see the note upon lvii. 9). Their soul delighteth in their abominations.] Compare lxiv. 12. This may relate to their idolatrous practices, mentioned lxxv. 3, 4, 11, and ver. 17 of this chapter. Or their very ceremonious worship may be reproved in those terms, because, since the revelation of the gospel, God had rejected it, and declared it to be a plain contradiction to his will, and an affront to his authority.

Ver. 4. I also will choose their delusions;] I will punish them in their own way, and set over them scorners and reprochers, who shall govern them by their traditions instead of the word of God; or I will suffer "false Christs and false prophets" to deceive them, (see Matt. xxiv. 24, John x. 43).

Will bring their fears upon them;] This was exactly fulfilled, when they crucified Christ for fear of the Romans (John xi. 45), which very sin was punished by an utter destruction from that very people. Because when I called, &c.] See lxv. 12.

Ver. 5. Hearken to this, you Jews, that embraced the gospel upon the preaching of Christ and the apostles: your brethren have hated you for my sake, and cast you out of their synagogues (compare Luke vi. 22), and in derision called upon God to do some extraordinary thing in your behalf; but God's providence at the destruction of Jerusalem shall interpose visibly for your deliverance, and leave them to perish in their city. This was remarkably verified when the Christians had a divine warning to leave the city, and thereupon retired to Pella, and escaped the common destruction (see Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 5, Epiph. Haer. xxx.).

Ver. 6.] The prophet seems to hear the noise of the ruin of the city and temple, sounding in his ears; "The voice from the city" may fitly be expounded the temple, a voice of the Lord that rendeth recompense to his enemies.
7 Before she travailed, she brought forth; before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child.
8 Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things! Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.
9 Shall I bring to the birth, and not cause to bring forth? saith the Lord: shall I cause to bring forth, and shut the womb? saith thy God.
10 Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her: rejoice for joy with her, all ye that mourn for her:
11 That ye may suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations; that ye may milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory.
12 For thus saith the Lord, Behold I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream: then shall ye suck, ye shall be borne upon her sides, and be dallied upon her knees.
13 As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you; and ye shall be comforted in Jeruusalem.
14 And when ye see this, your heart shall rejoice, and your bones shall flourish like an herb; and the hand of the Lord shall be known toward his servants, and his indignation toward his enemies.
15 For, behold, the Lord will come with fire, Ver. 9.] Shall I disappoint a work, of which I myself was the author, when every thing is ripe for execution, and the effect just ready to be produced (compare xxxvii. 3)? The prophet still carries on the comparison between the natural and spiritual birth (compare Gal. iv. 19).
Ver. 10. Rejoice ye with Jerusalem—all ye that love her:] Let all that wish her well congratulate her for the favours God hath shown to her, and particularly let the gentiles rejoice with the Jewish church (see Deut. xxxii. 43), for her advancement shall redound to their benefit (see ver. 12).
Rejoice—all ye that mourn for her:] See the note on lvii. 18.
Ver. 11. That ye may suck, and be satisfied:] Or, Because ye shall suck; &c. She will nourish the faithful with her doctrine, as a tender mother nurses her children with her breasts. The prophet persists in comparing the church to a child-bearing woman.
Be delighted with the abundance of her glory:] You shall share in the glory God hath conferred upon the Jewish church, and shall be edified by the gifts and graces that God will plentifully bestow upon her (see below, ver. 19, and Rom. xi. 12).
Ver. 12. I will extend peace to her:] All manner of prosperity (compare xlviii. 18, lx. 5).
The glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream:] The riches of the gentiles shall flow in upon you, by their liberality and charity (see lviii. 6), or, I will impart to her all that grace and knowledge, for which the church of the gentiles value themselves; St. Paul says (Rom. xi. 11), that the "Jews will be provoked to emulation" by the gentile believers, by their coming into the church in great numbers, and the Jews seeing them favoured with all the privileges of God's people and themselves utterly rejected; and that this will be a principal means of working their conversion.
And when they are converted, they will be extraordinary instruments in God's hands, for the converting of the remainder of the heathen world (see ver. 19, compared with lx. 4, 5, and Rom. xi. 12, 15, 25, 31).
Ye shall be borne upon her sides, &c.] Compare lx. 4, and see the note on ver. 11 of this chapter.
Ver. 14. When ye see this,—your bones shall flourish;
You Jews shall recover your ancient strength and beauty, and be renewed in as wonderful a manner, as if dry withered bones should increase in size, to the remainder of the heathen world (see compare Ezech. xlvi. 12, xlix. 10), then will be fulfilled that "resurrection of the dry bones," spoken of by Ezekiel, xxxvii. 1, &c. for that vision relates to the restoration of the Jewish nation, after it had lain for and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. 16 For by fire and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh: and the slain of the Lord shall be many. 17 They that sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens behind one tree in the midst, eating swine’s flesh and the abomination, many ages in a dead, hopeless condition. In like manner, St. Paul calls the receiving the Jews into the church, “Life from the dead,” Rom. xi. 15.

The hand of the Lord shall be known toward his servants;” Then shall the kingdom or power of the Messias be manifested in a distinguishing protection of his people, and destruction of his and their enemies.

Ver. 15. The Lord will come with fire.] God is called a “consuming fire,” Deut. iv. 24, and his vengeance often resembled to fire, which consumes every thing in an instant (see ix. 5, xxx. 30, see the following verse).

With his chariot like a whirlwind.] An allusion to the old time of fighting with chariots (compare v. 28, xxxi. 7). God is elsewhere described as “making the clouds his chariot” (Ps. civ. 3, Hab. iii. 8), and as compassed about with tempests and darkness (Ps. xviii. 10).

Ver. 16.] This seems to denote the discoursificate of Gog and Magog, who are to be destroyed by fire. See Ezek. xxxix. 6, 9. They are described in the thirty-eight and thirty-ninth chapters of that prophecy as coming in a great body against the land of Israel after the restoration of the Jews, and their return into their own land, and their receiving an utter overthrow. Or, this may be understood of the battle of Armageddon (Rev. xvi. 14, xix. 19), where the armies of Satan and antichrist are to be vanquished by the lamb and his followers: or of the discoursificate of Satan’s army, mentioned Rev. xv. 1, which shall be destroyed by fire from heaven. The scriptures do in general declare there shall be a great destruction of Christ’s enemies here upon earth before the general judgment or consummation of all things: compare with the context here, ch. xxxiv. lxiii. 1, 6, Ps. cx. 5, 6, Jer. 1. 1. a great part of which chapters certainly relate to the latter times, Ezek. xxxvii. xxxix., Joel iii. 11, 14, Mic. v. 8, &c. Zech. xii. 2, &c. xiv. 1, 13, Rev. xiv. 20, xvi. 14, xix. 19. But we must not be too positive in assigning the particular place, time, or manner, how these prophecies shall be fulfilled, because the events are secrets, whose causes lie hid as yet in the depths of providence. And the very great obscurity of the prophecies, which are supposed to relate to these matters, is to me a convincing argument that they are not yet fulfilled.

Ver. 17. They that purify themselves in gardens] Concerning “sanctifying in gardens,” see the note upon lxv. 3. But there were several sorts of lustrations or purifications used among the heathens, from whence the Jews learned their idolatrous customs; some of which were performed by washings, for which purpose they had fountains in their sacred groves and gardens.

Behind one tree in the midst.] Several critics agree, that by the Hebrew word achad is meant the one, which,Macrobius saith (Saturnal. lib. i. cap. 23,) was called by the Assyrians adad, a word which he tells us there signifies one, and therefore is probably derived from the Hebrew, achad. If we follow this and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the Lord.

18 For I know their works and their thoughts; it shall come, that I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come, and see my glory. 19 And I will set a sign among them, and I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to Tarsish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, to Tubal, and Javan, to the islands afar off, interpretation, the words may be best translated thus; “Behind [the chapel] (or shrine) of the sun, in the midst” [of the garden].

Eating swine’s flesh.] See the note upon lxv. 4. The abomination.] The same which is called “broth of abominable things,” lxv. 4 (see the note thereupon).

The mouse.] The heathens used some sort of meats by way of purification, or lustration, and chiefly such as were not used in common food; such were several of those meats forbidden by the law, and called abominable by Moses (Deut. xiv. 3); of this kind probably was the mouse, which was expressly forbidden to be eaten, Lev. xi. 29, Jamblichus Syrus, in Photius, cod. 94, reckons mice among the several sorts of animals, by which the heathens practised magick or divination, and saith, that some derived the word μοῦσα from πύς.

Concerning the reasons for applying these ancient idolatries to later times, see the notes upon lxv. 4. Maimonides observes (More Nevochim, lib. iii. cap. 29, p. 424), from the books of the Zabians, who were ancient idolaters, that they used “to offer to the sun,” the idol mentioned in this very verse, seven bulls and seven rams, by which he thinks was the reason why these creatures were reckoned abominable in the law of Moses, and forbidden to be eaten.

Ver. 18. I know their works.] The word know is not in the Hebrew; some supply the ellipse thus, should I bear their works? &c. Such a kind of deficiency is supplied in that manner by our translators, Numb. xiv. 27.

I will set a sign among them.] A signal to gather the believing Jews together from their several dispersions (see xii. 22, xiii. 10). A sign (in the Hebrew) is the same with an ensign, or standard, and so it is used, Ps. lxiv. 4.

I will send those that escape of them unto the nations.] The “escaped of Israel” are mentioned before (iv. 2), and mean those that “are escaped of the nations” (xiv. 20): i. e. who are returned home out of their several dispersions. Some of these, God saith, he will send to be preachers and apostles to the unconverted gentiles, as St. Paul, when he was converted, was ordained to be an apostle of the gentiles: whose conversion, according to Mr. Mace, carries it in an earnest, and an emblem of the general conversion of that nation (see his Works, p. 891). Without question their conversion will be a signal instance of the power of God’s grace, and a convincing argument to others of the truth of the gospel, as hath been observed upon ver. 12.

To Tarsish, Pul, and Lud, &c.] They shall go out and make conversions in all the parts of the world: Tarsish denotes the eastern parts (see note upon xi. 16); Pul and Lud the south; Tubal and Javan the north; and the islands the west.

Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow.] Some suppose that have not heard my name, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles.

20 And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the Lord, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the Lord.

Pul to be the same people who are elsewhere called by the name of Phil, which is usually joined with Jud: and is rendered Libya, or the Libyans, by most interpreters (see Jer. xxvi. 9, Ezek. xxvii. 10, xxx. 5). But Bochart thinks Pul to be the same with Phil, or Philis, a city upon the river Nile; and then these two names will mean the Egyptians and Ethiopians.

To Tubal and Javan.] Tubal is elsewhere joined with Meshech (see Gen. x. 2, Ezek. xxviii. 2), and they are generally thought to denote the Tartars, Scythians, and those who live in the most northern parts of the world. By Javan are meant the Ionians, Grecians, and the neighbouring nations, who live on the north side of the Mediterranean sea.

To the isles afar off.] This expression denotes the western parts of the world; for the "islands of the sea," a phrase elsewhere used, mean the same with the islands of the Western sea (see the notes upon xi. 11, xxiv. 14). And the prophet Hosea, speaking of the return of the Jews from their dispersions in several parts of the world, saith, "When the Lord shall roar like a lion (which denotes some efficacious call of providence, or powerful preaching of the gospel), then the children shall tremble (or come flying, as the following verse explains it) from the west" (Hos. xi. 10). So that by the "isles afar off, which have not heard God's name," may be meant even the West Indies themselves.

Ver. 20. They shall bring all your brethren for an offering. The words may be understood, either of the Jews, "that have escaped," converting the gentiles, and bringing them for an offering to God, the very phrase which St. Paul uses, speaking of this subject (Rom. xv. 10), or else, that they shall convert their own brethren that still remain scattered in the remote parts of the earth. Or, those words may be understood, in general, of the mystical Israel, which "shall be saved from all the ends of the earth" (see xlv. 17, 22, 25).

Upon horses, and in chariots—to my holy mountain Jerusalem. God's "holy mountain," commonly signifies the church in the prophetic writings (see the note upon ii. 3). So the expressions of going up to God's holy mountain, in the several conveniences of carriage here mentioned, are an allusion to the Jews going up with their gifts and offerings to Jerusalem at the solemn festivals (compare lx. 9). Or we may understand it, in a more literal sense, of the Jews returning to their own country, from their several dispersions, and hastening to Jerusalem, with joy and singing psalms, as the Servant putting forth his voice to sense. But this interpretation does not agree so well with the "new heavens and new earth" mentioned in the twenty-second verse, of which state these things were spoken.

Ver. 21.] All that have a share in this blessed state (called the "new heaven and new earth," in the following verse) shall be priests unto God, and attend upon his service without distinction (compare Rev. xx. 6). Or the words may import the restoring the Jews to their ancient privilege of being a kingdom of priests to God, and continually attendant on his service (see lx. 6).

Ver. 22.] This new state of things, already described xlv. 17, &c. is created to be inhabited by the mystical Israel, "who shall be saved from all the parts of the earth with an everlasting salvation" (xlv. 17, 18, 22, 25).

Ver. 23.] These states shall not have set times for God's worship, but shall be perpetually employed in serving and praising him (see Rev. iv. 8, v. 13). The worship of the new Jerusalem is represented by the practice of the Jewish temple, as if the prophet had said, that state shall be one continued festival. It is usual with the prophets to describe the gospel dispensations by the usages of their own times (see the note upon xix. 19, lvi. 7, and compare Zech. xiv. 16). These metaphors are continued even in the writings of the New Testament, where the church is represented by the twelve tribes of Israel (Luke xxii. 30, Rev. vii. 4). The Christians are called Jews, Rom. ii. 28, 29, Rev. ii. 9, and the heavenly sanctuary is described by the model of the Jewish tabernacle, Rev. iv. 5, 6, xi. 1, 2, 19, xv. 5, 6.

Mr. White, in his argument upon this chapter, and elsewhere, insists upon these ana such-like expressions, as irrefrangible arguments, that the sense of this prophet is to be confined to occurrences in or near his own time. But this way of arguing shows him not to have thoroughly understood the genius of the prophetic writings, which as they are always full of metaphors, and love to give but dark hints of things, wrapped up in symbols and figures, so the very life and spirit of them consist in pointing out the times and persons to whom they are referred. The Messiah, and the state of God's kingdom under his administration: according to that maxim delivered by the angel, Rev. xix. 10, that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy," without which it is but a kind of dead letter.

Ver. 24. They shall go forth. Without the circuit of the "new Jerusalem" (Rev. xxi. 12), or the "camp of the saints" (Rev. xx. 9). The expression alludes to the custom of the Jews of executing offenders without the camp or city, and excluding all unclean persons out of it (see Num. v. 1, 4, Heb. xiii. 11-13).

Look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me:] Those enemies of God, that were slain in the battle, mentioned ver. 16.

Their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and the faces of the ungodly shall be covered with worms.] Their reproach shall be perpetual; men shall abhor them
JEREMIAH.

24 And they shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me: for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.

THE PROPHECY AND LAMENTATIONS

OF

JEREMIAH.

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, WILLIAM,
BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE,
LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY; PRIMATE OF ALL ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN; AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY-COUNCIL:

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,
The following papers, written in pursuance of a Commentary formerly published upon the prophet Isaiah, I humbly beg leave to offer to your Grace; entreat your favourable acceptance of my sincere endeavours to give some farther light to the writings of the Prophet that succeeds next in order.

Who was a burning as well as a shining light in the church of God; and whose fervent piety and zeal discover themselves, in many affectionate strains of an ardent devotion, and in the warmth and vigour of a moving eloquence, so justly admired by all attentive readers: a talent that all men must acknowledge your Grace to be a perfect master of: you having, in an inferior station, given abundant proofs of your great abilities, both in exhorting, and convincing gain-sayers.

One great use of the writings of the prophets, is to instruct us in the signs of the times; and though the warnings they give had a particular aspect upon their own age, yet they were likewise written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.” This rule, if we should apply to our own case, and compare some circumstances of the present times, with the representation this prophet gives of his own, when, through a general corruption, both of principles and practice, men were so far from being “ashamed of their abominations” (Jer. vi. 15), that they openly avowed and justified them: the parallel will give us just cause to apprehend, that as we have equalled the Jews in sin, we may be made like them in punishment. But we are willing to hope better things, and cannot but look upon it as an earnest of God’s favourable intention towards this church, that his providence hath advanced a person to preside over it, so excellently qualified as your Grace is, with piety, learning and prudence, and all other accomplishments, requisite to support and adorn that high station.

Which that your Grace may long and prosperously enjoy to the glory of God, and the service of his church, and that your wise and steady conduct may be a blessing to the present age, and endear your memory to posterity, shall always be the earnest prayer of,

My Lord,
Your Grace’s most obedient and dutiful servant,
WILLIAM LOWTH.

CONCERNING THE AUTHOR AND THE SUBJECT OF THE ENGLISH PROPHECY.

The Prophet Jeremy is called the son of Hilkiah (i. 1), whom Clemens Alexander (Strom. lib. i. p. 390, edit. Oxon.) supposes to be the same Hilkiah who was high-priest in the reign of Josiah (see 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 8).

But this opinion seems not so probable, because then the prophet would not have been described as living with the inferior priests at Anathoth, inasmuch as the high-priest and his family always kept their residence at Jerusalem. He was very young when he was called by God to the prophetic office (i. 6); in the exercise of which he continued above forty years, and is said by St. Jeromes. in his argument to this prophecy, to have been stoned to death at Tahapanes in Egypt, whether he and the remains of the Jews, after the destruction of Jerusalem, were carried by John Baptist and the rest of their leaders, xxxii. 7 (see the note upon that place).

There were several collections of Jerome's prophecies: one made by God's command in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (xxxvi. 2). This contained all the prophecies he had published to that time; as well against the other nations, as against the Jews. The former of these in our present collection are put by themselves, at the end of the book, from ch. xlv. to the end of the list; but in the present copies of the Septuagint, they follow immediately after the thirteenth verse of the twenty-fifth chapter.

Another collection of these prophecies is mentioned, 1. 3, comprehending all that Jeremy had uttered to the time of the captivity. These may probably be supposed to have been collected by Baruch's amanuensis: and were put together without any regard to the order of time, just as we find the collection of psalms was made.

To this was added another collection of Jerome's prophecies, published about the time of his going down into Egypt, contained in ch. xliii.—

To the end of which, Esdras, or some others, after the captivity, who undertook the completing the scripture-canon, added those prophecies which Jeremy had spoken against the gentiles, thinking it most proper to put them by themselves, because they treat of a different subject from the rest of the book; and one of them, viz. that against Elam (xliii. 34), bears date after the first collection made by Jeremy himself in the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign.

The reason why the fifty-second chapter was added at the end of the book, shall be assigned in the argument of that chapter.

CHAPTER I.

ARGUMENT.—The first chapter contains the general commission which God gave to Jeremiah to execute the prophethical office, as well to the Jews in particular, as to the heathen countries round about them; and a promise of the divine assistance in the discharge of his duty.

Ver. 1] Anathoth was one of the cities allotted to the priests (see Josh. xxi. 13, 19): that town was but three miles from Jerusalem, as St. Jerome tells us in his preface to this prophecy, but yet was in the land of Benjamin, as, indeed, was part of Jerusalem itself (see Josh. xviii. 25). Judah and Benjamin lying so near together, makes them sometimes reckoned but as one tribe (see 1 Kings xi. 32).

Ver. 2. 3. In the days of Josiah. Jeremiah prophesied for the space of forty-one years and upward, if we take in the prophecies he uttered in Egypt after the captivity (ch. xliii. xlv.), which are not included within this period. We may observe from the sixth verse of this chapter, that Jeremy was very young when he was called by God to the prophetic office.

Unto the carrying away Jerusalem captive in the fifth month.] The Jews underwent several captivities before their final desolation. The first was when Jehoiakim was carried away captive, in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (see 2 Kings xxiv. 12). There was another captivity in the eighteenth year of his reign (see below, li. 29). Then followed, in the next year, that captivity which accompanied the destruction of the temple and city of Jerusalem, in the fifth month (see ibid. ver. 21). In memory of which calamity, the "first of the fifth month" was observed

Vol. III.—43

CHAPTER I.

1 The words of Jeremiah the son of Hilkiah, of the priests that were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin:

2 To whom the word of the Lord came in the days of Josiah the son of Amon king of Judah, in the thirteenth year of his reign.

3 It came also in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, unto the end of the eleventh year of Zedekiah the son of Josiah king of Judah, unto the carrying away of Jerusalem captive in the fifth month.

4 Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying,

5 Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; before thou art born I ordained thee, thou art a chosen vessel unto me.

6 And Jeremiah said, Stand thou before the Lord thy God, and speak all that I shall command thee, speak not out of thine own mouth.

7 For he will make thee a sure witness unto the people, and a knowledge of things to come, to speak in the Name of the Lord that made the heavens and the earth.

8 Know therefore that the Lord thy God sendeth me unto thee according to the word of the Lord; for I speak not of mine own will.

9 But the word of the Lord was unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a branch of an olive tree.
Jeremiah.

thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations.

6 Then said I, Ah, Lord God! behold, I cannot speak: for I am a child.

7 ¶ But the Lord said unto me, Say not, I am a child: for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak.

8 Be not afraid of their faces: for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the Lord.

9 Then the Lord put forth his hand, and touched my mouth. And the Lord said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth.

10 See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant.

11 ¶ Moreover the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see a rod of an almond tree.

12 Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten my word to perform it.

13 And the word of the Lord came unto me the second time, saying, What seest thou? And I said, I see a seething pot; and the face thereof is toward the north.

14 Then the Lord said unto me, Out of the north an evil shall break forth upon all the inhabitants of the land.

15 For, lo, I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north, saith the Lord; and they shall come, and they shall set every one his throne at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem, and against all the walls thereof round about, and against all the cities of Judah.

16 And I will utter my judgments against him, that his words ought to be esteemed the oracles of God (compare Isa. vi. 7, li. 16).

Ver. 10.] The prophets are said to do things, when they declare God's purpose of doing them. So Ezekiel saith he was "sent to destroy the city" (xlii.3); that is, to prophesy concerning its destruction. And Isaiah is commanded to "make the heart of the Jews fat," i.e. to foretell their obduracy and incredulity (vi. 10). In the same sense we are to understand the text here, that God had appointed Jeremiah to declare his purposes concerning the overthrow or restoration of kingdoms and nations, according as they either repented of their sins, or persisted in their evil doings (compare xviii. 7). In pursuance of these directions, some of the following prophecies foretell the destruction of the Jewish nation, and several of the neighbouring countries (see xxv. 15, &c): others of them contain predictions of the restoration of the Jews (as ch. xxx. xxxii.), and also of several other nations against which he had prophesied (see xviii. 47. xlix. 6, 39).

Ver. 11, 12.] The almond is one of the first trees that buds and blossoms in the spring; so a branch of that with buds and blossoms upon it, is a proper emblem of the early bearing of the cross and of the predictions he made by his prophet, who lived to see most of his prophecies fulfilled. The Hebrew words shaked, an almond-tree, and shook, hardening, have an affinity in their sound (such paronomasia being frequent in scripture; see the note upon Isa. xxiv. 17): so that not only the nature of the almond-tree, but the very sound of the Hebrew word that signifies it, denotes God's hardening to fulfill the prophecies which Jeremiah uttered by his directions.

Ver. 13.] The stem of a seething-pot doth fitly represent God's judgments, which are often compared to a fire, as the afflictions of the Israelites are to a "smoking furnace" (Gen. xv. 17). This stem was represented to the prophet as raised by a fire, or driven by a wind coming from the north; for the latter part of the verse may be better rendered thus: "And the appearance of it was as coming from the north." So that the pot or caldron itself may denote Judea or Jerusalem in particular (expressed in the same figure, Ezek. xi. 3, 7, xxiv. 3), set on fire and consumed by a army of Chaldeans, who lay northward of Judea (see iv. 6, vi. 1).

Ver. 15.] I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north. There were lesser kings and princes, who were either allies or tributaries to the Babylonian empire (compare xxxiv. 1, 1. 41, li. 27). God saith, them touching all their wickedness, who have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto other gods, and worshipped the works of their own hands.
CHAPTER II.

17 ¶ Thou therefore gird up thy loins, and arise, and speak unto them all that I command thee: be not dismayed at their faces, lest I confound thee before them.

all these shall join their forces with the Chaldean army in order to the conquest of Judea. The word family is equivalent to people here, and viii. 3, x. 25, with the families that call not upon thy name, are equivalent to "the kingdoms that call not upon thy name," in Ps. lxix. 6.

They shall set every one his throne] Each prince shall pitch his royal pavilion, with all the marks of sovereignty belonging to it, in token of having obtained a complete victory, and taken entire possession of the city (see xlii. 10).

Ver. 16.] Then I will no longer speak unto them by my prophets, whose threatenings they have not regarded, but the judgments I bring upon them shall declare their wickedness, and the vengeance due unto them for their idolatries (compare iv. 12, where the words are the same in the original).

Ver. 17. Gird up thy loins, and arise, and speak unto them all that I command thee.] It being the custom of the eastern countries to wear long garments, which they girded up about their loins, when any business required nimbleness or expedition: the phrase signifies dispatching any message with all possible vigour and intention of mind as well as of body (see Job xxxviii. 3, 1 Pet. i. 13). We may apply both senses to the text here; for God commands the prophet instantly to undertake the office he designed him for, and to discharge it with courage and presence of mind, as it follows.

Lest I confound thee before them.] The Hebrew verb is the same in both parts of the sentence, which may literally be rendered thus: "Be not confounded at their faces (when thou appearest in their presence), lest I confound thee before them." God exhorts him not to be dismayed at the scoffs and ill treatment he should meet with from hardened sinners especially, from such who think their power and authority set them above reproof, and will bear them out in whatsoever they devise. Ezekiel ii. 1., x. 1., i. 1., iv. 14., xi. 1., xv. 3. (see xlix. 7), is a better view of what is here meant, and better bears to the reproaches of men, than the reproofs of God, who will call him to a strict account how he hath discharged his duty (see 1 Cor. ix. 16, 17).

Ver. 18.] God promises to defend him against all the open assaults and secret contrivances of his enemies, the kings, princes, and priests, as well as those of an inferior rank (see xv. 10, xx. 2, xxiii. 18, &c. xxxi. 10, xxxv. 15, xxxviii. 6). In case of their success, his relatives and family (see Ezek. i. 5-7; viii. 13) would naturally come to his assistance; and hence the assurance, Thou shall prevail against them.

I am with thee—to deliver thee.] I will show my power in delivering thee out of all thy troubles, when thy adversaries shall become a prey to their enemies (see xxxix. 11, 12, and ver. 8 of this chapter).

CHAPTER II.

1 Moreover the word of the Lord came to me, saying,

2 Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying, Thus saith the Lord; I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown.

3 Israel was holiness unto the Lord, and the first fruits of his increase: all that devour him shall offend; evil shall come upon them, saith the Lord.

4 Hear ye the word of the Lord, O house of Jacob, and all the families of the house of Israel:

5 ¶ Thus saith the Lord, What iniquity have

Ver. 3. Israel was holiness unto the Lord, and the first fruits of his increase:] The Jews were then consecrated to me as a holy nation (see Exod. xix. 5, 6), as a people particularly dedicated to me, as the first fruits of the increase of the ground are, by their law, consecrated to God (Exod. xxiii. 19).

All that devour him shall offend; evil shall come upon them.] The words were better rendered in the preter-perfect tense, as the future is often taken; "all that devour him were trespassers, evil came upon them"; i.e. they that went about to destroy God's people were reputed by him as sacrilegious persons, as if they had devoured holy things, and accordingly met with remarkable punishments. Such were the Egyptians, Amalekites, &c. From the verb here rendered to offend comes askam, "a trespass-offering," which was particularly appointed to be offered by those who had ignorantly taken of the holy things set apart to God's service (see Lev. v. 15, xxli. 14, 16).

Ver. 4.] Compare xxxi. 1. The prophet directs his discourse to the twelve tribes, as he does afterward, iii. 14, &c. Nor was the captivity of the ten tribes so total, but that there were some Israelites still re-your fathers found in me, that they are gone far from me, and have walked after vanity, and are become vain?

6 Neither said they, Where is the Lord that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, that led us through the wilderness, through a land of deserts and of pits, through a land of drought, and of the shadow of death, through a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt? 7 And I brought you into a plentiful country, to eat the fruit thereof and the goodness thereof; but when ye entered, ye defiled my land, and made mine heritage an abomination.

8 The priests said not, Where is the Lord? meaning among the Assyrian colonies (see 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9, xxxv. 18).

Ver. 5. What iniquity have your fathers found in me.] The same expostulation God makes by his prophet, Micah, vi. 3.

Walked after vanity, and are become vain!] That they have forsoaken me, and followed the idolatrous worship of the heathens (compare 2 Kings xviii. 15).

Idols are commonly styled vanities (see particularly in this prophecy, x. 13, xiv. 22, xvii. 10,) and "things of vanity and lies" (see Ps. xlix. 19), because "an idol is nothing in the world," as St. Paul speaks, I Cor. viii. 4. Not being what it pretends to be, nor can it bring any profit to them that worship it (see below, ver. 8).

Ver. 6. That led us through the wilderness.] God's sustaining such a vast multitude in a barren desert, was an amazing instance of his almighty power, and his goodness and care over his people (see Deut. xviii. 10, xxiv. 31).

Through a land of deserts and of pits.] The Hebrew word shachah, a "pit," sometimes is put for destruction, as Ps. xxx. 3, and is near akin to the word shachath, which signifies death and corruption. The Chaldee paraphrase upon Job xxx. 11, explains shachat, desolation, by shakha. Thus we may expound it here, a place where there were no comforts or conveniences of life; to the same sense it is called in the following words, "a land of the shadow of death."

Ver. 7. I brought you into a plentiful country.] The Hebrew reads, "into the land of Carmel," which was so plentiful a part of Judaea, that the word from thence came to signify a fruitful place, in general (see Isa. x. 18, xxix. 17, xxxii. 13). Judæa is commonly called by Moses, "a land that flows with milk and honey."

But when ye entered, ye defiled my land.] By your sins (Lev. xvii. 9, Num. xxx. 34), chiefly by your idolatries (Psalm cv. 38); that sin receiving great aggravation from hence, that the people should thereby renounce God's authority in the very land, whose property he had reserved to himself (Lev. xxv. 23), though he had graciously bestowed upon them the use of it.

Ver. 8. The priests said not, Where is the Lord?] The priests, whose office it was to instruct others in their duty (see Mal. ii. 6, 7), were ignorant or regardless of it themselves: and this was the principal reason of that degeneracy of manners which prevailed among the people (see Hos. iv. 6).

The pastors also transgressed against me.] A pastor or shepherd is taken in the prophets for a civil magistrate, as well as an ecclesiastical governor, as has been observed upon Isa. li. 11. In the former sense it is used in several places of this prophecy (see vi. 3, xxv. 34, xlv. 19). Which sense agrees best with the scope of the text here, which is to show, that all and they that handle the law knew me not; the pastors also transgressed against me, and the prophets prophesied by Baal, and walked after things that do not profit.

9 ¶ Wherefore I will yet plead with you, saith the Lord, and with your children's children will I plead.

10 For pass over the isles of Chittim, and see; and send unto Kedar, and consider diligently, and see if there be such a thing.

11 Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods? but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit.

12 Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and ordinances and degrees of men in authority had contributed to that corruption of manners which had overspread the nation (compare ver. 26 of this chapter).

The prophets prophesied by Baal.] See xxii. 13, and the notes upon ver. 5 of this chapter, and vii. 31.

Ver. 9. I will yet plead with you.] The expression is taken from the pleas of plaintiff and defendant used in the courts of judicature (see Isa. xliii. 20). It imports God's laying before them their demerits, and exhibiting to them how defective they have been in their duty, and what ungrateful returns they have made to him for all his favours (see ver. 25 of this chapter). And this he doth sometimes by word of mouth, and by the messages of his prophets (see Hos. ii. 2, Mic. vi. 2). And sometimes he doth it by his judgments, the manifest tokens of God's vengeance due to men's sins (see Isa. lxvi. 10, Jer. xxvi. 31, Ezek. xx. 36, xxxviii. 12).

With your children's children.] According to the tenor of the law, whereby God threatens to "visit the sins," particularly the idolatry, of "the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation."

Ver. 10.] The isles of Chittim are the countries lying upon the Mediterranean sea (see the notes on Isa. xlvii. 7), which lay west of Judea. Kedar, being part of Arabia, was eastward from thence; for Arabia is commonly called the "east country" in scripture (see Gen. x. 30, xxv. 6, Job i. 3); and particularly the inhabitants of Kedar are called the "men of the east," xlix. 28 of this prophecy. So the sense of the verse is, if you search from east to west, from one end of the world to the other, you will find no instance like this of the Jews' apostasy, mentioned in the following verse.

Ver. 11.] Men are very tenacious of the religion of their forfathers, and hardly prevailed upon to part with it, though the change be never so reasonable; whereas the Jews have changed the worship of the true God, who was their strength and their glory, for idols and vanities that cannot save nor protect them (ver. 5). God is called the glory of the Jews, because he chose the ark for the place where his glory should reside: for the same reason the temple is called the "throne of his glory," xiv. 21, and they are said to have "changed their glory into the similitude of an ox," Ps. cxv. 30 (a text exactly parallel with this place), when they made the golden calf; and instead of the divine Shechinah, which should go before them, they chose that senseless idol to be their conductor. God may be called their glory for another reason, viz. because he chose them to be his peculiar people, and took them into his immediate care and protection; a privilege which no other nation could boast of (see Dutc. iv. 7).

Ver. 12.] This is such a horrible wickedness, that be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate, saith the Lord.

13 For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water.

14 ¶ Is Israel a servant? is he a homeland slave? why is he spoiled?

15 The young lions roared upon him, and yawned, and he made his land waste: his cities are burned without inhabitant.

16 Also the children of Noph and Tahapanes have broken the crown of thy head.

17 Hast thou not procured this unto thyself, in that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, when he led thee by the way?

18 And now what hast thou to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the waters of Sihor? or what hast thou to do in the way of Assyria, to drink the waters of the river?

19 Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee: know therefore and see that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, and that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord God of hosts.

20 ¶ For of old time I have broken thy yoke, and burst thy bands; and thou saidst, I will not transgress; when upon every high hill and under every green tree thou wanderest, playing the harlot.

21 Yet I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed: how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me?

Ver. 18.] The kings of Egypt and Assyria were the two most potent monarchs in the neighbourhood of Judea; and, according as either of those prevailed over the other, the Jews made their court to him who was the stronger, and desired his assistance. This is expressed by "drinking the water of Sihor," or Nile, called so for its blackness or muddiness (see Isa. xxiii. 3); and of Euphrates, called here "the river" by way of eminence (compare Isa. xxvii. 12). The expressions allude to ver. 13, where human assistances are called "broken cisterns," and opposed to God, who, by reason of his all-sufficiency, is styled the "fountain of living waters." The Septuagint render Sihor, i.e., as if it were the same with the river Gihon, mentioned Gen. ii. 13. It is certain many of the ancients understood Gihon to be the Nile, particularly the author of Esclus. xxiv. 27. And Ludolphus observes, that the Nile is now called by that name in the Ethiopic language (see the Commentary upon his Ethiopic Hist. lib. i. n. 50).

The waters of Sihor? Some suppose Sihor to be the same with "the river of Egypt" (see the note upon Ezek. xlvii. 19, and upon Amos vi. 14).

Ver. 19.] The miseries that your own sins have brought upon you, are a sufficient instruction to you to break your yokes, and to return to God by a sincere repentance.

Ver. 20. For of old time I have broken thy yoke,—and thou saidst, I will not transgress:] Upon several deliverances I gave thee, that out of Egypt, and in the times of the judges, thou didst promise to serve me faithfully (see Ezek. xiv. 8, Josh. xxiv. 18, Judg. x. 16, 1 Sam. xii. 10). When upon every high hill, thou wanderest:] The sense would run easier, if we read, "yet upon every high hill," &c. and so the particle ki is translated, xxii. 24 of this prophecy. God upbraided them with the breach of promise, that after all their resolutions of amendment, they still relapsed to the former sin of worshipping idols upon high places, and in shady groves, which the law expressly forbade (Deut. xii. 2, Ezek. xvi. 24). The idolatrous kings built temples for their idols upon high mountains and high places (see 1 Kings xii. 31, xiii. 32). These were still frequented after the religious kings had destroyed all other monuments of idolatry (see 1 Kings xv. 24, xxii. 48).

Ver. 21.] The laws which I gave thee, and the means of grace which I afforded thee, were such and so made thee fruitful in every good work, though now thou art strangely degenerate. The church is often represented under the metaphor of a vine (see Isa. v. 1, and the parallel texts referred to—22 For though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much sope, yet thinke iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God.

23 How canst thou say, I am not polluted; I have not gone after Baalim? see thy way in the valley, know what thou hast done: thou art a swift dromedary traversing her ways;

24 A wild ass used to the wilderness, that snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure; in her occasion who can turn her away? all they that seek her will not weary themselves; in hersmonth they shall find her.

25 Withhold thy foot from being unshod, and thy throat from thirst: but thou saidst, There is no hope: no; for I have loved strangers, and after them will I go.

There in the margin), and the means of grace under the notion of planting (see Isa. ix. 21, xii. 3, Matt. xxv. 13, 1 Cor. iii. 6).

Ver. 22.] Though thou usest ever so many methods of washing away thy sins, such as are the rites of expiation prescribed by the law, or practised by idolaters; though thou insistest never so much upon thy own innocence and justification (see ver. 22), yet are the marks or stains of thy sins will always appear in the sight of God, till they are done away by a sincere repentance and reformation. Expositors are divided about the sense of the word niklum, which our translators render marked: and in which sense the word is taken for a spot or mark, in the Chaldee and Syriac tongues. But Dohler thinks the word catamentum, or catamentum, in the Hebrew would be translated a hidden, or laid up: as men's sins are said to be, when God, perhaps, bears with them for the present, but intends to call them to account in due time (see Deut. xxxii. 34, Job xiv. 17, Hos. xiii. 12).

Ver. 23.] I have not gone after Baalim?] The Jews, it seems, have found out distinctions, whereby to reconcile the worship of the true God with those religious rites, which they paid to the deities of the heathen, called here Baalim. These they pretended were only inferior demons or spirits, or the souls of men departed, and might be worshipped in subordination to the supreme God. The word Baalim answers in the Hebrew to nakhathim, or nakhathim (1 Cor. viii. 5), whom St. Paul mentions as the inferior deities of the heathen.

See thy way in the valley, know what thou hast done.] That horrible practice of the Jewish idolaters in burning their sons and daughters in the fire, in the valley of Hinnom (see vii. 32), is an effectual confusion of those pretences whereby they justified their innocence, since this was a way of worship expressly forbidden by God (Lev. xx. 2, &c.); and such an impious one, as none but the devil could invent.

Ibid. and ver. 24.] Thou art a swift dromedary traversing her ways, &c.] The particle as, is to be supplied in both these sentences, as it is frequently understood (see note on Isa. xvi. 5). The prophet persists in comparing their fondness for variety of idols to the rage of lust (which metaphor is pursued at large by Ezekiel, ch. xvi. xxxiii.), and upon that account he compares them to these wild beasts, which have their constant seasons of breeding, and are then violently set upon satisfying their lust, and not to be caught or tamed. The comparisons would set forth the indefatigable pains the Jews took in applying themselves to foreign princes for their succour and alliance (compare ver. 36), instead of relying upon God, and a strict observance of his laws. These practices of theirs are often reproved in the prophets (see Isa. xxx. 1, &c., vii. 9, 10, Hos. v. 13, xii. 1).

Ver. 26.] As the thief is ashamed when he is found, so is the house of Israel ashamed: they, their kings, their princes, and their priests, and their prophets, 27 Saying to a stock, Thou art my father; and to a stone, Thou hast brought me forth: for they have turned their back upon me, and not their face: but in the time of their trouble they will say, Arise, and save us.

28 But where are thy gods that thou hast made thee? let them arise, if they can save thee in the time of thy trouble: for according to the number of thy cities are thy gods, O Judah.

29 Wherefore will ye plead with me? ye all have transgressed against me, saith the Lord.

30 In vain have I smitten your children; they

Ver. 29. Wherefore wilt thou plead with me?] Why do you insist upon your innocence (see ver. 35)? Why do you lay claim to my former promises, as if you had not forfeited your title to them by your sins?

Ver. 30. Is vain have I smitten your children?] The design of God's judgments is men's reformation: and where they do not attain this end, it shows that such a people are incorrigible. The words are directed to the land of Judea, whose inhabitants are called its children, v. 7 (compare Isa. i. 5).

Your own sword hath devoured your prophets.] You are so far from receiving correction, that you are the chief of those prophets who reproach you, and exhort you to amend your ways (see 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16, Nbr. ix. 36, Acts vii. 52).

Ver. 31. O generation, see ye the word of the Lord.] Consider what I say to you from the mouth of God: Have ye not been plentifully provided for by him? has he been backward in bestowing his kindness upon you? To this sense some render the latter part of the sentence a back ward land, a land of snow, clouds, and dark vapours, where the fruits spring or ripen late, for want of the kindly warmth of the sun; a character that did by no means belong to Judea.

We are lords:] Words that imply casting off God's authority, and rejecting him from being their Lord and sovereign (compare Ps. xii. 4).

Ver. 32. God was the glory and ornament of the Jewish nation, upon whose favour and protection they so justly valued themselves, and were thereby distinguished from other nations (see Deut. iv. 7, 8, 2 Sam. vii. 23, 24). So that it is a just matter of astonishment, that this people, called by his name, should now for so many years renounce their relation to him, who is their truest glory (see ver. 11).

Ver. 33. Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love? The prophet alludes (as before, ver. 20) to the practices of a common harlot, who deceits herself, and uses all the inveigling arts that may recommend her to her gallants: in like manner have the Jews tried all methods to gain the friendship and assistance of foreign idolaters, who are called her souls of the poor innocents: I have not found it by secret search, but upon all these.

35 Yet thou sayest. Because I am innocent, surely his anger shall turn from me. Behold, I will plead with thee, because thou sayest, I have not sinned.

36 We have gadest thou about so much to change thy way? thou also shalt be ashamed of Egypt, as thou wast ashamed of Assyria.

37 Yea, thou shalt go forth from him, and thine hands upon thine head: for the Lord hath rejected thy confidences, and thou shalt not prosper in them.

losers (see iii. i, iv. 13, xxii. 22). Noldius expounds it, Why dost thou justify thy ways, or insist upon thy innocence (compare ver. 35)? and translates the particle taken (therefore whereas) (see his Concordance, p. 507).

Therefore hast thou also taught the wicked ones thy ways:] Thou hast by this means, not only confirmed those nations in their idolatrous practices, but hast also taught them to practice new idolatries which they were not accustomed to.

Ver. 34. In thy skirts is found the blood of the souls (or lives) of the poor innocents:] Of the children offered in sacrifice to Moloch (see ver. 29, xix. 4, Ps. cx. i, 38). The guilt of that innocent blood was as evident upon them as if they had murdered them with their own hands, and the stains of their blood had been found upon their clothes.

I have not found it by secret search:] It is become a national sin (see vii. 31, xix. 4, 5). Some render the former part of the sentence thus: "Thou didst not find them breaking up" [a house, like thieves], who might be killed immediately upon the spot, according to the law (Exod. xxii. 3): i. e. thou didst not find them guilty of any such notorious wickedness as to deserve present death.

Ver. 35. The people insisting still upon their own innocence, God tells them he will debate the case with them, and prove the contrary (see before, ver. 9, 29, 29).

Ver. 36. He reproves them for their various methods of corrupting the alliance of foreign idolaters, which implied a distrust of God's protection (see before, ver. 13, 18, 23, 25). Ahaz made himself tributary to the king Assyria, but it turned to his disgrace and ruin (see 2 Chron. xxviii. 21). In like manner shall ye be disappointed in your expectations of succour from Egypt (see xxxvii. 5, 7, Lam. iv. 17, 2 Kings xxiv. 7).

Ver. 37. The ambassadors thou sendest to Egypt shall return with disappointment and confusion (see 2 Sam. xiii. 19). For God will not prosper these unlawful means thou makest use of for thy preservation (see ver. 38).

33 Also in thy skirts is found the blood of the with many lovers; yet return again to me, saith the Lord.

2 Lift up thine eyes unto the high places, and see where thou hast not been lieth with. In the ways hast thou sat for them, as the Arabian in the wilderness; and thou hast polluted the land with thy whoredoms and with thy wickedness.

3 Therefore the showers have been withholden, and there hath been no latter rain; and thou hast had a whore's forehead, thou refusedest to be ashamed.

4 Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My father, thou art the guide of my youth?

5 Will he reserve his anger for ever? will he keep it to the end? Behold, thou hast spoken, and done evil things as thou couldest.

6 ¶ The Lord said also unto me in the days of Josia the king, Hast thou seen that which backsliding Israel hath done? she is gone up upon divorced from him, it is "such an abomination as causeth the land to sin." Such a practice would give encouragement to a community of wives, which must produce all manner of uncleanness and confusion.

But thou hast played the harlot with many lovers;] Thou hast entered into a confederacy with many foreigners (see the note on ii. 38); and learned their idolatries (compare li. 20): a thing expressly forbidden in the law of Moses (see Exod. xxxiv. 16, Deut. xii. 30, 1 Kings xi. 1, 2).

Ver. 23] Idolatry is usually expressed by "going a whoring after other gods" (see the note on ii. 2); who were worshipped in the high places (see ii. 20). Their fondness for idolatry is compared to the lewdness of a common strumpet, who "lies in wait for men as for a prey" (Prov. xxiii. 25), or, "as a robber" (so the margin reads), the same comparison which is here used; the Aramians being remarkable for living upon robberies, and lying in wait for travellers.

Ver. 3. The showers have been withholden,] Compare ix. 12, xiv. 4. God threatens, as a punishment of the people's sins, to make the heavens iron (Deut. xxviii. 22). The climate of Judea wanted rain at two seasons; the first was just after seed time (see Isa. xxx. 23), called the former rain; the other not long before harvest, called the latter rain (Joel ii. 28, compared with Amos iv. 7).

And [yet] thou hadst a whore's forehead,] All my judgments have made no impression upon thee, nor hast thou any remorse for thy wickedness (compare vi. 15, viii. 12).

Ver. 4.] Notwithstanding their former obstinacy, God calls them still to repentance, to acknowledge the duty they owe to God, both as their father (see ver. 19), and their husband: for under both these titles, they were related to them (see ii. 27, and ver. 14 of this chapter). God calls himself the guide of their youth (compare Prov. ii. 17), as having espoused them in the days of their youth before their manners were corrupted by idolatry (see ii. 2; Hos. ii. 15).

Ver. 5. Will he reserve his anger for ever?] God puts words into the people's mouths in this and the foregoing verse, whereby they might express their humiliation, and hope in his mercy, which they might still expect to find upon their true repentance, though upon account of their long provocations they had reason to despair of it.

Thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldest.] Thy behaviour hath been in direct opposition to these kind admonitions; thou dost still persist in malicious wickedness, and by thy actions every high mountain and under every green tree, and there hath played the harlot.

7 And I said after she had done all these things, Turn thou unto me. But she returned not. And her treacherous sister Judah saw it.

8 And I saw, when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery I had put her away, and given her a bill of divorce; yet her treacherous sister Judah feared not, but went and played the harlot also.

9 And it came to pass through the lightness of her whoredom, that she defiled the land, and committed adultery with stones and with stocks.

10 And yet for all this her treacherous sister Judah hath not turned unto me with her whole heart, but feignedly, saith the Lord.

11 And the Lord said unto me, The backsliding Israel hath justified herself more than treacherous Judah.
The restoration of Israel, as distinct from Judah, is the subject of several other prophecies (see the note upon ver. 18).

Ver. 13. Only acknowledge thin inequity. Repentance is a condition necessarily required in order to their being restored to God's favour (see Dent. xxx. 1—3).

Hast scattered thy ways? Hast gone a whoring after the gods of the neighbouring nations; for the word translating strangers signifies strange gods (compare ii. 25). The phrase "thou hast scattered thy ways," is taken from the lewdness of common harlots, who promiscuously prostitute themselves to all comers (compare Prov. xxx. 20).

Ver. 14. Turn, O backsliding children, said the Lord; for I am married unto you: and I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion:

And I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding.

And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied and increased in the land, in those days, saith the Lord, they shall say no more, 'The ark of the covenant of the Lord: neither shall it come to mind: neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit it; neither shall that be done any more.

At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem: neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart.

In those days the house of Judah shall be 14; whereas, at that time, when Jeremiah lived, the princes, the priests, and prophets, were the ringleaders in reducing the people, and enticing them to idolatry (see ii. 8).

Ver. 16.] The words imply, that the Jews shall be gathered together from their several dispersions, and restored to their own country (see the notes on Isa. xi. 11, xli. 4). In those times the Mosaical covenant shall be utterly forgotten, and passed over in silence; none worth it to be mentioned (compare Isa. lxv. 17). But in all the external marks and ceremonies thereto belonging shall be laid aside. Such as were the ark, where the tables of the covenant were laid up, and the temple, which was the repository of the ark itself (compare xlv. 29); where, by the law of Moses, the Jews were bound to pay their yearly attendance, and offer up their solemn worship to God.

Neither shall that be done any more.] The margin reads, "neither shall it be magnified any more," to which sense the verb nasah is rendered by our translators, 1 Sam. xii. 6. But the original will bear this sense, which agrees better with the scope of the place: "neither shall any more sacrifice be offered there." In which sense the same verb is elsewhere taken (see Exod. xxix. 38, Ps. lxi. 15).

Ver. 17.] Jerusalem is often called the "city of God" (see Ps. lxviii. 1, lxxxvii. 3): whereupon it is a fit type or figure of the church of God (see Is. lvii. 20, Zech. viii. 3): which the text tells us shall be called the "throne of the Lord." I. e. God shall give evident proofs of his peculiar residence there, as the king and protector of his people, and in a more eminent manner than ever he did at the temple in Jerusalem (compare xiv. 21). To this church "all the nations shall be gathered," as it follows: I. e. the Jews and gentiles shall then be joined in one religious body or society, and worship God with "one mind and one mouth."

The expression alludes to the Jews going up to Jerusalem at their solemn festivals (see the notes upon Isa. ii. 3, ix. 9, xiii. 20).

To the name of the Lord.] To the church where God hath placed his name, as he promised to do in Solomon's temple (1 Kings viii. 29), and where he will give evident tokens of his power and presence.

Neither shall they walk, &c.] God's restoring his ancient people the Jews, shall be attended with the bringing in of the "fulness of the gentiles" into the church, and the utter abolishing of all false and idolatrous ways of worship (compare Rom. xi. 25, 26, and see the notes on Isa. i. 29, lvii. 12, 19).

Ver. 18. In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel. Most of the prophecies which mention the restoration of the Jews join Judah and Israel together, as equal sharers in that walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers.

19 But I said, How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land, a goodsly heritage of the hosts of nations? and I said, Thou shalt call me, My father; and shalt not turn away from me.

20 ¶ Surely as a wife treacherously departh from her husband, so have ye dealt treacherously with me, O house of Israel, saith the Lord.

21 A voice was heard upon the high places of the earth, blessing (see xxx. 3, xxxi. 1, 4. 30. Isa. xi. 13, Ezek. xxxviii. 16, 22, Hos. i. 11, Zech. x. 6).

They shall come together] See before ver. 12, i, 15, and compare xxxi. 8.

Ver. 19 How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land.] How can it be consistent with the divine justice, for God to receive such a rebellious people into favour, to own them for his children, and restore them to the possession of that goodsly inheritance which he gave to their fathers? God, as the Chaldee verb terba, which signifies to desire (Dan. v. 10, vii. 19). This sense the Chaldee paraphrast follows. If we take terbaath in the usual sense which our translators follow, the phrase will import that land which the armies of the gentiles are to possess in the latter times, to which this prophecy relates (see Ezek. xxxviii. 5); when, according to our Saviour's prediction, Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the gentiles (Luke xxi. 24). But after all, I am apt to think that the Septuagint have hit upon the true sense of this place, who render it, the inheritance of the Almighty God of the nations; taking the word isebi for a title belonging to God, denoting his superlative excellence. The word is used in a sense near akin to this, 2 Sam. i. 19, where it denotes the regal dignity of Saul. A great regard is thus shewn here, not only to that version, because the compilers of it had better opportunities of knowing the extent of the Hebrew language than we can have at this distance, and might have very good reasons for rendering some words in a singular and unusual signification, and such a one as the later rabbins and lexicographers have not observed. Upon these grounds, Bishop Pearson, Dr. Pocock, and other learned men, justify several passages in that translation, which are cited in the New Testament, and show that the sense of the original is truly expressed by it.

Thou shalt call me, My father.] Upon this condition I will restore thee into grace and favour, that thou acknowledge those benefits which thou hast from time to time received at my hands, and vouchsafe to believe in me (compare Deut. xxxii. 6, 1 Chron. xxix. 10).

10 When the Jews called upon God as their Father in their prayers, they did it chiefly by way of confession, when they would acknowledge his former favours, together with the ungrateful returns they had made to him, and withal desired to express their weeping and supplications of the children of Israel: for they have perverted their way, and they have forgotten the Lord their God.

22 Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backsides. Behold, we come unto thee; for thou art the Lord our God.

23 Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills, and from the multitude of mountains: truly in the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel.

24 For shame hath devoured the labour of our fathers from you; their flocks and their herds, their sons and their daughters.

25 We lie down in our shame, and our confidence in his mercy is made bitter. We have expected our good things, and be ashamed.

Ver. 20. As a wife treacherously departh from her husband.] The Hebrew reads, from her friend; in which sense the word is taken, Hos. iii. 1. Idolatry hath been the breach of that covenant which God made with the Jews as their Lord and husband, is properly compared to the sin of whoredom, or a woman's being unfaithful to her husband's bed, as hath already been observed in several passages of this and the foregoing chapter (compare v. 11, 12, Isa. xlviii. 8). The word reang, translated husband, properly signifies a friend, as our margin observes; but it is nowhere used for a husband (see Cant. v. 16).

O house of Israel.] An expression denoting all the families or tribes of the Jews (compare ii. 4): called the children of Israel in the following verse.

Ver. 21. The prophet, foreseeing that the Jews will at length be touched with a hearty repentance for all their misdoings, represents them as bewailing themselves upon the high places, the scenes of their former idolatries (compare xxxi. 9, 1, 4, Zech. xiii. 10).

Ver. 22. This verse contains a dialogue between God and his people, wherein he offers gracious terms of pardon to them, and they make sincere professions of obedience to him.

Ver. 23. A continuation of that form of confession, begun ver. 22, drawn up with reference to the present disclosures of his favour, and by which they express their abhorrence of those idols they worshipped upon the hills and mountains (see ver. 6); and declare their firm adherence to, and dependence upon the Lord their God. Idolatry was the great and crying sin of the Jews, in which case God particularly declared that he would visit the sins of the fathers upon the children (see Exod. xx. 5, Isa. lviv. 7). Accordingly the Jews have a proverbial saying among them, that there is no judgment inflicted upon Israel, wherein there is not an ounce of the golden calf.

Ver. 24. All the miseries of our captivity, implying the loss of our goods and substance, and the dispersion of our families and nearest relations: all these calamities which we and our forefathers have suffered, are the effects of our idolatry, of which we are now heartily ashamed, and which hath brought shame and confusion upon us (compare Ezek. xvi. 61, 63). The idol Baal was by way of reproach called Bosheith, that is, shame (see xli. 13, Hos. ix. 10).

Ver. 25. We lie down in our shame, and our confusion covereth us.] The expressions are taken from:
fusion covereth us; for we have sinned against the Lord our God, we and our fathers, from our those who cast themselves down upon the ground, and cover themselves with dust or ashes, out of grief and anguish of mind (compare vi. 26, Isa. 1. 11). By way of conclusion to the notes upon this chapter, I shall consider an objection which the Jews advance from the twenty-first and following verses of it; where the dispersion of that nation is charged upon their idolatry, and their conversion, expressed by their despairing and renouncing that sin. From these passages, and others of a like nature, particularly Isa. lxv. 7, they conclude that their present forlorn condition is not to be ascribed to their rejecting the true Messias, as we Christians believe.

To this objection an answer may be returned in these two particulars:

1. That the prophecies belonging to this matter, which were uttered near the times of the Babylonish captivity, or before the people's return from it, do so intermix the promises relating to their first or second restoration, that it is not to be discovered in the transition from one to the other: the like ambiguity may be observed in many prophecies relating to the first and second coming of the Messias. And we may assign a sufficient reason why the prophecies that treat of the first and second dispersion of the Jews youth even unto this day, and have not obeyed the voice of the Lord our God.

CHAPTER IV.

1 If thou wilt return, O Israel, saith the Lord, return unto me: and if thou wilt put away thine abominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not remove.

2 And thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness; and the nations shall bless themselves in him, and in him shall they glory.

3 ¶ For this saith the Lord to the men of Judah and Jerusalem, Break up your fallow ground, and sow not among thorns.

4 Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart, ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem: lest my fury come forth like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings.

5 Declare ye in Judah, and publish in Jerusalem; and say, Blow ye the trumpet in the land:

CHAP. IV.

1 Argument.—The first four verses contain an earnest exhortation to repentance, which should have been joined to the former chapter, as being a continuation of the same subject. Afterward the prophet gives a very pathetic description of the miseries of his country, when it should be made the seat of war.

Ver. 1.] By Israel may be here meant the whole body of the Jewish nation (see ii. 4, iii. 20). Or else the prophet addresses himself to Israel in this verse, and to Judah in the third. The words here exhort the people not to satisfy themselves with a boasted and assumed profession of repentance, but to make proof of their sincerity by quitting their evil practices, and particularly their idolatry; for so the word shikhsutim, abominations, commonly signifies. If thou dest this, saith God, thou shalt never more be removed out of thy land, or carried away captive.

Ver. 2.] Thou shalt swear.] Swearing by the name of God is mentioned elsewhere as a solemn part of religious worship, and opposed to the custom of swearing by false gods, which was practised among idolaters (see Isa. xlv. 23, lviii. i. lxv. 16, Amos viii. 14, Zeph. i. 5). But this religious invocation of the name of God, as the just judge of the world, must be used only for the manifestation of the truth, and the maintenance of right and justice.

CHAPTER IV.

should be delivered in such doubtful expressions; viz. because it would have discouraged the Jews from returning out of Babylon into their own country, if any ancient prophecies had given them a distinct account of a second dispersion of their nation, and of the cause of so dreadful a calamity.

But, secondly, we may observe that some prophecies in the Old Testament do plainly ascribe the destruction of the Jewish church and nation to their rejecting and putting to death the Messias. To this purpose those words of Moses are very remarkable (Deut. xxxiv. 10), which bring out the sin of the Jewish nation, and the avenging nature of God, with that sacred name which will not bear that Prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people," as St. Peter explains the sense of that prophecy. Acts iii. 23. Daniel expressly assigns their sin of cutting off the Messias, as the cause of the destruction of their city and temple (Dan. ix. 20). And Zechariah, who lived after the people's return from their first captivity, describes the inauguration of the whole nation for their sin of piercing or crucifying Christ, as a preparative to their general restoration (Zech. xii. 10, xiii. 1); which repentance of theirs is only expressed in general terms by our prophet, at the twenty-first verse of this chapter, and xxxi. 9.

Ver. 3.] For [or surely] thus saith the Lord.] In this verse the prophet addresses himself to the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem, and exhorts them to repentance and reformation, under the metaphor of ploughing up their fallow ground, which had lain a long while uncultivated, and clearing it from thorns, that it might be made capable of receiving good seed (compare Hos. x. 12, Matt. xii. 5).

Ver. 4.] Compare ix. 28, a metaphor taken from Moses, Deut. x. 16, xxx. 6. From whence it appears, that this ceremony, as well as other rites of Moses's law, had a spiritual signification implied in them. Accordingly the apostles make moral applications of several branches of the ceremonial law (see Acts x 14, 28. Rom. ii. 28, 29, I Cor. ix. 9, 2 Cor. vi. 14 Col. ii. 11). The same reasons the Jewish writers assign for several parts of the Mosneale institutions, particularly Philo and Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap 8, and lib. ii. contra Appion.

Ver. 5, 6.] The prophet here begins a new discourse, and describes the dreadful preparations for war, such as blowing a trumpet, and setting up a cry, gather together, and say. Assemble yourselves, and let us go into the defenced cities.

6 Set up the standard toward Zion: retire, stay not: for I will bring evil from the north, and a great destruction.

7 The lion is come up from his thicket, and the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way; he is gone forth from his place to make thy land desolate; and thy cities shall be laid waste, without an inhabitant.

8 For this gird you with sackcloth, lament and howl: for the fierce anger of the Lord is not turned back from us.

9 And it shall come to pass at that day, saith the Lord, that the heart of the king shall perish, and the heart of the princes; and the priests shall be astonished, and the prophets shall wonder.

10 Then said I, Ah, Lord God! surely thou hast greatly deceived this people and Jerusalem, saying, Ye shall have peace; whereas the sword reacheth unto the soul.

11 At that time shall it be said to this people standard," for the assembling men together, in order to their leaving the open country, and retiring with their families and goods into the defended cities, both for their own safety, and that they might maintain those garrisons against the power of the enemy.

Ver. 7] Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon (compare v. 6), whose monarchy is represented by a lion, Dan. vii. 4. He is called here the "destroyer of the gentiles," or rather nations; Judea and all the neighbouring countries being given up into his hands by God's decree (see xxv. 9, xxvii. 6).

Ver. 9. The heart of the king shall perish.] Great calamities often deprive men of their wonted courage, and that presence of mind which is necessary for the due management of their affairs; and sometimes a divine infatuation accompanies God's other judgments (see Isa. xix. 11, 12). The verb abad which is translated perish, does likewise signify to grow foolish or stupid: so it is taken, Deut. xxxii. 28. And the word still retains that signification in the Ethiopic language, as Ludolphins observes, in his Commentary in Historiam Ethip. lib. i. n. 100.

The prophets shall be astonished, and the prophets shall wonder.] Who have both agreed to make the people believe that none of these calamities should come upon them (see the following verse).

Ver. 10. Thou hast greatly deceived this people.] i.e. Thou hast suffered them to be greatly deceived by their false prophets (see the note on Isa. lixii. 17). These pretenders to prophecy studied only to speak pleasing things to the people, and seduce them up to their impiety and carnal security; and thou hast in thy judgment given them up to follow these delusions (compare 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12).

Ver. 11. A dry wind.] The same with a destroying wind, I. 1, a hot pestilential wind, as the Arabic translates it in that place, which destroys great multitudes in a moment, as travellers relate (see Dr. Prideaux, ad an. A. C. 710). The prophet describes the Chaldean armies invading Judea, under the metaphor of a dry parching wind, which blasts the fruits of the earth, withers the leaves upon the trees, and makes every thing look naked and bare.

Of the high places in the wilderness. The word sephahin, here translated high places, sometimes signifies valleys or plains (see the note on vii. 29), and to Jerusalem, A dry wind of the high places in the wilderness toward the daughter of my people, not to fan, nor to cleanse.

12 Even a full wind from those places shall come unto me: now also will I give sentence against them.

13 Behold, he shall come up as clouds, and his chariots shall be as a whirlwind: his horses are swifter than eagles. Woe unto us! for we are spoiled.

14 O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved. How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?

15 For a voice declareth from Dan, and publisheth affliction from mount Ephraim.

16 Make ye mention to the nations; behold, publish against Jerusalem, that watchers come from a far country, and give out their voice against the cities of Judah.

17 As keepers of a field, are they against her round about; because she hath been rebellious against me, saith the Lord.

18 Thy way and thy doings have procured In which sense it is fitly joined with the wilderness, which word is sometimes used for a plain or champaign country (see the note on ix. 10, xii. 12).

Ver. 12. A full wind from those places.] A strong wind, such as the drying east or north winds, which come over large plains or deserts, commonly are (see the same metaphor applied to enemies and destroyers, xlix. 36, li. 1, Isa. xxvii. 8, Ezek. xvii. 10, xix. 12, Hos. xiii. 15).

Shall come unto me.] At my commandment (compare Matt. viii. 9). The winds, storms, and other meteors, are said to fulfill God's word, and attend upon his commands (see Ps. cxlvii. 8, Job xxxvii. 35).

Now also will I give sentence against them.] Or, "utter my judgments against them," as the phrase is translated, i. 16 (see the note there).

Ver. 13. He shall come up as clouds.] As clouds of a sudden overspread the face of the sky.

His chariots shall be as a whirlwind.] For their swiftness, and the destruction they make (compare Isa. v. 28).

His horses are swifter than eagles.] Moses threatened the Jews, that for their disobedience God would bring an enemy against them "as swift as the eagle flieth," Deut. xxvii. 49 (compare Lam. iv. 19, Hos. viii. 1, Hab. 1. 8).

Ver. 15.] The rumour of the enemy's approach is heard first from Dan, which, being the most northern part of Judah, was first of all invaded (see viii. 16). And the evil tidings still increase, as the army marcheth forward towards Jerusalem, by the way of mount Ephraim.

Ver. 16. Make ye mention to the nations.] Publish it far and near.

That watchers—give out their voice against the cities of Judah.] The use of scouts or watchers is to warn men of the approach of the enemy (see vi. 17). But here the prophet by way of irony calls the Chaldean army by that name, whose business it would be to beleaguer the cities of Judah, and take care that nobody should escape out of their hands. And as the watchmen use to lift up their voice, to give notice of approaching danger, so these should make a great noise, but it should be to encourage another to these things unto thee; this is thy wickedness, because it is bitter, because it reacheth unto thine heart.

19 My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart; my heart maketh a noise in me; I cannot hold my peace, because thou hast heard, O my soul, the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war.

20 Destruction upon destruction is cried; for the whole land is spoiled; suddenly are my tents spoiled, and my curtains in a moment.

21 How long shall I see the standard, and hear the sound of the trumpet?

22 For my people is foolish, they have not known me; they are sottish children, and they have none understanding; they are wise to do evil, but to do good, they have no knowledge.

23 I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was without form and void; and the heavens, and they had no light.

fall on their adversaries, and subdue whatever opposes them.

From a far country.] See v. 15.

Ver. 18.] These are the bitter effects of thine obstinacy in wickedness, which, like a deadly wound, or disease, toucheth the very heart and seat of life. Ver. 19. 20.] The prophet in very moving expressions sympathiseth with the afflictions of his country, which he foreseeth will be the seat of war, and utterly ruined by a hostile invasion (compare Lam. i. 20. Isa. xxvii. 4).

Ver. 20.] That is, their cities and houses, in allusion to the ancient way of dwelling in tents (compare x. 20. Isa. xxxiii. 20. liv. 2). The expressions may withal imply, that fortified towns can no more resist the progress of the enemy, than if they were so many shepherds' huts (compare Isa. xxxviii. 12).

Ver. 21.] See ver. 5, 6.

Ver. 22. They are wise to do evil, but to do good, they have no knowledge. They have studied all the arts of sin and wickedness, but are perfect strangers to the obligations of religion and virtue; and they never show any quickness of thought, but when they are contriving to bring about some ill design.

Ver. 25—26.] The whole face of nature looks dismal; the inhabitants of the land and their houses, together with the fruits of the earth, are destroyed by the war; the birds of the air, and the beasts of the field, are consumed by the famine (compare v. 7. 9. 19. xx. 10. xlii. 4. xiv. 2, &c. Hos. iv. 3); so that the country looks as if it were reduced to its primitive chaos (compare Gen. i. 2). The heavens are covered with darkness, and the mountains tremble at the wrath of the Almight. The prophet often describes God's judgments upon a land or nation, as if the whole frame of nature were in a state of dissolution, because these particular judgments are an earnest of the general judgment (see Isa. i. 25. 30. xiii. 10, with the notes upon those places).

Ver. 27. Yet will I not make a full end.] In the severest judgments God brings upon his people, he still reserves a remnant, to whom he will make good his promises (see xxx. 11, lxvi. 28); or the words may be understood to this sense; though I make the whole land desolate by sword and famine, yet still I have severer judgments in reserve (compare v. 10, 18): viz. the destruction of the city and temple, and the captivity of the people that oulvide the former calamities. The former sense of the words may be confirmed, by comparing them with that passage. 1 Sam. iii. 12, "When I begin, I will also make an end;" i. e. I will make a thorough destruction, and pursue Elî's family with judgments, till I have utterly consumed it.

Ver. 28. Shall the earth mourn.] See ver. 23, 24. I have spoken it, I have purposed it, &c.] God's purpose of delivering up the Jews into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar was irreversible, upon the supposition that the greatest part of them would continue impenitent, which he likewise foresaw (see ver. 22 of this chapter, and vii. 16. 27. 28. xii. 14. xiv. 11. 12. xxv. 9—11). Though elsewhere, upon their repentance, to which God frequently exhorted them by his prophets (see xxv. 4, 5), he promises the removal of his judgments (see ver. 14 of this chapter, and vii. 3. xii. 25. xvi. 11. xxvi. 4. xxvi. 3. xxvii. 3). Herein Jeremy's preaching was very different from that of the false prophets, who preached peace and safety to the people, without imposing the condition of repentance and reformation (see ver. 10 of this chapter, and xiv. 18. xxviii. 3. 4).

Ver. 29. Climb up upon the rocks!] To save their lives (compare Isa. ii. 10, 19. 1 Sam. xiii. 6).

Ver. 30. Though thou rentest thy face with painting.] The Hebrew reads, "though thou rentest thine eyes with painting." The use of their paint was to contract the eyelids, and make the eyes appear more large and full, which they thought a great beauty (see Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. xxxiii. cap. 6). In vain shall thou make thyself fair.] The verse represents the people of the Jews, under the metaphor of a woman that sought, by the finery of her dress, and other allurements, to procure men's kindness, but all in vain. So should it be with them; all the arts they had made use of to engage the Egyptians, or other foreigners, to assist them against the Chaldeans, should stand them in no stead; may, those very allies of theirs would join with their enemies (compare ii. 13. 18. 25. 36. xvii. 5. xxii. 30. 22. Lam. i. 2. 19. iv. 17).

Ver. 31. I have heard a voice as of a woman in travail, &c.] Here Jerusalem is very pathetically described by the character of a woman under the pangs of her first child-birth, when her pains as well as her fears are greatest: such, saith the prophet, is the anguish of Jerusalem, bewailing the loss of her children, by the devouring sword of the Chaldeans, and in vain imploring comfort and as-
CHAPTER V.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter contains a vehement ex-postulation with the Jews, for the manifold corruption of their manners, and the disorders both of their civil and ecclesiastical government. And as a punishment for all these enormities, God threatens the invasion of the Chaldeans.

Ver. 1. Seek in the broad places thereof [the streets of the greatest concourse], &c.] The prophet describes a general corruption of manners in much the same terms with those of the psalmist, "There is none that doeth good, no not one" (Ps. xiv. 3). And yet the same psalm afterward mentions "the generation of the righteous," and those "who made the Lord their refuge," ver. 5, 6. So that we may reasonably in both places understand the expressions, as only denoting the great scarcity of good men (compare viii. 6).

I will pardon it.] I will pardon the wicked for the sake of the righteous, if there be any number of the latter (see Gem. xviii. 20, &c.).

Ver. 2.] Even those that do not swear by false gods (as many among them do; see ver. 7), yet will venture to call the true God to bear witness to what is not true. A sign that even the professors of the true religion have no inward sense of it.

Ver. 3. Are not thine eyes upon the truth?] Thou searchest the hearts, and clearly discernest men's real dispositions from their hypocritical pretences, and therefore art perfectly acquainted with the obstinacy and stubborn temper of this people.

Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved:] All those heavy judgments thou hast brought upon them, have not wrought in them any true remorse in travail, and the anguish as of her that bringeth forth her first child, the voice of the daughter of Zion, that bewaileth herself, that spreadeth her hands, saying, Woe is me now! for my soul is wearied because of murderers.

Ver. 4.] I thought at first, saith the prophet, that such an unconcernedness for the duties of religion could be only charged upon the rude and ignorant vulgar, who have neither leisure nor opportunity of learning their duty.

Ver. 5.] One might expect from men of better education a truer sense of religion. But, alas! the great men of the world bid open defiance to God's laws, and cast off all obligations of duty and conscience; like headstrong oxen, that will not be brought under the yoke, but break through any bonds whereby you would restrain them, or bring them under discipline (compare vii. 24, 26).

Ver. 6.] He compares their enemies to beasts of prey (see ii. 15, iv. 7, Isa. xv. 9, Nab. ii. 11—13, Hab. i. 8).

Ver. 7. How shall I pardon thee for this?] God appeals to themselves, whether they can think it consistent with his justice to let such enormous offences as these go unpunished?

Thy children. [see vii. 30] have forsaken me, and sworn by them that are no gods:] Compare Deut. xxxii. 21. Swearing is a solemn act of religion, and an appeal to God's power, justice, and truth (see iv. 2). So that to give such an honour to idols, is to rob God of his essential attributes. For this reason the Jews were strictly enjoined, "not to make mention of the names of false gods," nor to be tempted to swear by them (see Exod. xxiii. 13, Josh. xxii. 7, Ps. vi. 4).

Ver. 7, 8.] They abused the plenty which God gave them, thereby "making provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof." Expositors are very much divided in explaining two words of the Hebrew text.

for their sins, nor engaged them to amend their evil ways (see li. 30).

Ver. 7. How shall I pardon thee for this?] God appeals to themselves, whether they can think it consistent with his justice to let such enormous offences as these go unpunished?

Ver. 7, 8.] They abused the plenty which God gave them, thereby "making provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof." Expositors are very much divided in explaining two words of the Hebrew text.
9 Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord: and shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?
10 ¶ Go ye up upon her walls, and destroy; but make not a full end: take away her battlements; for they are not the Lord's.
11 For the house of Israel and the house of Judah have dealt very treacherously against me, saith the Lord.
12 They have belied the Lord, and said, It is not he; neither shall evil come upon us; neither shall we see sword nor famine:
13 And the prophets shall become wind, and the word is not in them: thus shall it be done unto them.
14 Wherefore thus saith the Lord God of hosts, Because ye speak this word, behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire, and this people wood, and it shall devour them.
15 Lo, I will bring a nation upon you from far, O house of Israel, saith the Lord: it is a here, mejuzzanim or muzannabin (for the word is differently read), translated fedl; and mashkim, rendered by our translators, "in the morning:" but the sense they give of the whole verse is much the same. I shall therefore refer the curious reader to the critical remarks upon those two words, which may be found in Pool's Synopsis.

Ver. 9. Shall I not visit for these things? Do not such crimes as these deserve some remarkable judgments as their punishment (see ver. 7)? Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? God's anger and vengeance signify in scripture the execution of his justice; the effects of which are as terrible against obstinate sinners, as if they proceeded from the highest resentment (compare xlv. 22, Ezek. v. 13, vi. 9, and see the note upon Isa. xxx. 27).

Ver. 10. Go ye up upon her walls, &c. God gives a commission to the Chaldeans to besiege and take Jerusalem. The sins it hath been guilty of make him disown the relation he formerly did bear to it, and he now declares, that he hath put it out of his protection, and delivered it up to the will of its enemies.

Make not a full end? See ver. 15.

Ver. 11. See the note on ii. 20.

Ver. 12. They have spoken unjustly and dishonourably of God, denying his government over human affairs; ascribing his judgments to chance or fortune, and disbelieving all threatenings of sword and famine, which the prophets have denounced in his name, which is in effect to give him the lie (see xiv. 15).

Ver. 13. They encourage the people to despise God's messages by his prophets, telling them that the prophets and their words are no better than wind and vanity, and that their prophecies, being nothing but their own imaginations, shall return upon their own heads, and they shall feel the judgments themselves which they threaten to others.

Ver. 14. The effect of those threatenings which are denounced by thy mouth, shall be as speedy and certain as that of fire is when put to dry wood. To the same sense are those words of Hoses (vi. 5), "I have hewed them by my prophets." Thus Christ is described as having "a sharp sword proceeding out of his mouth" (Rev. i. 16), because the judgments he denounces against the wicked are like the sentence of a judge, which is certainly followed with execution.

CHAPTER V.

9 Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord: and shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?
10 ¶ Go ye up upon her walls, and destroy; but make not a full end: take away her battlements; for they are not the Lord's.
11 For the house of Israel and the house of Judah have dealt very treacherously against me, saith the Lord.
12 They have belied the Lord, and said, It is not he; neither shall evil come upon us; neither shall we see sword nor famine:
13 And the prophets shall become wind, and the word is not in them: thus shall it be done unto them.
14 Wherefore thus saith the Lord God of hosts, Because ye speak this word, behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire, and this people wood, and it shall devour them.
15 Lo, I will bring a nation upon you from far, O house of Israel, saith the Lord: it is a Ver. 15. I will bring a nation upon you from far;) Babylon is called "a far country" Isa. xxxix. 3. Perhaps it is called a far country here, in comparison of the Philistines, Moabites, Amorites, and other borderers, who before were the Jews' oppressors.

The words "house of Israel" are, after the captivity of the ten tribes, applied to the two tribes remaining (see vi. 9, ix. 26, x. 1, Ezek. xiii. 5, xviii. 31).

It is an ancient nation;) Babylon was built about a hundred years after the flood: and in a little time after Nimrod erected a kingdom there; whereupon that country is called "the land of Nimrod," Mic. v. 6.

A nation whose language thou knowest not, &c.) Another part of that judgment denounced Deut. xxviii. 49. This is a great aggravation of the miseries of a foreign conquest, that there is no parleying or treating with such a conqueror, nor moving him to compassion, because they understand not each other's language. The common people among the Jews before the captivity did not understand the Chaldee tongue, called by them the "Syrian language" (see 2 Kings xviii. 26).

Ver. 16.) All their arrows shall do execution, so that their quiver may be looked upon as a common grave to their enemies.

Ver. 17. They shall eat up—thy bread;) Bread is here put for bread-corn; and so it is used, Isa. xxvii. 28, xxx. 23.

Ver. 18. Nevertheless, in those days;) Or, "yet even in those days," &c. i.e. I have still some judgments in reserve, viz. the destruction of your city and temple, and the carrying away the remainder of the nation captive to Babylon (see iv. 27).

Ver. 19. Wherefore dost thou the Lord our God all things unto us?) Those that fall under the severity of God's judgments are apt to think so favourably of themselves, as to wonder why they should be singled out as the exceptions of the divine vengeance, and of terror to others. And particularly the Jews thought this severe proceeding scarce consistent with those many gracious promises God had made unto their nation.

Then thou shalt answer them, &c.) As much as to say, All God's promises were made upon condition of your obedience, and if you forsake God, you are not to expect that the promise of dwelling in this land should be made good to you any longer.
21 Hear now this, O foolish people, and without understanding; which have eyes, and see not; which have ears, and hear not:

22 Fear ye not me? saith the LORD: will ye not tremble at my presence, which have placed the sand for the bound of the sea by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass it: and though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail; though they roar, yet can they not pass over it?

23 But this people hath a revolting and a rebellious heart; they are revoluted and gone.

24 Neither say they in their heart, Let us now fear the LORD our God, that giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in his season: he reserveth unto us the appointed weeks of the harvest.

25 ¶ Your iniquities have turned away these things, and your sins have withholden good things from you.

Ver 21.] Who make no use of the senses and understanding which God hath given them (see Isa. vi. 9).

Ver. 22.] The keeping the waters within bounds, so that they cannot overflow the earth, is often mentioned in scripture, as an immediate effect of God's overruling power and providence (see Job xxxviii. 10, 11, Ps. xxxiii. 7, civ. 9, Prov. viii. 29). For water being specifically lighter than earth, by the common laws of gravitation, it should rise above it and overflow it. And then the adjusting the proportion of the tides, that they rise no higher to the prejudice of the lower grounds, is another remarkable instance of God's especial providence.

Ver. 24.] That giveth rain.] The viscerality of seasons, of cold and heat, of drought and moisture, so wisely fitted for the growth of the fruits of the earth, and other uses of human life, is such a proof of a God and providence, as is obvious to the meanest capacity: upon which account it is frequently insisted on by the holy writers (see Ps. cxlvii. 8, Matt. v. 45, Acts xiv. 17).

Both the former and the latter, in his season:] The former rain came just after sowing (Iam, to make the seed take root: the latter rain was just before harvest, to plump and fill the ears, called the "latter rain in the first month." Joel ii. 23, at which time the harvest began (see Deut. xvi. 9).

Ver. 25.] See lii. 3.

Ver. 26. They lay wait.] They use all the arts of fraud and cozenage, whereby they may overreach others, and make a prey of them and their substance (see the following verse).

Ver. 28. They overpass the deeds of the wicked:] They exceed the common instances of injustice and oppression, and make no conscience of enriching themselves with the spoils of the fatherless, and those who have most need of their charity and kindness.

Ver. 29.] The sins of oppression are commonly called crying sins; such as cry to heaven for vengeance against those that are guilty of them (see Mal. iii. 5, James v. 4).

Ver. 31.] Both priests and prophets agree to speak pleasing things to the people, thereby to keep up their interest and authority with them; and what can this end in, but a total corruption of manners: the consequence of which must be utter ruin and destruction.

CHAPTER VI.

1 O ye children of Benjamin, gather yourselves to flee out of the midst of Jerusalem, and blow the trumpet in Tekoa, and set up a sign of fire in Beth-haccerem: for evil appeareth out of the north, and great destruction.

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet encourageth the Chaldeans to come up and besiege Jerusalem, as a place abandoned by God for its incorrigibleness, and given up to the will of its enemies.

Ver. 1. Gather yourselves to flee out—of Jerusalem:] That you may avoid the miseries of a siege. Part of Jerusalem stood in the tribe of Benjamin (see the note on 1. 1). The prophet here applies himself to the Benjamites, as living himself in that tribe. Blow the trumpet in Tekoa, and set up a sign of fire in Beth-haccerem:] The design of these signals of war is to assemble men together, in order to their mutual defence; but it is in vain to attempt any such matter, and therefore the only use that can be made of them, is to give notice to the people, that they should disperse themselves, and fly from the approaching enemy. Beth-haccerem was a village between Jerusalem and Tekoa, as St Jerome informs us in his commentary upon this place. The name of this village is mentioned, Neh. iii. 14. For evil appeareth out of the north.] See i. 14.

Ver. 2.] Some render the verse thus: "I have likened the daughter of Zion to a comely and delicate woman. 3 The shepherds with their flocks shall come unto her; they shall pitch their tents against her round about; they shall feed every one in his place.

The shepherds with their herds shall come unto her; they shall pitch their tents against her round about; they shall feed every one in his place.
CHAPTER VI.

4 Prepare ye war against her; arise, and let us go up at noon. Woe unto us! for the day goeth away, for the shadows of the evening are stretched out.

5 Arise, and let us go by night, and let us destroy her palaces.

6 ¶ For thus hath the Lord of hosts said. I have broken the teeth of the nations; I have cast down the corners of their towers: I have given their horses also to the sword; I have turned their chariots intoonitor; and their horses into fire:

7 As a fountain casteth out her waters, so she casteth out her wickedness: violence and spoil is heard in her; before me continually is grief and wounds.

8 Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem, lest my soul depart from thee; lest I make thee desolate, a land not inhabited.

9 ¶ Thus said the Lord of hosts, They shall thoroughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine: pasture in the foregoing verse, saith, that the shepherds and their flocks shall take possession of her, meaning the Chaldean generals (for in that sense shepherds are sometimes understood; see xxv. 34), and their armies, who should feed upon her, till they had quite devoured her. So the Chaldean paraphrase explains "shepherds with their flocks," by "inhabitants with their armies."

Ver. 4. Prepare ye war against her;] God, by his prophet, gives a commission to the Chaldeans to fight, against Jerusalem (compare li. 27, Joel iii. 9). The Hebrew reads, "sanctify war," concerning which expression, see the note on Isa. xiii. 9.

Ver. 5. and let us go up at noon.] The expressions denote the alacrity of the soldiers, and how ready they were to assault her openly at noon-day (compare xv. 8): or even in the heat of the day, which was a time of rest and intermission of labour in those hot countries (see 2 Sam. iv. 5).

Ver. 6. This siege is carried on by God's decree and command, as a just punishment for the oppressions and other crying sins the inhabitants are guilty of.

Ver. 7. Before me continually is grief and wounds.] I hear the continual complaints of those that groan under the oppression that they suffer, and are put to death unjustly and cruelly (compare Ps. lv. 9—11).

Ver. 8. Take warning by the many threatenings and judgments I have denounced against thee; amongst thy ways and doings, lest, if thou persist in thy wickedness, my mind and affection be utterly alienated from thee (see Ezek. xxiii. 17, 18, Hos. ix. 12), and I cast off all bowels of compassion towards thee, and give thee up to ruin and desolation. This threatening God fulfilled afterward, when he suffered the city and nation to be utterly ruined and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar; but it still received a further completion, in that final desolation brought upon them by the Romans, under Titus Vespasian.

Ver. 9. A comparison elsewhere used, to express the entire ridance that is made in a city or country by hostile depredations (see Isa. xvi. 6, xxiv. 13).

Vol. III. p. 50

10 To whom shall I speak, and give warning, that they may hear? behold, their ear is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken: behold, the word of the Lord is unto them a reproach; they have no delight in it.

11 Therefore I am full of the fury of the Lord; I am weary with holding in: I will pour it out upon the children abroad, and upon the assembly of young men together: for even the husband with the wife shall be taken, the aged with him that is full of days.

12 And their houses shall be turned unto others, with their fields and houses together: for I will stretch out my hand upon the inhabitants of the land, saith the Lord.

13 For from the least of them even unto the greatest of them every one is given to covet-

And as a grape-gatherer, when he thought he had done his work, afterward spies more bunches, and gathers them into his basket; so that they come after shall make an entire ridance of what was left by the former invaders, till at last there shall be nothing at all remaining (compare xlix. 9).

Ver. 10. Their ear is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken:] As the ear when it is stopped up with filth, cannot hear; so their minds are so prepossessed by their lusts, that the word of God can find no admittance. Man's hearts, their lips, and their ears, are said to be uncircumcised, when they are not duly disposed for hearing the truth (compare iv. lx. 26). And while men continue in this condition, they are not in a due attention to what God speaks to them. In the same sense Christ saith to the Jews, "How can ye believe, who receive honour one of another" (John v. 44), meaning, that such a temper was an obstacle to their believing on him, and hindered them from "receiving the truth in the love of it."

The word of the Lord is to them a reproach.] The expressions are used in a figure of speech and derision (see xx. 9).

Ver. 11. I am full of the fury of the Lord; I am weary with holding in:] This mocking of God's messengers, and despising his word, is a great aggravation of their sins, and withal a sign that they are now grown incorrigible; so that I now feel myself pressed in spirit, and under a constraint of denouncing God's judgments against all orders and ranks of men, both young and old, women and children.
